See also Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Stewart, Potter; Warrant Clause; Warrantless Searches

COPYRIGHT LAW AND FREE EXERCISE

The First Amendment forbids Congress from making any law prohibiting the free exercise of religion. The federal copyright statute grants copyright holders a court-enforced power to prevent third parties from using religious texts. Nevertheless, copyright is unlikely to violate the Free Exercise Clause. In 1990, the Supreme Court held that the Free Exercise Clause does not require the government to grant religious exemptions to neutral laws of general applicability, Employment Division v. Smith. Since copyright doctrine makes no distinctions based on the content of works or the religious status of their authors, copyright is a neutral law of general applicability.

Courts could accommodate the needs of persons wishing to use copyright-protected material for religious purposes without permission by using several different copyright doctrines. Courts could refuse copyright to works allegedly dictated to humans by divine beings on the ground that copyright requires a human author. Courts could find that seemingly infringing uses are allowed as "fair use." Fair use allows some actions that otherwise would be copyright infringement after balancing the purpose and nature of the use (including whether it is commercial or non-profit), the nature of the copyrighted work, the amount used, and the economic burden on the copyright holder, Title 17 United States Code, Section 107. One could argue that religious worship is a socially valuable nonprofit use under the first factor. Courts could narrow the copyright protection of the religious work through the "idea/expression dichotomy." Copyright only protects the way an idea or fact is expressed, but not the idea or fact, Title 17 United States Code, Section 102(b). If only a few ways of expressing something are possible, the expression and content are said to merge, allowing no copyright protection. One could argue that religious practice requires access to the exact words of a divine message; no paraphrase is equivalent. Even if the court decides that copyright has been infringed, it could accommodate religiously motivated infringement by granting only money damages instead of ordering the use stopped.

The courts generally have been unsympathetic to these arguments. For example, a believer was held to infringe the copyrights of the Urantia Foundation when she made numerous electronic copies of the Urantia Book for free distribution to other potential believers. The court was not swayed by the claimed celestial authorship of the scripture, insisting that the human "intermediaries" were "authors" for purposes of the copyright statute, Urantia Foundation v. Maherra. In Urantia, religious practice was not greatly affected, because the copied work was available to anyone at a reasonable price from the copyright holder. Copyright has been enforced even when the copyright holder may have intended to prevent any use of the religious book. The World Wide Church of God (WWCG) holds copyright in Pastor General Herbert W. Armstrong's Mystery of the Ages (MOA). After distributing more than nine million free copies of MOA, the WWCG decided to halt distribution because of doctrinal changes. WWCG was out of print for at least ten years. Two former WWCG ministers started a separate church dedicated to the original teachings of MOA; all members were required to read MOA to be considered for baptism. The separatist ministers were held to have infringed WWCG's copyright when they began printing and distributing new copies of MOA without permission. The court did not find relevant that the new church was more dedicated to the teachings of MOA's author than was the MOA-suppressing copyright holder. The court gave great weight to WWCG's claim that it intended to publish an annotated version of MOA sometime in the future. The separatist ministers were ordered to cease publication and distribution of MOA, Worldwide Church of God v. Philadelphia Church of God.

Many intellectual property cases involve the Church of Scientology's attempts to keep secret various church materials disseminated by disaffected former scientologists. The Free Exercise Clause has been of scant help to either side in these cases. Seemingly to prevent Establishment Clause issues, the courts generally apply standard copyright doctrine without taking religious motivations into account. Two Establishment Clause issues loom in such copyright disputes. First, copyright is usually considered a type of personal property. Allowing copyright infringement for religious use would constitute limiting one person's property rights to accommodate another person's religious belief. This might violate the Establishment Clause by showing favoritism toward one religious sect. Second, deciding which of competing sects is more in line with the beliefs of the spiritual work's author might violate the Establishment Clause by entangling the court in issues of religious doctrine.

The copyright statute includes one specific exemption for religious worship. According to section 110(3) of title 17 of the United States Code, copyright is not infringed by "performance of a nondramatic literary or musical work or of a dramatico-musical work of a religious nature, or display of a work, in the course of services at a place of worship or other religious assembly." In other words, if church members have a legally obtained copy of a hymnbook or scripture, they can sing or read the words aloud during worship services without obtaining a license from the copyright holder. A license would otherwise be necessary, because a copyright holder has the exclusive right not only to make and distribute copies of his work but also to allow the work to be performed publicly. This statutory exemption has not been discussed by any court opinions, but Professor Cotter argues that it violates the Establishment Clause by favoring religion over secularism.

In addition, a court could hold that otherwise infringing activity must be allowed because of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), which protects religious practices from substantial burdens created by laws of general applicability unless the law is the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling government interest. Congress enacted the RFRA in reaction to Employment Division v. Smith. No court has accepted the argument that copyright enforcement is a substantial burden for purposes of RFRA, not even the Worldwide Church case discussed previously. In 1997, the Supreme Court held the RFRA to be unconstitutional as applied to state statutes, City of Boerne v. Flores. Copyright is a federal statute, so it is not touched by Boerne.

MALLA POLLACK

References and Further Reading

Cotter, Thomas F., Gutenberg's Legacy: Copyright, Censorship, and Religious Pluralism, California Law Review 91 (2003): 232.

Cases and Statutes Cited

City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Urantia Foundation v. Maaherra, 114 F.3d 955 (9th Cir. 1997)
Worldwide Church of God v. Philadelphia Church of God, Inc., 227 F.3d 1110 (9th Cir. 2000)

See also Church of Scientology and Religious Liberty; City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997); Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Establishment Clause: Theories of Interpretation; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Religious Freedom Restoration Act

CORPORATION OF THE PRESIDING BISHOP OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS v. AMOS, 483 U.S. 327 (1987)

The Supreme Court in Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos (1987) addressed the important issue of whether statutory exceptions to otherwise generally applicable laws are constitutionally permissible as an accommodation to religious freedom. The nine to zero decision in the case became more important after the Supreme Court's holding in Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990) that religious exemptions to generally applicable laws are not constitutionally required. Indeed, Justice Scalia in Smith specifically stated that issues of religious freedom are most appropriately within the purview of the political process, a constitutional possibility that Amos allows but Smith explains is not required.

The specific issue in Presiding Bishop was whether a religious organization exemption from Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 violates the Establishment Clause. The claimant, Mayson, worked at the Deseret Gymnasium in Salt Lake City, Utah, a non-profit public facility owned and operated by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. The church discharged him in 1981 because he failed to qualify for a “temple recommend,” a religious worthiness standard for church members. Following his discharge for religious reasons, he brought a civil rights class action against the church, under Section 703 of Title VII, for discriminating in employment on the basis of religion. The church defended on the basis of Section 702, which exempts religious organizations from the proscription against religious discrimination. At trial Mayson successfully argued that the exemption provided in Section 702 violates the Establishment Clause, because it has the primary effect of advancing religion, contrary to the Lemon test.

Justice White, writing for the Court, reversed the district court’s judgment, holding that the state may accommodate religion by statutory exemptions without violating the establishment Clause. Despite variant explanations of why statutory exemptions may be constitutionally permissible, no justice dissented from the Court’s essential holding that the establishment clause does not prohibit the state from ever accommodating religious freedom through statutory exemptions.

Justice White’s majority opinion held that to avoid conflicting with the establishment clause, any religious exemption must pass the three-pronged Lemon test, a test Section 702 clearly passed. Under Lemon’s secular purpose test, the 702 exemption served “a permissible legislative purpose to alleviate significant governmental interference with the ability of religious organizations to define and carry out their religious missions.” In response to Mayson’s argument that it was difficult to imagine how working in a gym would affect a religious organization’s “religious activities,” the Court concluded that narrowly defining a religious institution’s “religious activities” would unduly burden the religious organization’s ability to define and carry out its religious mission.

With regard to the Lemon issue of secular effect, the Court held that this test is violated only where “the government itself has advanced religion through its activities and influence.” In Presiding Bishop Congress had not advanced religion by the exemption, but simply had permitted the religious institution to advance its own religious purposes. Because Congress’s incidental advancement of the religious institution could not reasonably be attributable to the government, the exemption did not trigger a Lemon violation of an impermissible religious effect. With regard to Lemon’s entanglement prong, the Court held that deferring to the religious institution for the determination of what constituted a “religious activity” diminished any likelihood of entanglement. Indeed, how could any court effectively trump a religious institution’s evaluation of what constitutes “religious activity” without seriously violating the proscription against entanglement?

Justice Brennan, with whom Justice Marshall joined, agreed that the legislature might have a constitutional secular purpose of deferring as a matter of religious freedom to the religious community’s sense of their religious mission. Justice Brennan acknowledged that the “authority to engage in this process of self-definition inevitably involves what we normally regard as infringement on free exercise rights, since a religious organization is able to condition employment in certain activities on subscription to particular religious tenets.” However, Justice Brennan conceded that “[w]e are willing to countenance the imposition of such a condition because we deem it vital that, if certain activities constitute part of a religious community’s practice, then a religious organization should be able to require that only members of its community perform those activities.”

Justice O’Connor, in a concurring opinion, suggested that the religious accommodation could also be justified on the basis of her endorsement test alternative to the Lemon analysis. She reasoned that while any religious exemption may conflict with the Lemon proscription against any legislative purpose beneficial to religion, some exemptions might be justifiable as a matter of respect to the free exercise of religion. The question should not be whether the exemption is beneficial to religion but rather whether the accommodation provides “unjustifiable awards of assistance to religious organizations.” To resolve this issue, Justice O’Connor suggested that the test ought to ask “whether government’s purpose is to endorse religion and whether the statute actually conveys a message of endorsement.” To ascertain whether the statute conveys a message of endorsement, the relevant issue is how it would be perceived by an objective observer who is acquainted with the text, the legislative history, and the implementation of the statute. As applied to the facts, Justice O’Connor concluded that “[b]ecause there is a probability that a nonprofit activity of a religious organization will itself be involved in the organization’s mission, in my view the objective observer should perceive the Government action as an accommodation of the exercise of religion rather than as a Government endorsement of religion.”

Amos has since been cited repeatedly for two line-drawing propositions for statutory exemptions that are beneficial to religious communities: (1) that the state may accommodate religious freedom through the political process, unless (2) that “accommodation” crosses the establishment line by endorsing religion to the objective observer. Without the principle of religious accommodationism announced in Amos, Justice Scalia's relegation of religious freedom to the political processes in Smith would leave precious little for the free exercise of religion other than the equal protection mandate acknowledged in Church of the Lukumi Bablu Aye v. City of Hialeah that the state not actively target religion.

RICHARD COLLIN MANGRUM

Cases and Statutes Cited

Corporation of the Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327 (1987)
Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)

CORRIGAN v. BUCKLEY, 271 U.S. 323 (1926)

In Corrigan v. Buckley, the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously rejected a legal challenge to racially restrictive covenants and thereby made a significant contribution to the upsurge in residential segregation that took place in America's cities during the first half of the twentieth century.

In 1917, in Buchanan v. Warley, the Court found that municipal ordinances requiring residential segregation violated the fourteenth amendment, relying in significant measure on the fact that it was the government that had mandated the segregation. In response to that decision, in cities across the country, residents entered into private contracts whereby they agreed not to sell or rent their homes to blacks (or members of other minority groups), thereby accomplishing the same goal that the drafters of the municipal ordinances had sought to achieve.

The Corrigan case involved a racially restrictive covenant in the District of Columbia. In 1921, several residents of the District had entered into a covenant pursuant to which they promised to never sell their home to "any person of the negro race or blood." The next year, Irene Corrigan, one of the white residents who had signed the covenant, contracted to sell her home to a Negro, Helen Curtis. Another white homeowner, John Buckley, sued to block the sale of the home on the grounds that it violated the restrictive covenant. After a lower court granted relief to the plaintiff and the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia affirmed, the defendants appealed to the Supreme Court. The defendants argued that the covenant itself (not its judicial enforcement) violated several provisions of the U.S. Constitution, including the Fifth, Thirteenth, and Fourteenth Amendments. At this time, the Supreme Court's jurisdiction over cases from the District of Columbia was limited to matters raising "substantial" federal claims. The Court determined that the appellants had presented no such claims and hence dismissed the appeal "for want of jurisdiction." In reaching that conclusion, the Court concluded that both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments limited only the action of the government, not private parties, and that the Thirteenth Amendment, which prohibited slavery and involuntary servitude, had no application to the sale of real estate. Although the defendants had not challenged the constitutionality of the judicial enforcement of the covenant at any point in the litigation, they did raise the enforcement issue in their arguments to the Supreme Court. The Court noted that this issue was not properly before it, but nevertheless observed—in dicta—that this argument was also "lacking in substance." Although the Court did not clearly resolve the question whether judicial enforcement of racially restrictive covenants was constitutional, a difficult one since such enforcement arguably implicated state action, after the Corrigan decision, state courts across the nation cited Corrigan for the view that the judicial enforcement of such covenants did not violate the Constitution.

The Corrigan case legitimized racially restrictive covenants and gave encouragement to white property owners to use such covenants to retain the racial integrity of residential neighborhoods. Their use was extensive and contributed to the solidification of the black ghetto in many northern cities. For example, by the 1940s, eighty-five percent of the housing in Detroit and eighty percent of the housing in Chicago was encumbered by a racially restrictive covenant.

Finally, in 1948, the U.S. Supreme Court in Shelley v. Kraemer (1948) declared that judicial enforcement of racially restrictive covenants did violate the Fourteenth Amendment. But the legacy of several decades of enforcement of these covenants meant that residential segregation was well entrenched in most major American cities, a pattern that has never been undone.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

Massey, Douglas S., and Nancy A. Denton. American Apartheid: Segregation and the Making of the Underclass. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1993.
 McGovney, D. O., Racial Residential Segregation by State Court Enforcement of Restrictive Agreements, Covenants or Conditions in Deeds is Unconstitutional, California Law Review 33 (1945): 5–39.
 Vose, Clement E. Caucasians Only: The Supreme Court, the NAACP, and the Restrictive Covenant Cases. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60 (1917)
Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)

See also Fourteenth Amendment; State Action Doctrine

CORRUPTION OF BLOOD

The doctrine of corruption of blood mandated that when a person committed a criminal or treasonous act, he and his entire family became outlaws. As a consequence, the offender forfeited all of his property, real and personal. In addition, the offender could no longer transfer his property, either during his lifetime or on death. The property itself fell to the crown.

Blackstone indicates in his commentaries that the Normans introduced corruption of blood into English law on their conquest of the Isles. After 1066, civil disabilities were imposed through “attainder,” a procedure that declared a criminal convicted of treason or a felony “attained.” Attainder immediately led to corruption of blood, forfeiture and loss of all civil rights. This denial of all rights became referred to as “civil death.”

By the late eighteenth century, the penalty had come under attack in England as unduly harsh and lacking in use, as rehabilitative principles began their ascent during the Age of Enlightenment. During this time, the English parliament created felonies without corruption of blood as penalty. It ultimately abolished corruption of blood in 1870.

The U.S. Constitution rejected the penalty in the Corruption of Blood Clause of Article III. It limits forfeiture for treason to the traitor’s lifetime and indicates its hostility to the punishment also in the Bill of Attainder Clause. These are among the substantive values, as Alexander Hamilton noted, included in the Constitution itself. Why the founding fathers rejected corruption of blood remains unclear, but they seem to have been concerned about creating familial, rather than individual, punishment. The decisions in Wallach v. Riswick and Justice Miller’s dissent in Ex parte Garland both point in this direction. After the constitutional prohibitions, the federal government passed complementary legislation that remained on the books until the 1980s.

Several state constitutions also contain corruption of blood clauses. However, despite federal and state prohibitions, the problems created by corruption of blood continued because of civil death provisions that prohibited inmates, and especially lifers, from entering into contracts and from inheriting property. Therefore, their rights to grant property to their children was limited, albeit they were not restricted from bequeathing property they held at the time of conviction to their children. Modern forfeiture statutes also raise some of the same problems inherent in the corruption of blood penalty.

Despite the attempt to protect children from the sins of their parents, in many other situations, the law penalizes children for choices their parents made. This held particularly true for children born out of wedlock but continues to other groups of children, such as the noncitizen children of undocumented immigrants who may be barred from access to certain public goods. Moreover, the prohibition on corruption of blood does not entail prohibition on other consequences of a criminal offense, many of which also impact the offender’s family. Among them are the denial of welfare benefits to the offender, restrictions on access to one’s children because of incarceration, and inability to provide appropriately for one’s family because of statutory limitations on employment.

NORA V. DEMLEITNER

References and Further Reading

U.S. Const. art. I, 9. cl. 3, art. I, 10, cl. 1; art. III, 3, cl. 2.
William Blackstone, Commentaries.
History and Theory of Civil Disabilities, Vand. L. Rev. 23 (1970): 941.
Stier, Max, Note, Corruption of Blood and Equal Protection: Why the Sins of the Parents Should Not Matter, Stan. L. Rev. 44 (1992): 727.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. (4 Wall) 333 (1866)
Wallach v. Van Riswick, 92 U.S. 202 (1875)

See also Bill of Attainder; Civil Death; Collateral Consequences

COUNSELMAN v. HITCHCOCK, 142 U.S. 547 (1892)

This case concerns the breadth of the protection against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment. The defendant, Counselman, invoked his Fifth Amendment privileges in refusing to answer specific questions from a federal grand jury. Because of the existence of a federal statute granting immunity from prosecution on the basis of evidence the witness had provided during a criminal proceeding, Counselman was charged with contempt. He filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that he could legitimately invoke the Fifth Amendment, because its protection was broader than that offered by the statute.

The case went on appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, where it was heard in December 1891 and decided in January 1892, with Justice Samuel Blatchford writing for a unanimous Court. The Court agreed with Counselman's contention, saying that the protection provided by the federal law was limited by the fact that, while the evidence obtained through his testimony could not be used against him in a federal proceeding, it could be used as a basis for obtaining information that might be used in another case against him. The Court thus acknowledged the limited protection offered by the federal statute. Congress subsequently revised the law, prohibiting the prosecution of a witness granted immunity for his involvement in the matter about which he testified.

In a period when relatively little attention was being paid to the scope of civil liberties protection offered by the federal Bill of Rights, the ruling in this case was significant because the Court, given the opportunity, was willing to acknowledge the broad scope of the guarantees against self-incrimination offered by the Fifth Amendment.

REBECCA S. SHOEMAKER

References and Further Reading

Constitutional Rights at the Junction: The Emergence of the Privilege against Self-Incrimination and the Interstate Commerce Act, Virginia Law Review, 81 (1995): 7:1989–2042.

Levy, Leonard. Origins of the Fifth Amendment; the Right against Self-incrimination New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Self-incrimination (v): Historical Background

COUNTY AND CITY SEALS WITH RELIGIOUS CONTENT

One issue that frequently generates controversy in the United States is whether the use of religious symbols or language on government property constitutes an establishment of religion in violation of the Establishment Clause. One example of the use of religious symbols or language on government property is the use of religious language or imagery on the official seals of cities and counties. On a number of occasions, plaintiffs have challenged the constitutionality of such usages. The U.S. Supreme Court has never considered such a case, but a few lower courts have done so. These courts have tended to focus on whether the use of the religious imagery or language has a primary effect of advancing religion or would be reasonably viewed as constituting an endorsement of religion. If so, then the seal violates the Establishment Clause.

Most courts that have occasion to consider such a case have held that religious content on a city or county seal violates the Establishment Clause. In 1985, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit sitting en banc considered the constitutionality of a Bernalillo County, New Mexico, seal that contained the Spanish motto "Con Esta Vencemos," which means "With This We Conquer," arched over a gold Latin cross. The district court had found that the seal's religious imagery had only historical, not religious, significance, because it denoted the role of the Catholic Church in the settlement of the American Southwest. The Tenth Circuit disagreed, holding that the seal had "the primary effect of advancing religion" and so violated the Establishment Clause. By way of example, the court noted that those persons who encounter a police officer with the county seal emblazoned on his car could reasonably assume that the "officers were Christian police, and that the organization they represented identified itself with a Christian God" Friedman v. Board of County Commissioners (1985). Thereafter, the county removed the religious language and replaced the Latin cross with an ancient Native American sun symbol.

In 1989, the Tenth Circuit again considered the constitutionality of a government seal—one for the city of St. George, Utah—that included a depiction of the city's Mormon temple. The district court found on a summary judgment motion that the illustration of the temple did not have the primary effect of endorsing the Mormon Church, but the Tenth Circuit reversed, holding that there was an issue of fact as to whether the depiction constituted a governmental endorsement of religion and remanded for a trial: Foremaster v. City of St. George (1989).

In 1991, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit found that two Illinois city seals—the first of which contained a Latin cross along with various secular symbols and the second of which also contained a Latin cross along with the words "God Reigns"—violated the Establishment Clause, because they constituted an endorsement of the Christian religion: Harris v. City of Zion (1991); Kuhn v. City of Rolling Meadows (1991).

In 1995, the Tenth Circuit again considered the constitutionality of a city seal—for Edmond, Oklahoma—that contained four quadrants, one of which depicted a Latin cross. The court rejected the city's argument that the seal reflected "the unique history and heritage of Edmond" and concluded that the use of the cross on the seal violated the Establishment Clause: Robinson v. City of Edmond (1995).

In 1998, a federal district court found that a city seal for Stow, Ohio, containing, along with other secular symbols, a Latin cross superimposed on an open book, had the primary effect of advancing Christianity and thus violated the Establishment Clause” ACLU v. City of Stow (1998). The following year, in 1999, a federal district court found that a city seal in Republic, Missouri, that contained a symbolic representation of a fish—a Christian symbol—along with other secular images violated the Establishment Clause: Webb v. City of Republic (1999).

One court, however, has sustained the constitutionality of a city seal containing religious content. In 1991, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit found that the seal of the city of Austin, Texas, that incorporated the family coat of arms of Stephen F. Austin for whom the city was named did not violate the Establishment Clause even though the coat of arms included a Latin cross: Murray v. City of Austin (1991).

On at least one occasion, the use of a county name itself has been challenged as violating the Establishment Clause. In 1994, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit considered a constitutional challenge to use of the word “Sacramento” on the Sacramento county seal because the English word, “sacrament,” is a term associated with Christianity. The district court dismissed the lawsuit on standing grounds and the Ninth Circuit affirmed: O’Leary v. County of Sacramento (1994).

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Curtis, Ralph, Religious Symbols on Municipal Seals and Logos, Journal of Contemporary Law 19 (1993): 287–300.
- Hill, David S., City of Edmond v. Robinson: The Coercion-Standing Test—A New Approach to Religious Symbols Under the Establishment Clause? Utah Law Review 2000 (2000): 643–669.
- McCabe, Kevin J., Note: Toward a Consensus on Religious Images in Civic Seals Under the Establishment Clause: American Civil Liberties Union v. City of Stow, Villanova Law Review 46 (2001): 585–611.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- ACLU v. City of Stow*, 29 F. Supp. 2d 845 (N.D. Ohio 1998)
- Foremaster v. City of St. George*, 882 F.2d 1485 (10th Cir. 1989)
- Friedman v. Board of County Commissioners*, 781 F.2d 777 (10th Cir. 1985)
- Harris v. City of Zion*, 927 F.2d 1401 (7th Cir. 1991)
- Kuhn v. City of Rolling Meadows*, 927 F.2d 1401 (7th Cir. 1991)
- Murray v. City of Austin*, 947 F. 2d 147 (5th Cir. 1991)

O’Leary v. County of Sacramento, 19 F.3d 1440 (9th Cir. 1994) (unpublished)

Robinson v. City of Edmond, 68 F.3d 1226 (10th Cir. 1995)

Webb v. City of Republic, 55 F. Supp. 2d 994 (W.D. Mo.1999)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing

COVINGTON, HAYDEN (1911–1980)

Hayden Covington, a graduate of the San Antonio Bar Association School of Law (later St. Mary’s University School of Law), ranks among the most overworked and underappreciated attorneys in American history. During the middle part of the twentieth century, he handled as many as fifty major cases every year involving the civil liberties of Jehovah’s Witnesses, who faced an unparalleled wave of religious persecution because of their uncommon beliefs and sometimes peculiar behavior. His indefatigable work helped usher in a new era in American constitutional law, the “rights revolution” that reached its apogee under the Warren Court of the 1960s.

Unleashed in a courtroom, Covington could be a whirlwind. A brief magazine profile published in 1943, marveling at his athletic delivery of oral arguments, compared him to a cyclone. After watching the frenetic Witness attorney argue several cases in the early 1940s, a Supreme Court clerk cracked that while Covington might not have talked a greater length longer than other attorneys appearing before the nation’s highest bench, he undoubtedly performed more calisthenics. Covington’s loud attire also was conspicuous: he argued one important case while sporting a vibrant green suit and a red plaid tie.

But while Covington’s demeanor in the courtroom was easy to mock, his record was one that any lawyer would envy. Between 1938 and 1955, he prevailed in more than two dozen cases heard by the U.S. Supreme Court, a record that prompted more than one sympathetic observer to compare him to the likes of Thurgood Marshall. Such landmark cases as Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940), and West Virginia v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1942) bore his unmistakable imprimatur. His work in these cases and myriad others prompted one national magazine to call him an extraordinary precedent-breaker. Indeed, Covington was nothing short of relentless in asking the high court to scrap ossified judicial precedents and broaden judicial protections for civil liberties.

Asked to explain why he and his fellow Witnesses defended their civil liberties so zealously in the courts, Covington said that they were simply devout Christians following a precedent established in the Scriptures by the likes of the apostle Paul. The Witnesses were like the earliest Christians, Covington suggested, because they used the courts not only to secure their own freedoms but also to help ensure religious liberty for all Christians.

Covington's star faded in the 1960s and 1970s. He clashed with the leaders of his faith and was at one point "disfellowshipped" (effectively excommunicated). Until his death in 1980, he also was dogged by rumors that he suffered from a drinking problem. But even as he floundered, Covington managed to briefly return to prominence as an attorney in the late 1960s by helping the boxer Muhammad Ali contest his military draft classification in court.

SHAWN FRANCIS PETERS

References and Further Reading

- Ali, Muhammad. The Greatest: My Own Story. New York: Random House, 1975.
- Newton, Merlin Owen. Armed with the Constitution: Jehovah's Witnesses in Alabama and the U.S. Supreme Court. Tuscaloosa, AL: University of Alabama Press, 1995.
- Penton, M. James. Apocalypse Delayed: The Story of Jehovah's Witnesses, 2nd ed. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997.
- Peters, Shawn Francis. Judging Jehovah's Witnesses: Religious Persecution and the Dawn of the Rights Revolution. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
- Minersville School District v. Gobitis*, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
- West Virginia v. Barnette*, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

COX v. LOUISIANA, 379 U.S. 536 (1965)

The First Amendment rights to freedom of speech and assembly have long been used as tools to spur political reform in our country. In December of 1961, a few years before President Lyndon B. Johnson signed the 1964 Civil Rights Act, Reverend Elton Cox led approximately 2000 African-American students in a civil rights march in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, to protest the recent arrest of students picketing racially segregated establishments. It began at the old State Capitol building and was to proceed to the courthouse where the picketers were being held.

Cox refused to disband the group when contacted by authorities. Near the courthouse, Cox explained the march to the police chief, who gave directions to stay on the sidewalk across the street and to refrain from interfering with traffic. The marchers followed the instructions. When Cox encouraged marchers to demand service at segregated diners, there was muttering and grumbling from a group of several hundred white onlookers. The local sheriff then stated that the protestors were now violating the law and ordered them to disband. Police began grabbing some students. Within moments, the police used tear gas on the demonstrators.

The next day, the police arrested Cox for disturbing the peace and for obstructing public passages (the sidewalk across the street from the courthouse) and other offenses. Cox was convicted. The Louisiana Supreme Court upheld his convictions. The Supreme Court granted certiorari to determine whether these convictions infringed on Cox's First Amendment rights to freedom of speech and assembly.

The Supreme Court reversed the convictions. The conduct of the marchers, which included singing, clapping, and cheering, did not exceed the sort of activities expected at a peaceful assembly and did not establish a breach of the peace. The Supreme Court cited cases like Edwards v. South Carolina, which protected similar First Amendment conduct and held that the breach of the peace statute, as interpreted by the Louisiana Supreme Court, was unconstitutionally overbroad. As for the argument that encouraging demonstrators to demand service at segregated lunch counters could result in violence, the Court noted that the free speech and free assembly rights could not be denied based on hostility to the assertion or exercise of such rights. The Supreme Court explained that the function of free speech is to invite dissent, induce unrest, or stir people to anger.

When considering the statute that prohibited the obstruction of public passages, the Supreme Court distinguished between communicating ideas through conduct from communicating ideas through "pure speech" and rejected the claim that communicative conduct was afforded the same protections as pure speech. Although Cox's conduct violated the statute, the statute violated the First Amendment, because it granted local authorities unfettered discretion to restrict speech and assembly by deciding which views would be permitted. The Supreme Court overturned this conviction as well. Cox v. Louisiana was one of several important cases for the Civil Rights movement. It also helped protect the rights of freedom of speech and assembly from impermissible restrictions by local authorities exercising unfettered statutory discretion.

VINCENT L. RABAGO

References and Further Reading

- Kalven, Harry, The Concept of the Public Forum: Cox v. Louisiana, SUP. CT. REV. 1 (1965)

Police Dep't v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 96, 99 & n.6 (1972) (speech in public forums).

Tribe, Laurence. American Constitutional Law, § 12-24, at 986, 2d ed., Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963)
Civil Rights Act of 1964

See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Civil Rights Laws and Freedom of Speech; Demonstrations and Sit-ins; First Amendment and PACs; Speech Tests; Freedom of Assembly; Freedom of Assembly Infringed; Freedom of Speech and Public Property; Incitement to Violence and Free Speech; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Public Forum Doctrines

COX v. NEW HAMPSHIRE, 312 U.S. 569 (1941)

A group of Jehovah's Witnesses was convicted in New Hampshire of violating a state statute that prohibited public processions without a permit. The religious group had staged an unauthorized march in downtown Manchester to advertise their religious and political beliefs. After their arrest, the group sued the state for violating their Fourteenth Amendment rights to freedom of speech, press, worship, and assembly. The Supreme Court unanimously rejected their claims, arguing that the licensing laws served a limited and practical purpose of promoting social order and did not violate their civil liberties. The courts emphasized that the marchers were convicted for breaking the licensing statute, not for distributing information, holding public meetings, or expressing religious beliefs. Moreover, the group could have advertised its beliefs without breaking the law by getting a permit for an organized march. Also, there was no indication that the licensing laws were applied in a discriminatory manner to censor the Jehovah's Witnesses or any other group, so the constitutional challenge was inapplicable. The Court shows here that the expression of civil liberties can be reasonably restrained, through the government's traditional regulation of the use of streets, in the interest of social order. The case is one of many cases where the Court has held that nondiscriminatory restrictions on time, place, and manner of speech are reasonable for a public forum. The case is distinguished from those in which the challenged laws explicitly or more severely restrict freedom of speech and assembly, where such laws have been declared unconstitutional.

DAVID D. BURNETT

References and Further Reading

Baker, C. E., Unreasoned Reasonableness: Mandatory Parade Permits and Time, Place, and Manner Regulations, Northwestern Law Review 78 (1983): 937-1024.

Goldberger, D., A Reconsideration of Cox v. New Hampshire: Can Demonstrators Be Required to Pay the Costs of Using America's Public Forums? Texas Law Review 62 (1983): 403-451.

Paying for Free Speech: The Continuing Validity of Cox v. New Hampshire, Washington University Law Quarterly 64 (1986): 985-995.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941); Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444 (1938)

See also Accommodation of Religion; Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Fourteenth Amendment; Freedom of Speech and Press; Nineteenth Century; Jehovah's Witnesses and Religious Liberty; Private Religious Speech on Public Property; Religion in "Public Square" Debate; Religious Symbols on Public Property; Zoning and Religious Entities; Zoning Laws and Freedom of Speech

COY v. IOWA, 487 U.S. 1012 (1988)

An individual charged with sexually assaulting two young girls was convicted after a jury trial in which a screen placed between him and the girls blocked him from their sight when they testified. In authorizing use of the screen, the trial judge relied on a state statute intended to make child-victims feel less uneasy in giving their testimony.

In Coy v. Iowa, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Sixth Amendment right of a criminal defendant "to be confronted with the witnesses against him" guarantees a face-to-face encounter between a witness and the accused. It reasoned that such an encounter is essential to fairness and to the perception of fairness, in part, because "[i]t is always more difficult to tell a lie about a person 'to his face' than 'behind his back.'" The Court also held that the screen violated the accused's confrontation right. Without deciding whether any exceptions exist to the requirement of a face-to-face encounter, it concluded that, because the trial judge did not find that the complaining witnesses needed special protection, use of the screen in this case could not fit within any conceivable exception. Two Justices who concurred in the six-member majority opinion, however, believed that the right to a face-to-face encounter is “not absolute” and that use of certain procedural devices designed to protect a child witness from the trauma of testifying in court may sometimes be permissible—a view the Court subsequently adopted in Maryland v. Craig.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- Brustein, Sharon Parker, Coy v. Iowa: Should Children Be Heard and Not Seen? University of Pittsburgh Law Review 50 (1989): 4:1187–1208.
- Hasselbach, W. Andrew, Placing a Child Victim of Sexual Abuse Behind a Screen During Courtroom Testimony as Violation of Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause: Coy v. Iowa, University of Cincinnati Law Review 57 (1989): 4:1537–1566.
- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure, 1110–1111, 4th ed., St. Paul: Thompson-West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990)

See also Confrontation Clause; Incorporation Doctrine; Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990)

CRANE v. JOHNSON, 242 U.S. 339 (1917)

This case stems from a statute California enacted to regulate the field of medicine. The statute created a board of medical examiners to prescribe a specific course of study, administer an examination, and issue licenses for those practicing medicine. The statute defined “medicine” broadly to encompass traditional medicine, such as surgery and prescription drugs, and nontraditional medicine, such as chiropractics and faith-based healing. Drugless practitioners who healed with prayer were exempt from the statutory requirements, whereas other nontraditional practitioners were not.

For the past seven years, the plaintiff in this case practiced nontraditional, faith-based medicine in Los Angeles, California. His practice used faith, hope, mental suggestion, and mental adaptation. The plaintiff challenged the enforcement of the statute against him on the basis of its distinction between drugless practitioners and prayer healers. He claimed that the state was incompetent to make such a distinction. He also alleged that the statute violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, because the classification among drugless practitioners did not relate to a legitimate purpose.

The Court held that the statute was enforceable. The distinction between drugless practitioners and prayer practitioners was rooted in a legitimate basis and was therefore not arbitrary. According to the Court, the basis of the state’s distinction came from the fact that the state considered the plaintiff’s medical practice to be that of drugless medicine. His medical practice required skills that could be enhanced through practice and specialized knowledge. Alternately, the Court considered the practice of prayer-based medicine to be akin to the practice of religion, an area that could not be constitutionally regulated by the state.

The precedent established in this case has since permeated the regulation of alternative medicine throughout the country. States are now creating more stringent standards for nontraditional medical practitioners. They are mandating these practitioners to attain state certifications prior to claiming to practice medicine, and they are becoming stricter in their enforcement of noncompliance with these statutory requirements.

ALISON P. RIVCHUN

References and Further Reading

- Cohen, Michael H., Healing at the Borderland of Medicine and Religion: Regulating Potential Abuse of Authority by Spiritual Healers, Journal of Law and Religion 18 (2002–2003): 373–426.
- Kallmyer, J. Brad, A Chimera In Every Sense: Standard of Care for Physicians Practicing Complementary and Alternative Medicine, Indiana Health Law Review 2 (2005): 225–265.
- Noah, Lars, Ambivalent Commitments to Federalism in Controlling the Practice of Medicine, Kansas Law Review 53 (2004): 149–193.
- Silverman, Ross D., Regulating Medical Practice in the Cyber Age: Issues and Challenges for State Medical Boards, American Journal of Law and Medicine 26 (2000): 255–276.
- Smalley, Ruth Ellen, Will a Lawsuit a Day Keep the Cyberdocs Away? Modern Theories of Malpractice as Applied to Cybermedicine, Richmond Journal of Law and Technology 7 (Winter 2001): 29–56.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Truax v. Raich*, 239 US 33 (1915)
- West’s Ann. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 2100

CRANE v. KENTUCKY, 476 U.S. 683 (1986)

In Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986) the Supreme Court held that the defendant’s Fourteenth and Sixth Amendment rights to a fair trial were violated when the trial judge excluded testimony regarding the physical and psychological circumstances of a confession, based on the fact that a pretrial hearing had already been held on the issue of voluntariness of the confession.

Crane, at the age of sixteen, was questioned about the murder of a convenience store clerk and began voluntarily confessing to numerous past crimes and, after being moved to a formal interrogation facility, eventually confessed to the murder in question. The police had no physical evidence against Crane, only the confession. Crane sought to suppress his confession at trial, but the judge ruled the voluntariness issue had been addressed and could not be relitigated before a jury.

The Supreme Court had previously held in Sims v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 538 and Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, that the circumstances surrounding the taking of a confession are “relevant to two separate inquiries, one legal and one factual.” How a confession is derived, such as the issue of voluntariness, is a matter of legality and was appropriately addressed during the pretrial hearing. In Crane, the Supreme Court held that the issue of the physical and psychological circumstances under which a confession was derived is relevant to the factual issue of innocence or guilt and must be allowed as a defense at trial in the presence of a jury.

JEANNINE M. EIBAND

Cases and Statutes Cited

Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368

Sims v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 538

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Defense, Right to Present

CREATIONISM AND INTELLIGENT DESIGN

Background

Writing in the 1830s, Alexis de Tocqueville identified the place of religion in society as one of the major differences between the United States and Europe. The continuing truth of this observation can be seen in the prevalence of belief in creationism: Americans are more skeptical about evolutionary thinking than any other developed nation. Survey data consistently report that approximately forty-five percent of Americans believe in the literal truth of Genesis and approximately forty percent believe that God guides evolutionary developments. These proportions have, if anything, tended to rise in recent years. Only approximately ten percent accept the Darwinian orthodoxy of natural selection as a result of random mutations that generate reproductive advantage. The proportions in Europe are almost exactly reversed, with subscribers to the Genesis story being virtually undetectable in most national surveys. Even religiously conservative countries like Poland show majority acceptance of the Darwinian account, not least because this has been the official position of the Roman Catholic church since the issue of the encyclical, Humani Generis, in 1950.

It is, then, hardly surprising that the teaching of science in high schools has become a major source of social conflict in the United States almost from the point at which evolution ceased to be a topic confined largely to specialists and was established as a central theme of modern biology. The belated synthesis of Darwin's theories of how a process of natural selection might work and of Mendel's observations on the inheritance of specific characteristics within species, during the first decade of the twentieth century, entered high school curriculum after World War I and almost immediately came into collision with the faith beliefs of large numbers of ordinary Americans, particularly, but not exclusively, in the South and Midwest. In contrast to Europe, the public provision of education is a highly devolved matter in the United States, with relatively little federal involvement and even states having limited central authority over local school boards. At the same time, the First Amendment erects a strong barrier to any arm of the American state acting in any way that may seem to endorse any religious belief or, indeed, belief in preference to nonbelief. This immediately creates a tension between the desire of local communities to prescribe a public school curriculum that reflects their faith beliefs and the Constitutional objection to the promotion of religion by public bodies.

Early Challenges

The publication of high school biology textbooks, from 1919 onwards, that included coverage of evolution provoked a backlash from fundamentalist religious leaders, including campaigns for state legislation to ban the teaching of this subject. Tennessee was the first state to legislate, in 1925, but community leaders in Rhea County linked up with the ACLU to fight a test case against this law. Local science teacher John Scopes volunteered to be prosecuted. Although the evolutionists are usually thought to have won a moral victory in the “Scopes Trial” (Tennessee v. Scopes, 1925), the defendant was convicted and fined. The State Supreme Court reversed the verdict on technical grounds but recommended that the state attorney general should not pursue the matter further. The Tennessee statute was not repealed until 1967. In the absence of a Constitutional test, similar laws were passed in Mississippi (1926) and Arkansas (1928), and publishers voluntarily omitted the topic of evolution from most 1930s high school biology textbooks. Each state and community reached its own accommodation between biblical literalism and evolutionary thought until the perceived challenge of Soviet technology in the late 1950s provoked national elites to press for the modernization of science education, overriding local objections as their counterparts in Europe had long since done.

This generated the First Amendment challenge, which Scopes had failed to accomplish, to the 1928 Arkansas statute. On the recommendation of its biology teachers, the Little Rock School Board adopted a high school textbook for the 1965–1966 session that included a chapter on evolution. One teacher, Susan Epperson, asked the courts to declare that the statute was invalid and that she would not be committing a criminal offense by teaching from the prescribed text. Although her claim was initially upheld, on a combination of Fourteenth and First Amendment grounds, as a violation of her rights to freedom of speech, it was overturned on appeal. The State Supreme Court held that the 1928 act was a valid direction by the state government about the actions of its employees in their official capacity. The case was further appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, in Epperson v Arkansas (1968), which found for Epperson. There is a certain mythology about this: Mr Justice Fortas took a strong First Amendment approach, whereas his colleagues simply thought that the state law was too vague to be constitutional on Fourteenth Amendment grounds. In the longer term, however, Fortas's analysis has prevailed.

In effect, Fortas anticipated the Lemon analysis of the First Amendment, formulated three years later, which set a three-part test for the constitutionality of statutes bearing on religious issues: they must have a secular purpose; their principal effect must neither advance nor inhibit religion; they must not foster "an excessive government entanglement with religion." In looking to the "secular purpose" element, the Supreme Court has not confined itself to looking exclusively at evidence of legislators' intent but also at the activities of groups lobbying in support of statutes.

The Supreme Court decision in Epperson blocked the possibility of legally prohibiting the teaching of evolution in public schools. However, this remained as offensive as ever to large and influential faith communities, who sought to dilute its impact by two new strategies. One was to require classroom teachers to give "equal treatment" to Biblical and Darwinian accounts of the origin and development of species. Creationism was relabelled as "creation science" and presented as an alternative scientific account. The other was to require that students be cautioned about the status of the Darwinian account, either by having teachers read a prescribed statement or by placing stickers on biology textbooks warning that elements of the content were controversial.

The first of these was evaluated by the Supreme Court in Edwards v Aguillard (1987). With Justice Scalia dissenting, the Court held that the statute's stated secular purpose, of protecting the rights of teachers to talk about creationism, was a sham: the legislature's disavowal of religious purpose was undermined by the evidence of active lobbying by faith groups. However, the most important element of the decision was its declaration that creationism—or creation science—was inherently religious in its nature. It could not be subject to normal academic tests of its validity, it was historically permeated by religious entanglements, and, at its heart, it requires belief in a supreme being as creator. Any doctrine that requires a prior faith belief is inherently religious, whether or not the word "God" is actually spoken in the classroom and cannot be promoted in the public school curriculum.

The Supreme Court has not ruled directly on the issue of stickers or disclaimers, although three justices (Scalia, Rehnquist, and Thomas) indicated their willingness to hear the issue when an application for certiorari was refused in Freiler v Tangipahoa (1999).

The Tangipahoa Parish Board of Education in Louisiana had adopted a resolution in 1994 disavowing evolution and requiring teachers to read a disclaimer. A group of parents appealed against this to the district court, which found in their favor, a decision affirmed by the Fifth Circuit, following Lemon and, ultimately, Epperson. The sticker issue has not been definitively adjudicated, although a case arising from a sticker introduced in 2002 by the School Board in Cobb County, Georgia, was still before the federal courts in 2005. This does, however, seem likely to face the same hurdles unless a change in the balance of the Supreme Court leads to a fundamental restatement of the established interpretation of the First Amendment.

Intelligent Design Creationism

After Epperson and Edwards, it became clear that creationists would need a new strategy if they were to be able to sustain their challenge to the entrenchment of scientific materialism in public school curricula. Intelligent Design Creationism (IDC) is the result. Its promoters seem to have observed that two propositions associated with the post-Epperson developments in creation science, namely that competing views on any issue deserve equal treatment and that free speech by those who disagree with orthodoxies, should be protected and are capable of generating widespread support beyond fundamentalists because of their resonance with general American values. Provided that the explicitly religious elements of creationism could be eliminated, accounts of the origin and development of species that imply the intervention of a creator might be introduced into the high school curriculum with a sufficient measure of support from nonbelievers to render First Amendment challenges more difficult to sustain. IDC is the result.

IDC abandons the Biblical literalism of previous generations in favor of an approach first formulated by the Reverend William Paley (1743–1805), an important eighteenth century theologian and philosopher. Paley's Natural Theology (published 1802) was the dominant intellectual statement against which Darwin's generation reacted. Paley argued that, were we to find a watch lying on the ground, we would necessarily infer that its parts had been framed and put together for a purpose. This evidence of design would, in turn, imply the existence of a designer. In a similar way, Paley argues that the intricacy and complexity of the universe, as exemplified in structures like the human eye, implies the existence of a Design and a Designer. Although contemporaries like David Hume (1711–1776), in his discussion of miracles, attacked this line of argument, it remained influential well into the nineteenth century, and elements can still be seen in the mainstream Christian acceptance of "theistic evolution." However, whereas IDC stresses the constant engagement of the Designer, theistic evolutionists like the Reverend John Polkinghorne (b.1930), a former professor of mathematical physics at Cambridge and an influential theologian, tend to think more in terms of a Cosmic Planner, who may have supplied the raw material of the universe and its basic physical laws but who now, at most, supplies an occasional nudge to the system, deep in the uncertainties of the quantum world.

IDC is the core of what its advocates describe as the "Wedge Strategy" devised during the 1990s by a group of writers associated with the Discovery Institute's Center for Science and Culture in Seattle. Whereas all modern science rests broadly on the principle of naturalism—that events can only be explained by natural and hence observable causes—the Wedge movement seeks to insert a space for "supernaturalism."

that some, if not all, events in the world have a supernatural cause that is inaccessible to observation and objective verification. IDC, however, seeks to avoid specifying the source of that supernatural cause to evade the First Amendment proscriptions. In theory, the Designer could be an alien being from another galaxy or a time-traveling cell biologist. In practice, though, IDC advocates identify the Designer with the Christian God. Nevertheless, IDC is set out as an alternative scientific program with its own alternative school texts like Pandas and People (1989).

By redefining science in a way that leaves space for the supernatural and by suppressing the explicitly religious elements of the argument from design, IDC advocates hoped to take their approach outside the scope of Epperson and Edwards, relying on commonly held notions of "fair play" to mobilize support for their attempt to drive their wedge into the high school curriculum.

This strategy was tested and found wanting by the district court in Pennsylvania in the fall of 2005. On October 18, 2004, the Dover Area School Board resolved that high school students should be made aware of problems with Darwin's theory of evolution and of the possibility for other theories "including but not limited to intelligent design." The Board determined that, from January 2005, teachers would be required to read a disclaimer that asserted compliance with state policy on the science curriculum, and the standardized tests through which this would be assessed, but drew attention to the alternative offered by IDC and referred students to the Pandas and People text. A group of parents, teachers, and former School Board members brought an action, Kitzmiller v. Dover Area School District, seeking to have this declared unconstitutional. After a six-week trial, the judge, known as something of a conservative, handed down a lengthy and stinging judgment declaring the Board's actions to be in breach of the First Amendment and severely censuring the conduct of a number of Board members, officers, and their advisers. The judge closely follows precedent to determine whether the Board's actions would constitute a message of official "endorsement or disapproval" of religion to an objective student or adult in the school district.

In summary, the judge holds that an objective observer would know that IDC and references to "gaps" or "problems" in evolutionary theory are creationist strategies for weakening education about evolution. He outlined a wealth of statements by leading IDC advocates asserting the identification of the Designer with the Christian God. The supernatural elements of IDC make it inherently religious. The judge goes on to discuss whether students would see the disclaimer as an official endorsement of religion. He holds that the phrasing, effectively saying “the State of Pennsylvania requires us to teach you evolution but we don’t really believe it and think you should study this inherently religious account instead,” constitute a message of religious endorsement comparable to that struck down in Freiler. Turning to the understanding of the Board’s action in the wider community, he notes the evidence of newsletters and public meetings that present IDC in religious terms and from correspondence and articles in the local press that show it was perceived as such by local residents. Again, he holds that there has been a clear endorsement of religion by a public body. This leads to an unequivocal finding against the School Board on First Amendment grounds, coupled with strong criticism of the conduct of members in office and of their behavior, including frequent evasion and outright lying, in court.

However, the judge also discusses a number of the other issues raised in the case, in the hope, he declares, of avoiding “the obvious waste of judicial and other resources” that would be incurred in further trials. In particular, he directly evaluates the question of whether IDC is science, as distinct from his evaluation of whether it is an expression of religious belief. This has a wider importance, because an alternative IDC strategy has been to seek to have school boards or other public bodies redefine what counts as science to encompass IDC. The State Board of Education in Kansas, for example, has been in turmoil over this issue since 1999. In Kitzmiller, the judge finds that IDC fails the test on three grounds: that it invokes and permits supernatural causation; that its argument of “irreducible complexity,” that some biological phenomena are too complex to have arisen by the chance processes of evolution, is flawed and illogical; and that its negative attacks on evolution have been successfully refuted. Its only textbook contains outdated concepts and badly flawed science. IDC is, in the end, a theological position, which has no place in a science curriculum.

Kitzmiller is, of course, at best a limited precedent in one federal district. The judgment is unlikely to be reviewed by higher courts, since control of the Dover School Board changed in November 2005 elections, just as the trial was ending. However, it is hard to see how the judge’s analysis can be faulted or how First Amendment obstacles to IDC can be overcome, unless there is a major reassessment of Lemon by the Supreme Court. Evolution’s place in lawful high school science curricula would seem to be secure from challenge unless IDC supporters can produce convincing empirical evidence to support their claims to have presented an alternative.

One last argument, which was not discussed in Kitzmiller, may be worth mentioning, namely, whether a requirement to teach evolution in high schools violates teachers’ free speech rights under the First Amendment. There are a number of cases on this that make it clear that the rights of teachers are abridged during the school day, whether they are actually teaching or not. In the course of their employment, teachers’ speech is official speech on behalf of their employers and subject to whatever restrictions apply to those employers. As public employees, then, teachers cannot lawfully speak in ways that violate the Lemon test by appearing to endorse or promote religious belief or nonbelief. This prohibition can extend into their private time if there is a danger that they might be identified as representatives of that public body. For example, a teacher may not organize, out of school hours, a religious society meeting in premises rented from their own school but can do this on the premises of another school where there is no risk of confusion about their status as a private individual. A requirement to teach evolution as part of a standard science curriculum is a lawful exercise of the employer’s rights, and termination of a contract for teaching any version of creationism in science curriculum time is a lawful exercise of the employer’s responsibility not to breach their First Amendment obligations. This does not, of course, prevent the examination of IDC within a religious studies curriculum, any more than it prevents examining the Book of Genesis as part of a comparative study of the creation myths told by various faith communities.

Conclusion

Given the financial resources available to the conservative Christian interests that have sustained creationism in various guises for almost a century, and the evidence of the scale of creationist belief in the contemporary United States, it is unlikely that the legal setback in Dover will end the confrontation between some forms of religious belief and the scientific community in the American courts. However, it does seem that a more ingenious intellectual strategy than IDC will need to be devised to overcome the established interpretation of the First Amendment, unless this is revised by the Supreme Court.

ROBERT DINGWALL

References and Further Reading

Brauer, Matthew J., Barbara Forrest, and Steven G. Gey, Is it Science yet? Intelligent Design Creationism and the

- Constitution*, Washington University Law Quarterly 83 (2005): 1:1–149.
- Coleman, Simon, and Leslie Carlin, eds. The Cultures of Creationism: Anti-Evolutionism in English-Speaking Countries Aldershot: Ashgate.
- Manson, Neil A., ed. God and Design: The Teleological Argument and Modern Science, London: Routledge, 2003.
- Pennock, Robert T., ed., Intelligent Design Creationism and Its Critics: Philosophical, Theological and Scientific Perspectives, Cambridge, MA, MIT Press, 2001.
- Reule, Deborah A., The New Face of Creationism: The Establishment Clause and the Latest Efforts to Suppress Evolution in Public Schools, Vanderbilt Law Review 54, (2001): 2555–2610.
- Russo, Charles J., Evolution v Creation Science in the US: Can the Courts Divine a Solution? Education Law Journal 3, September (2002): 152.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Edwards v Aguillard*, 482 U.S. 578 (1987)
- Epperson v. Arkansas*, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
- Freiler v Tangipahoa Parish Bd. of Educ.*, 385 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 1999)
- Kitzmiller et al. v Dover Area School District et al.* (2005) (accessed at <http://www.aclupa.org/downloads/Dec200-opinion.pdf>)
- Lemon v Kurtzman* 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- State of Tennessee v John Thomas Scopes* (1925) (accessed at <http://www.law.umkc.edu/faculty/projects/ftrials/scopes/scopes.htm>)
- John Thomas Scopes v. The State of Tennessee*, 154 Tenn. (1 Smith) 105 (1927), 289 S.W. 363
- Tangipahoa Parish Bd. of Educ. v. Freiler*, 530 U.S. 1251 (2000)
- See also Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987); Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968); Fortas, Abe; Fourteenth Amendment; Lemon Test; Rehnquist, William H.; Scalia, Antonin; Thomas, Clarence

CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY

Conspiracy is a crime that requires (1) an intent to commit a crime, (2) an agreement between two or more persons to commit that crime, and (3) an overt act by one of them in furtherance of the agreement. For example, conspiracy is met when three persons agree to commit a bank robbery and one of the persons gets the bank's blue prints to plan the robbery.

One purpose for the crime of conspiracy is that it allows police to intervene before the crime that is the object of the conspiracy occurs. In our example, police can intervene and arrest the defendant for conspiracy without waiting for the bank robbery. Here conspiracy allows official intervention before the commission of the (harmful) substantive crime that is the goal of the conspiracy.

Now assume that our conspirators go ahead and commit the bank robbery. In some jurisdictions, the defendants can still be charged with conspiracy. In this situation the crime is justified because collective action presents a greater risk to society than individual action and so warrants additional punishment. Collective action is more dangerous because it makes success of the crime more likely.

Prosecutors like to charge conspiracy because it gives them several advantages. Recognizing this, in 1925 in Harrison v. U.S., Judge Learned Hand famously called conspiracy “that darling of the modern prosecutor's nursery.” Because of these advantages and some vagueness in the definition of the crime, it is controversial.

SARAH N. WELLING

References and Further Reading

- Brickey, Kathleen F. Corporate Criminal Liability: A Treatise on the Criminal Liability of Corporations, Their Officers, and Agents §§ 6:01–6:28 (2d ed. 1992).
- Johnson, Phillip, The Unnecessary Crime of Conspiracy, Cal. L. Rev. 61 (1973): 1137.
- LaFave, Wayne R. Criminal Law §§ 12.1–12.4, 4th ed., 2003.
- Marcus, Paul, Conspiracy: The Criminal Agreement in Theory and in Practice, Geo. L. J. 65 (1977): 925.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Harrison v. United States*, 7 F.2d 259, 263 (2d Cir. 1925)
- See also Chicago Seven Trial

CRIMINAL LAW/CIVIL LIBERTIES AND NONCITIZENS IN THE UNITED STATES

The Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution ensure that defendants enjoy traditional due process rights in all domestic criminal law proceedings. Like their U.S. citizen counterparts, noncitizens are afforded basic rights to notice of the charges filed, to a lawyer to represent them, and to a speedy and public trial. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, has simultaneously recognized limits on certain noncitizens' ability to invoke the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable governmental searches and seizures. Designed to deter unlawful governmental conduct, the Fourth Amendment ensures that law enforcement conduct proper investigations of alleged criminal conduct, otherwise risking that the evidence they obtain may be thrown out of court or that they may be subject to civil suit. That the Fourth Amendment's scope may be limited when the suspect in a criminal investigation is a noncitizen raises concerns especially when certain immigration law violations trigger criminal sanctions—for instance, in cases of reentering the United States surreptitiously or smuggling noncitizens across the border.

Three limits on the Fourth Amendment's applicability to noncitizens are worth noting. First, the government is permitted a wide berth in conducting investigative stops during roving patrols of the U.S. interior adjacent to the border in its search for undocumented migrants. While the Supreme Court held unconstitutional a roving patrol investigative stop made without either a warrant or probable cause in Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, two years later in United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, the Court held that during such operations, agents did not have to comply with the regular "probable cause" standard to justify an immigration stop leading to the discovery of an undocumented person; satisfying "reasonable suspicion" is sufficient and that may be based on a variety of factors including a suspect's apparent Mexican ancestry.

Second, the government is held to a higher "probable cause" Fourth Amendment standard when it conducts searches at fixed immigration checkpoints than when it engages in roving border patrols; it need not, however, comply with this higher standard when simply stopping vehicles and questioning their occupants. In United States v. Ortiz, the Court held that government officers must have probable cause before they may search private vehicles at fixed checkpoints removed from the border. In United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, however, the Court allowed the government to stop vehicles to question their occupants about their immigration status at fixed checkpoints, reasoning that this was less of an intrusion than a full search.

Finally, when the government obtains evidence from abroad pursuant to an illegal search, it may use that evidence at the stateside criminal trial of a noncitizen defendant. In United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, the Supreme Court refused to bar evidence illegally seized abroad for use in a domestic drug trial of a noncitizen. The Court reasoned that because the noncitizen defendant had insufficient connections with the United States, he was not part of "the People" the Fourth Amendment was intended to protect.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

- Johnson, Kevin R., The Case Against Race Profiling in Immigration Enforcement, Washington University Law Quarterly 78 (2000): 675–736.
- LaFave, Wayne R. et al. Criminal Procedure, Third Edition. St. Paul: West Group, 2000.
- Neuman, Gerald L. Strangers to the Constitution: Immigrants, Borders, and Fundamental Law. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Romero, Victor C., The Domestic Fourth Amendment Rights of Undocumented Immigrants: On Guitterez and the Tort Law-Immigration Law Parallel, Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 35 (2000): 57–101.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Almeida-Sanchez v. United States*, 413 U.S. 266 (1973)
- United States v. Brignoni-Ponce*, 422 U.S. 873 (1975)
- United States v. Ortiz*, 422 U.S. 891 (1975)
- United States v. Martinez-Fuerte*, 428 U.S. 543 (1976)
- United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez*, 494 U.S. 259 (1990)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Race and Criminal Justice

CRIMINAL SYNDICATION ACT

See Anti-Anarchy and Anti-Syndicalism Acts

CRIMINALIZATION OF CIVIL WRONGS

Traditionally there was a clear line between civil and criminal law. The civil law, for example, contracts, property, and torts, sought to balance private rights and to restore wronged parties to their rightful positions. The criminal law, on the other hand, was primarily a way for society in general to express its outrage at harmful conduct: it was a way to enforce deeply held norms. Thus, the traditional so-called common law crimes included homicide, rape, arson, and theft. Thus, the law properly recognizing the difference between bad conduct, for example, breach of contract, and conduct that would be criminal, for example, rape.

While the theories underlying the need for criminal and civil law overlapped somewhat, in practice there were clear legal differences. One, for example, could be held civilly liable for negligent conduct (or for the conduct of subordinates). But to be held criminally liable, one had to act deliberately, recklessly, or wantonly. There were good reasons for the difference. Whereas one held civilly liable would lose money, a person found criminally liable would lose his freedom and civil rights. Colloquially, there is a difference between the shame of being sued and the shame of having a criminal record. Moreover, almost everyone in a civilized society knows that murder is wrong. But civil issues such as whether property has been adversely possessed, or whether a prescriptive easement exists, are usually more complex. The demarcation between civil and criminal misconduct ensured that those who harmed the rights of others would pay for the harm caused but that they would not have the force of the criminal law brought down on them. Today that has changed: the line is blurred.

State and local governments enact myriad and sometimes Byzantine civil regulations covering everything from how a multinational corporation may issue stock to whether a small landowner can build on his property. Unfortunately, from a civil liberties perspective, these regulations increasingly carry with them criminal penalties. As Professor Gainer noted in Federal Criminal Code: Past and Present, there are tens of thousands of pages of regulatory violations that carry with them criminal penalties. Moreover, as an ABA report noted: "So large is the present body of federal criminal law that there is no conveniently accessible, complete list of federal crimes." In other words, the breach of a regulation that one is ignorant of can carry with it criminal penalties. Worse, if one wanted to ensure he did not violate any criminal laws, he or she wouldn't be able to reference a list.

Still worse is that the Environmental Protection Agency doesn't adequately understand what regulatory violations carry with them criminal penalties. The line between criminal and civil wrongs moves each time a new director of the EPA is appointed.

James DeLong best summed up the problem in Go Directly to Jail: The Criminalization of Almost Everything: "The criminalization of highly complex and often conflicting [civil] regulations with virtually no requirement of intent" means that "even the well educated and well informed cannot be sure what the law is and what they must do to comply with it."

MICHAEL C. CERNOVICH

References and Further Reading

- ABA Report. The Report of the ABA Task Force on the Federalization of Criminal Law. Washington: ABA, 1998.
- Baker, John S., Jr. Measuring the Explosive Growth of Federal Crime Legislation. Washington: The Federalist Society for Law and Public Policy, 2004.
- Gainer, Ronald L., Federal Criminal Code: Past and Present, Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 46 (1988): 2.
- Healy, Gene, ed. Go Directly to Jail: The Criminalization of Almost Everything. Washington: Cato, 2004.
- Lynch, Timothy. Polluting Our Principles, Cato Institute Policy Analysis No. 223 (April 10, 1995).
- Meese, Edwin III, Big Brother on the Beat: The Expanding Federalization of Crime, Texas Review of Law and Politics 1 (Spring 1997): 1.

See also Federalization of Criminal Law

CROMWELL, OLIVER (1599–1658)

Oliver Cromwell, soldier and statesman, Lord Protector of England in the 1650s, was born in 1599, into a lower middle class family. For the first forty years of his life he was a farmer (1599–1640), followed by twelve years as a member of Parliament and a senior military officer (1640–1652), and then five years as Lord Protector of England (1653–1658).

Cromwell believed in Providence and the role of God in bringing about a holy Commonwealth. As God's instrument to lead his people, his providentialism led him to reject forms of church government, institutions, and rituals. His religion was biblical and Christocentric. He supported unity among various religious groups of the godly nation and hoped that it would lead to increased liberty of conscience. His hope for toleration for various denominations did not succeed because of controversies among the various protestant sects, whereas his later parliaments also refused to provide for full liberty of conscience. John Morrill concludes that "Cromwell's achievements as a soldier are great but unfashionable; as religious libertarian great but easily mis-stated; as a statesman inevitably stunted." (Morrill, "Cromwell, Oliver." Oxford DNB, p. 352).

His support for religious liberty did not extend after his death, for more than a generation the Church of England reestablished itself in England until 1689, when a Toleration Act, rather than comprehension, passed Parliament and created an "established" rather than a "national" state church and gave dissenters, under some state restrictions, the ability to practice their religion.

JOEL FISHMAN

References and Further Reading

- Cromwell, Oliver. The Writings and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell. With an Introduction, Notes and a Sketch of his Life by Wilbur Cortez Abbott, with the assistance of Catherine D. Crane. Published: Cambridge, Harvard Univ. Press, 1937–1947. 4 v.
- Morrill, John. "Cromwell, Oliver." Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Vol. 14. 328–353. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- , ed. Oliver Cromwell and the English Revolution. London: Longman, 1990.
- Roots, Ivan, ed. Cromwell, A Profile. New York, Hill and Wang, 1973.

CROSS BURNING

Perhaps no symbol in American history carries with it the strong sense of infamy and controversy as the burning cross. Justice Thomas, dissenting in a 2003 U.S. Supreme Court opinion, penned, "Cross burning has almost invariably meant lawlessness and understandably instills in its victims well-grounded fear of physical violence." Whether or not a burning cross conveys a message seems settled, especially against the backdrop of the Ku Klux Klan and the African-American struggle during Reconstruction and the Civil Rights Movement.

What has been, and continues to be, debated is whether a state should be free to proscribe and criminalize the act of burning a cross?

The U.S. Supreme Court's 2003 ruling in Virginia v. Black provides an exhaustive overview of both the expressive elements of burning a cross and the constitutional constraints that exist that limit the manner in which a state can criminalize the act of burning a cross.

In Virginia v. Black, the U.S. Supreme Court held that Virginia could criminalize the burning of a cross provided that it was done "with the intent of intimidating any person or group or persons." The Court found that cross burning was a particularly virulent type of intimidation. The Court relied on previous First Amendment precedent and exceptions related to "true threats" and "fighting words" that may be regulated in a manner consistent with the Constitution.

Although the Court held that the act of burning a cross for the purposes of intimidation could be criminalized without offending the First Amendment of the Constitution (made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment), the Court further held that there are instances where crosses are burned without any intention to intimidate. For example, Justice White, concurring in R.A.V. v. St. Paul, (1992) stated, "[b]urning a cross at a politically rally would almost certainly be protected expression."

Whenever expressive conduct such as a burning cross is intertwined with such strong historical underpinnings, a short review of the symbol's place in American culture becomes relevant.

Cross burning was used as early as the fourteenth century as a means for Scottish tribes to signal one another. Sir Walter Scott used the burning cross to symbolize both a summons and a call to arms. The integration of the burning cross into American subculture began in the spring of 1866 in Pulaski, Tennessee. The Ku Klux Klan (hereinafter "Klan"), an organization that originated as a social club, transformed into a group that resisted Reconstruction efforts and fought to exclude freed blacks from the political process. The Klan's victims included not only African Americans but also northern whites known as "carpetbaggers" and southern whites who disagreed with the Klan's policies or methods. Justice Thomas, concurring in Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette (1995), reminded us that the Klan not only disfavored individuals on racial and geographical bounds but also on religious and political grounds, hating Jews, Catholics, and Communists alongside "Yankees" and blacks. The Klan, which had generally died out in the late 1870s, was "reborn" around 1915. The "second" Klan's first initiation ceremony, on Stone Mountain, Georgia (near Atlanta), used a 40-foot burning cross.

Throughout the life of the "second" Klan, cross burnings were used as a tool to intimidate and threaten imminent violence against individuals and groups the Klan disfavored. The burning cross was not only an outward symbol to send a message to others but also served as a symbol to identify and express shared ideology and purpose among Klan members.

The Commonwealth of Virginia, in its Petitioner's Brief in the Virginia v. Black case, summed up the common perception of cross burning's expressive effect: "A white, conservative, middle-class Protestant, waking up at night to find a burning cross outside his home will reasonably understand that someone is threatening him. His reaction is likely to be very different than if he were to find, say, a burning circle or square. In the latter case, he may call the fire department. In the former, he will probably call the police."

MARC M. HARROLD

References and Further Reading

- Brannon, Chris L., Note, Constitutional Law—Hate Speech—First Amendment Permits Ban on Cross Burning When Done with the Intent to Intimidate, Miss. L. J. 73 (Fall 2003): 323.
- Gey, Steven G., A Few Questions About Cross Burning, Intimidation, and Free Speech, Notre Dame L. Rev. 80 (2005): 1287.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Virginia v. Black*, 538 U.S. 343 (2002)
- Capitol Square Review and Advisory Bd v. Pinette*, 515 U.S. 753 (1995)
- R.A.V. v. St. Paul*, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT (VIII)

The Eighth Amendment forbids the infliction of cruel and unusual punishments. This constitutional prohibition is itself unusual, because in using the intrinsically subjective terms "cruel" and "unusual," it necessarily calls for the use of judgment. Determining the meaning of the Eighth Amendment, then, first requires ascertaining on whose judgment the clause hinges.

The judgment as to what is cruel and unusual, and therefore what is unconstitutional, cannot be that of Congress or the president, because the Bill of Rights was enacted to curtail the power of the federal government. The Eighth Amendment, like most of the Bill of Rights, applies to state governments through the incorporation doctrine, and as such, it cannot be left to the judgment of the states to determine the contours of the cruel and unusual punishment clause. The Constitution is also meant to protect vulnerable minorities from the tyranny of majority whim; such protection would be meaningless if the interpretation of what is cruel and unusual was determined by the views of a majority of the people. Since Marbury v. Madison, it has been the recognized province of the federal judiciary to interpret the Constitution; however, the Supreme Court has repeatedly stated that the cruel and unusual punishment clause cannot merely reflect the subjective views of what the Supreme Court Justices find repugnant.

The paradox of whose view of acceptable punishments should shape the cruel and unusual punishment clause has been resolved by adopting an ad hoc collection of doctrines drawing from various sources of authority. Deference is generally given to state governments to define appropriate punishments for given crimes. However, state and federal governments are subject to three core restrictions. First, punishments cannot be arbitrary, capricious, or barbaric. Second, at least in some circumstances, punishments can be overruled for being disproportionate to a defendant's culpability. Third, punishments must not be contrary to a national consensus as to evolving standards of decency. The first two restrictions have largely been developed with reference to judicial views of acceptability of certain punishments: a punishment is overruled if the Justices consider it disproportionate or arbitrary. The third restriction is facilitated by judicial aggregation of state legislation, and to a lesser extent jury determinations: the less often a punishment is available or imposed in a state jurisdiction, the more likely the Supreme Court is to rule that it is contrary to a national consensus and thus unconstitutional.

The foregoing description overstates the clarity of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence. In recent years, some Supreme Court Justices have challenged the appropriateness of a proportionality requirement; in its defense, other Justices have argued that the proportionality requirement and the national consensus test are in fact one doctrine. There is also strong Supreme Court division over the application of the evolving consensus doctrine. It is also unclear whether "cruel" and "unusual" constitute separate prohibitions or whether "cruel and unusual" is one proscription. Each of these ambiguities contributes to an enormous jurisprudential uncertainty surrounding the cruel and unusual punishment clause.

In addition, the death penalty has been treated differently from all other punishments, resulting not just in special rules for capital punishment but a schism in the overall approach of the Supreme Court to capital and noncapital forms of punishment. Arguably, the Supreme Court has largely abdicated its role in determining the bounds of nondeath penalty punishments, while simultaneously adding so many limits to the application of the death penalty as to be gradually rendering it, although constitutional in theory, unconstitutional in practice.

Despite the confusion surrounding Eighth Amendment jurisprudence, it is possible to identify four types of challenge that could be made to the constitutionality of a given criminal sentence. Constitutional challenges can be made as to: first, the type of punishment inflicted; second, the process followed in imposing the punishment; third, the category of crime to which a punishment may attach; and fourth, the categories of defendant against whom a punishment can be imposed. However, because of the "death is different" jurisprudence, the rules of each of these four types of challenge are bifurcated according to whether the punishment is death or some other sentence.

Types of Punishment

Supreme Court precedent as to which types of punishment are constitutional has taken two forms: specific sanctions or prohibitions of particular types of punishment, and general doctrine promulgating guidelines as to when punishments can ever be appropriate.

Of the specific rulings, the most contested concerns the constitutionality of the death penalty. As is discussed in the subsequent subsections, the death penalty has been highly restricted as to when and to whom it can apply, but imposition of the death penalty per se was upheld under the Federal Constitution in Gregg v. Georgia.

Generally, the Supreme Court has refrained from ruling on whether particular forms of capital punishment are unconstitutional. Four types of capital punishment have been sanctioned to the extent that the Supreme Court has refused to prohibit them when the issue came before it. In Wilkinson v. Utah, death by shooting was authorized; in Gomez v. U.S., use of the gas chamber was allowed; in Glass v. Louisiana, use of the electric chair was permitted; and in Campbell v. Wood, death by hanging was tolerated. However, the latter three cases contained only cursory consideration of the type of punishment by the majority, but strong dissents on point.

Historically, a variety of forms of corporal punishment were occasionally used in the colonies, including lashing, branding, and even ear-cropping and tongue-cutting. Various forms of physical humiliation, such as stocks and the Scarlet letter, were more commonly used. Two key cases have held nondeath penalty punishments unconstitutional. Weems v. U.S. held that a lengthy punishment including hard labor in stocks, combined with the loss of basic rights, including over property and voting, was excessive for the crime of falsifying records. Trop v. Dulles held that denationalization for military desertion was cruel and unusual.

The Supreme Court has gone back and forth as to whether these cases constituted a general requirement of proportionality in nondeath penalty sentences. In Rummel v. Estelle, the court considered that there is no proportionality test: the punishment in Weems was excessive because of the combination of punishments. But in Harmelin v. Michigan, Justice Kennedy's concurrence suggested a grossly disproportionate test exists, and this has since been adopted by the Supreme Court in Lockyer v. Andrade, although the court stressed it was only applicable in extreme and rare cases. Of particular note, exceptionally long punishments, including multiple life sentences, can be imposed even for relatively minor offences if defendants have prior felony convictions.

The use of corporal punishment and more torturous forms of capital punishment have been discontinued, but most of this change has not come through judicial decisions, but rather through social change and legislative rejection. Although the Supreme Court has disallowed few types of punishment, it has constitutionally enshrined societal rejection of the application of the death penalty to certain types of crime and categories of defendant, as well as closely monitoring the process by which the death penalty is imposed.

Proper Procedure in Death Penalty Legislation

Unlike the high level of deference given to the states in imposing noncapital punishments, the Supreme Court has actively developed detailed procedural requirements that must be satisfied for death penalty legislation to withstand scrutiny. Death penalty jurisprudence is divided into two eras: "pre-Furman" and "post-Furman." In 1972, in Furman v. Georgia, the Supreme Court ruled that the death penalty as it was then implemented was unconstitutional because of its discretionary nature and its indeterminate and haphazard application, which rendered it arbitrary, and thus cruel and unusual.

A national four-year hiatus on capital punishment followed Furman, but in that period thirty-five states and Congress reinstated the death penalty in new statutes that attempted to meet the Supreme Court's procedural requirements. The Supreme Court again addressed the constitutionality of the death penalty in 1976 in Gregg v. Georgia. The Georgia Act at issue in the case provided a list of aggravating and mitigating circumstances that could be found by a jury or a judge, in a trial with separate stages for guilt and sentencing determinations, and provided for the possibility of higher court review. These clear processes satisfied the Court, although Justices Brennan and Marshall vigorously dissented, arguing that the death penalty is per se unconstitutional.

Since 1976, imposition of the death penalty has been permissible; however, the Court has continued to add procedural hurdles to the process. Woodson v. North Carolina held that the death penalty cannot be a mandatory punishment for a crime. Lockett v. Ohio held that a sentencer must consider a range of mitigating factors, including the defendant's age, character, and record, and the circumstances of the offence. Beck v. Alabama held that the jury must have the option of considering a verdict of a lesser, non-capital offense. Most of these developments have been prodefendant, although not all: for instance, Payne v. Tennessee ruled that it is now permissible to have victim impact statements given during the sentencing phase.

In addition to these specific procedural restrictions, the death penalty can only be imposed in ways that are proportionate and conform to recognized societal evolving standards of decency. These two requirements have provided the basis for restrictions on when and to whom the death penalty can apply.

Categories of Crime

Historically, the death penalty could be applied as punishment for a variety of crimes. It had previously been upheld as fit punishment for murder, rape, attempted rape, arson, assault, kidnapping, and robbery. However, starting in 1977 in Coker v. Georgia, the Supreme Court began applying the evolving standards of decency doctrine, which it developed in Trop v. Dulles, to death penalty jurisprudence. Noting that eighteen states had made rape a capital punishment prior to the Furman ruling, the Court emphasized that only three states had reinstituted the death penalty for rape by 1977, and two of those states only imposed the death penalty when the victim was a child. On this basis, as well as an assessment of proportionality that showed that the punishment was excessive, the Court ruled that imposing the death penalty for rape of an adult woman is unconstitutional.

In that case, Chief Justice Burger in dissent and Justice Powell in concurrence strongly criticized the majority holding on a number of fronts. First, since the death penalty moratorium had only been lifted the previous year in Gregg, it could not safely be concluded that legislatures had time to express their community standards in new legislation. Second, Coker was a recidivist rapist and murderer who had escaped from prison, then committed armed robbery, theft, kidnapping, and rape. Even if society considers the death penalty for rape generally disproportionate, it may not do so for a repeat felon for whom no other punishment would be effective: a recidivist serving a life sentence who would otherwise be in no way deterred from committing further rapes when he escapes again, or even within prison. Third, the majority based its finding on indications that society found the death penalty unacceptable when imposed for rape without aggravating brutality, but it was not clear that society found the death penalty disproportionate for all rapes. As such, the ruling was unnecessarily broad.

This division on the Court, between Justices willing to make broad findings of community consensus against imposition of the death penalty for a variety of crimes and those seeking stronger evidence of a clearer and more specific national consensus before constitutionally enshrining it, continues today. Nevertheless, the evolving standards doctrine has been used to rule the death penalty inapplicable for felony-murder without intent to kill in Enmund v. Florida, and for “ordinary” murder in Godfrey v. Georgia. Today, the death penalty can only be applied for murder with aggravating circumstances.

The only significant restriction on the categories of crime for which noncapital punishments can be imposed is that sentences cannot be imposed for a person’s status of being. This includes, for example, being a drug addict or an alcoholic, or suffering from a disease. It is unconstitutional to punish someone for who they are rather than for an act that they have committed.

Categories of Defendants

The evolving standards doctrine and the proportionality test have both been used in similar fashion to restrict the application of the death penalty to certain categories of defendants. Ford v. Wainwright^{xx} prohibited execution of offenders who are insane at the time of the proposed execution. Atkins v. Virginia proscribed execution of the mentally retarded. This case reversed the 1989 ruling in Penry v. Lynaugh, on the basis that an additional sixteen states had discontinued the practice since then, when only two states had exempted the mentally retarded. In 1981, Stanford v. Kentucky held that execution of minors was not cruel and unusual, but in 1988, Thompson v. Oklahoma held that execution of those sixteen and younger was unconstitutional, and in 2005 in Roper v. Simmons, the Supreme Court held that execution of anyone younger than eighteen is cruel and unusual.

Each of these decisions rested to a large extent on the fact that trends in state legislation were in the direction of the relevant limit on the death penalty in each case. However, it is unclear how many states are required to make the change before the Court will recognize an evolving national consensus. In addition, the Court is divided as to whether it only counts states that prohibit execution of the class of defendant or whether the Court also counts states that do not have the death penalty at all in their tally of states that consider execution of the given class of defendant cruel and unusual.

Two other doctrines on which these cases rested remain equally unsettled: First, the majorities in Atkins and Roper each also relied on notions of culpability and proportionality, arguing that juveniles, like the mentally retarded, are incapable of adequately controlling their impulses or comprehending the criminal process and thus are less responsible and less able to mount an effective defense. But Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Thomas rejected the applicability of these doctrines, arguing evolving standards should be the only basis of challenging the death penalty. Second, in the Roper case, Justice Kennedy’s Opinion of the Court also gave consideration to the views of the international community. Although these views were considered only persuasive, and not authoritative, this move was enormously controversial, with elected representatives going so far as to propose impeaching judges who cite such evidence in future cases.

Conclusion

There are many areas of debate and doctrinal uncertainty in death penalty jurisprudence; nevertheless, the Supreme Court is continuing to develop numerous restrictions on the application of the death penalty, without fully resolving these ambiguities. In contrast, Eighth Amendment jurisprudence relating to noncapital offenses is marked by Supreme Court inaction. Given the result in Lockyer, when the Supreme Court upheld multiple life sentences for minor offences under the “three strikes” law, it seems unlikely that this strongly deferential approach will change in the near future. As such, we can expect to see an increased cabining of cruel and unusual punishment jurisprudence to an almost exclusive focus on limiting the circumstances in which capital punishment can be imposed.

TONJA JACOBI

References and Further Reading

- Berkson, Larry Charles. The Concept of Cruel and Unusual Punishment, 1975.
- Coyne, Randall, and Lyn Entzeroth. Capital Punishment and the Judicial Process, 1994.
- Foley, Michael A. Arbitrary and Capricious: the Supreme Court, the Constitution, and the Death Penalty, 2003.
- Hoffman, Joseph L. “The ‘Cruel and Unusual Punishment’ Clause: a Limit on the Power to Punish or Constitutional Rhetoric?” In Bodehamer, David J., and James W. Ely, Jr. eds, The Bill Of Rights in Modern America, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Atkins v. Virginia* 536 U.S. 304 (U.S. 2002)
- Beck v. Alabama* 447 U.S. 625 (U.S. 1980)
- Campbell v. Wood*, 511 U.S. 1119 (U.S. 1994)
- Coker v. Georgia*, 433 U.S. 584 (U.S. 1977)
- Enmund v. Florida*, 458 U.S. 782 (U.S. 1982)
- Ford v. Wainwright*, 477 U.S. 399 (U.S. 1986)
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (U.S. 1972)
- Glass v. Louisiana*, 471 U.S. 1080 (U.S. 1985)
- Godfrey v. Georgia*, 446 U.S. 420 (U.S. 1980)
- Gomez v. United States District Court*, 503 U.S. 653 (U.S. 1992)
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (U.S. 1976)
- Harmelin v. Michigan*, 501 U.S. 957 (U.S. 1991)
- Lockett v. Ohio*, 438 U.S. 586 (U.S. 1978)
- Lockyer v. Andrade*, 538 U.S. 63 (U.S. 2003)
- Marbury v. Madison*, 5 U.S. 137 (1803)
- Payne v. Tennessee*, 501 U.S. 808 (U.S. 1991)
- Penry v. Lynaugh*, 492 U.S. 302 (U.S. 1989)
- Roper v. Simmons*, 125 S. Ct. 1183 (U.S. 2005)
- Rummel v. Estelle*, 445 U.S. 263 (U.S. 1980)
- Stanford v. Kentucky*, 492 U.S. 361 (U.S. 1981)
- Thompson v. Oklahoma*, 487 U.S. 815 (U.S. 1988)
- Trop v. Dulles*, 356 U.S. 86 (U.S. 1958)
- Weems v. U.S.*, 217 U.S. 349 (1910)
- Wilkerson v. Utah*, 99 U.S. 130 (1879)
- Woodson v. North Carolina*, 428 U.S. 280 (U.S. 1976)

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT GENERALLY

The Eighth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides that “Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.” The U.S. Supreme Court has worked for the past century to define the phrase “cruel and unusual punishments.” At its inception, the phrase was meant to place some restriction on the types of punishments permitted in the context of criminal offenses, specifically prohibiting tortuous and barbaric punishments. However, over the years it has been interpreted to apply not only to the methods of punishment permitted, but also to the proportionality and implementation of punishments.

History of Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause

The first prohibition against tortuous and barbarous punishments was written into American law in 1641 in a document entitled “Body of Liberties,” which was enacted in the Colony of Massachusetts. Nearly fifty years later, the phrase “cruel and unusual punishments” appeared in the English Declaration of Rights of 1688, ratified by William and Mary. The clause was later incorporated verbatim into the Virginia Declaration of Rights of 1776 and in substantially similar form in the Eighth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in 1791.

When the Cruel and Unusual Punishments clause of the Eighth Amendment was adopted, its full meaning was unclear. However, state and federal courts alike originally interpreted the Clause to prohibit certain methods of punishment that were deemed to be tortuous or barbaric. In 1892, the U.S. Supreme Court first indicated that the Clause might be construed not only as a barrier to certain tortuous or barbaric punishments but also to punishments that were excessive under the circumstances. In 1910, a slim majority of the Supreme Court held that that the Cruel and Unusual Punishments clause should be expanded to include disproportionate punishments. The defendant in the case at issue was convicted under a statute that required a sentence of fifteen years at hard labor for anyone convicted of making a false entry in a government payroll book. Although the punishment was not cruel and unusual per se, it violated the Eighth Amendment in that case because it was grossly disproportionate to the crime of forging public records.

There were no other significant applications of the Clause until 1958, when the Supreme Court decided Trop v. Dulles. At issue in that case was whether expatriation was a cruel and unusual punishment for the crime of military desertion. The Supreme Court found that the extreme punishment of expatriation, which involves the “total destruction of the individual’s status in organized society,” constituted cruel and unusual punishment. In Trop v. Dulles, the court first developed the concept of “evolving standards of decency.” Under this theory, the Eighth Amendment is deemed to draw its meaning from “the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society.” Four years later, the Supreme Court held in another landmark case that it is cruel and unusual to make drug addiction a criminal offense.

The next significant Supreme Court decision regarding the Cruel and Unusual Punishments clause occurred in 1972, when the court declared that all existing capital punishment statutes violated the Eighth Amendment. Although the court did not hold that the death penalty was cruel and unusual per se, it declared that the imposition of the death penalty through the existing statutes violated the Eighth Amendment because death sentences were being imposed in an “arbitrary and capricious” manner. In 1976, the Supreme Court reviewed newly drafted death penalty statutes from Georgia, Florida, and Texas and upheld the statutes against Eighth Amendment challenges, because the statutes provided juries with sufficient guidance in the decision-making process and permitted individualized sentencing for each defendant. Since 1976, a majority of the Supreme Court has upheld the death penalty against per se Eighth Amendment challenges but has declared that the application of the death penalty is cruel and unusual in cases involving the rape of an adult woman, insane defendants, mentally retarded defendants, and defendants who were younger than eighteen at the time the crime was committed.

Although death penalty cases make up the majority of Cruel and Unusual Punishment claims, the Supreme Court has also applied the Clause to prison conditions and treatment of prisoners and to repeat offender statutes, often referred to as “three strikes” laws.

Evolving Standards of Decency

As early as 1910, the Supreme Court recognized the progressive nature of the Eighth Amendment when it indicated that the Amendment “may acquire meaning as public opinion becomes enlightened by a humane justice.” In 1958, the Supreme Court affirmatively held that the interpretation of what constitutes “cruel and unusual” punishment changes over time, because it is judged by the “evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society.”

The Supreme Court has indicated that the determination of current societal standards of decency should be guided by objective factors to the maximum extent possible. In the context of death penalty claims, such factors include state and federal legislation, jury verdicts, and national and international views. Although there is much disagreement regarding the role that international views should play in a constitutional analysis, some of the Supreme Court justices have indicated that international opinion, although in no way binding on the Court, should be considered in some manner as part of a societal standard of decency analysis.

In addition to the objective factors, the Court also applies its own judgment to determine whether a particular punishment contributes to an accepted sentencing goal or whether it is nothing more than the needless imposition of pain and suffering. In the context of capital cases, the Court determines whether the punishment of death effectively contributes to either deterrence or retribution.

The Cruel and Unusual Punishments clause is unique in that it has been interpreted to change over time, unlike other Constitutional provisions. As society develops and matures over time, it is certain to maintain its pivotal role in the evolution of the American criminal justice system.

JUDITH M. BARGER

References and Further Reading

- Bukowski, Jeffrey D., The Eighth Amendment and Original Intent: Applying the Prohibition Against Cruel and Unusual Punishments to Prison Deprivation Cases is Not Beyond the Bounds of History and Precedent, Dick. L. Rev. 99 (1994): 419.
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972).
- Granucci, Anthony F., Nor Cruel and Unusual Punishments Inflicted: The Original Meaning, Cal. L. Rev. 57 (1969): 839.
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (1976).
- Jurek v. Texas*, 429 U.S. 262 (1976).
- Proffitt v. Florida*, 428 U.S. 242 (1976).
- Trop v. Dulles*, 356 U.S. 86 (1958).
- Varland, Brian W., Marking the Progress of a Maturing Society: Reconsidering the Constitutionality of Death Penalty Application in Light of Evolving Standards of Decency, Hamline L. Rev. 28 (2005): 311.
- Weems v. United States*, 217 U.S. 349 (1910).

See also Capital Punishment and Sentencing; Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958)

CRUZAN v. MISSOURI, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)

Nancy Cruzan is the first case in which the Supreme Court of the United States (the Court) had to decide on the issue of “right to die” under the U.S. Constitution. In a five to four decision, the Court struggled to balance individual rights with state interests.

In January 1983, Nancy Cruzan lost control of her car in a serious accident. Her breathing and heartbeat were recovered; however, she remained in a coma for approximately three weeks before she progressed to an unconscious state. Surgeons implanted a gastrostomy feeding and hydration tube to ease feeding, but subsequent rehabilitative efforts failed to recover her from the so-called persistent vegetative state, in which she “exhibits motor reflexes but evinces no indications of significant cognitive function.” Seeing no chance of regaining her mental faculties, Cruzan’s parents asked a court authorization to terminate the artificial nutrition and hydration. Recognizing her medical condition, the trial court believed that Nancy Cruzan had a fundamental right under both Missouri and U.S. Constitutions to “refuse or direct the withdrawal of ‘death prolonging procedures.’” The trial court also found reliable Cruzan’s conversation with a housemate friend, in which Nancy Cruzan expressed her unwillingness to continue her life if she could not “live at least halfway normally.” The Missouri Supreme Court reversed and refused to read the State Constitution so broadly to support a person’s right to terminate medical treatment in every circumstances. Rather, the Missouri Supreme Court found the roommate’s story unreliable and held that there was not “clear and convincing” evidence to support the termination.

In a close call, the Court affirmed the State Supreme Court’s decision. First, reviewing relevant state cases, the Court found that the common-law doctrine of informed consent is always viewed as encompassing a competent individual’s right to refuse medical treatment. However, reluctant to establish such a doctrine under the Constitution, the Court simply “assumed” that the U.S. Constitution would grant a similar right to a competent person. Second, the Court refused to extend such a right to incompetent persons and held that states may adopt certain procedural requirements to safeguard relevant state interests. In the present case, after a balance, the Court validated Missouri’s claimed interest in “the protection and preservation of human life” and approved Missouri’s imposition of heightened evidentiary requirements (that is, the incompetent’s wish to withdraw treatment must be proved by “clear and convincing” evidence) against potential abuses that might result harsh erroneous decisions. Justice O’Connor filed a separate concurring opinion and clarified her belief that a right to refuse unwanted medical treatment might be inferred from the Constitution. In another concurring opinion, Justice Scalia traced the traditional opposition of suicide by states and struggled with the distinction between action (for example, suicide) and inaction (right to refuse treatment). Rather, Justice Scalia believed that this is not a proper issue for the Constitution. Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun dissented. They argued that Nancy Cruzan “has a fundamental right to be free of unwanted artificial nutrition and hydration,” and her incompetent condition does not deprive her of such a right. The state’s general interest in the preservation of life cannot subdue Nancy Cruzan’s particularized interest, and the procedural obstacles placed by the Missouri Supreme Court imposed an impermissible burden on Nancy Cruzan’s right. Compared with the majority, the dissenters would clearly assign more weight to evidence provided by family members and friends in determining Cruzan’s personal wishes. Justice Stevens filed a separate dissenting opinion and argued that the State Supreme Court’s decision totally ignored Nancy Cruzan’s best interests. Rather, the state should have given appropriate respect to her best interests when it evaluated evidence based on the “clear and convincing” standard.

Six months after the Court’s ruling, Nancy Cruzan died after her family and friends presented new evidence and the judge ruled that there was clear evidence to show her wishes. The significance of Nancy Cruzan lies in the fact that the Court recognized a competent patient’s right to terminate medical treatment, although states may impose necessary protection procedures to incompetent patients. However, the Court refused to go one-step further to honor active euthanasia or physician-assisted suicide (see Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997); Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997)), leaving the line between active and inactive euthanasia arguable. Nancy Cruzan and later relevant cases showed a continuous weighing by the courts the value of life against the value of death and what is the meaning of diminished human lives to the incompetent patients.

BIN LIANG

References and Further Reading

- Angell, Marcia. “The Supreme Court and Physician-Assisted Suicide—The Ultimate Right.” The New England Journal of Medicine 336 (1997): 50–53.
- Annas, George J., The “Right to Die” in America: Sloganeering from Quinlan and Cruzan to Quill and Kevorkian, Duquesne University Law Review 34 (1996): 875–897.
- Baggett, Sandy D., In Search of a Right to Die: Preventing Government Infliction of Pain, University of Tennessee Law Review 65 (1997): 245–292.
- Bopp, James Jr., and Daniel Avila, The Due Process “Right to Life” in Cruzan and its Impact on “Right-to-Die” Law, University of Pittsburgh Law Review 53 (1991): 193–233.
- , Perspectives on Cruzan: The Siren’s Lure of Invented Consent: A Critique of Autonomy-Based Surrogate Decisionmaking for Legally-Incapacitated Older Persons, Hastings Law Journal 42 (1991): 779–815.

- Martyn, Susan R., and Henry J. Bourguignon, Perspective on Cruzan: Coming to Terms with Death: The Cruzan Case, Hastings Law Journal 42 (1991): 817–858.
- Robertson, John A., Cruzan and The Constitutional Status of Nontreatment Decisions for Incompetent Patients, University of Georgia Law Review 25 (1991): 1139–1203.
- Ronzetti, T. A. Tucker, Constituting Family and Death Through the Struggle with State Power: Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, University of Miami Law Review 46 (1991): 149–204.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Vacco v. Quill*, 521 U.S. 793 (1997)
- Washington v. Glucksberg*, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)

CUBAN INTERDICTION

Interdiction of vessels at sea to deter migration dates back to the early days of the Republic, when interdiction was used to interfere with the forced migration of slaves. Similarly, persons fleeing war, persecution, or economic and political upheaval have been arriving at American shores since at least 1793, when waves of white refugees poured into U.S. ports fleeing a slave insurrection in Santo Domingo. That insurrection led to the establishment of Haiti in 1801. Those refugees, however, were welcome on U.S. shores, particularly in the slave-owning South.

It was not until the 1980s, however, that the United States began to aggressively use interdiction in the open seas to prevent migration. The catalyst for the change in federal policy seems to have been the Mariel Boatlift in 1980 during which approximately 124,000 Cuban migrants entered the United States. Marielitos, as these refugees came to be known, were detained, in some cases, indefinitely, in others, until a family or individual could be found to serve as a sponsor. The Mariel crisis and an influx of Haitians fleeing economic and political repression in Haiti led President Reagan to issue Executive Order 12324 on September 23, 1981, which ordered the Coast Guard to interdict vessels carrying undocumented aliens and return them to their point of origin. The order, thus, required interdiction, screening of migrants aboard vessels to determine whether they qualified as refugees under American and international law, and return of those who did not.

Interdiction became a favored practice to deter undocumented migration, as federal constitutional and immigration law became more protective of migrants in the United States. Once on shore, statutory and constitutional protections provide some degree of process to undocumented immigrants; interdiction at sea allowed the government to deter migrants from entering the United States without having to extend any due process or statutory protections to those seeking refuge in the United States. Although President Reagan's order preserved some degree of screening on board vessels, the policy changed in the wake of the overthrow of Haitian president Jean Aristide in 1991, when a new influx of Haitians were received on U.S. shores. In 1992, President Bush issued Executive Order 12807 directing the Coast Guard to interdict undocumented migrants at sea and repatriate them. President Bush's order terminated screening of migrants to determine whether they were entitled to refugee status. This order was challenged and upheld by the U. S. Supreme Court in Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, Inc.

Few Cuban migrants, however, were interdicted at sea until the 1990s; interdiction to deter migration was directed primarily at Haitians. Beginning in 1991, however, when Castro again signaled a willingness to allow Cubans to leave Cuba without interference from the Cuban government, the rate of Cuban interdictions increased, peaking dramatically in 1994, when 37,191 Cubans were interdicted at sea. Most of these Cubans were detained in Guantanamo, as were their Haitian counterparts. After litigation and public criticism of the practice, most Guantanamo Cuban detainees were released to a sponsor in the United States or returned to Cuba pursuant to an agreement worked out between the Cuban and U.S. governments.

Today, the U.S. Coast Guard continues to use interdiction of undocumented migrants at sea to quickly return them to their country of origin and to avoid what the Coast Guard refers to as "the costly processes required if they successfully enter the U.S." The largest group of migrants to be interdicted in fiscal year 2005 continue to be persons from the Caribbean, with the largest number to come from the Dominican Republic (3,520), followed by Cubans (2,532), and Haitians (1,850). Since 1982, a total of 57,800 Cubans have been interdicted at sea.

M. ISABEL MEDINA

References and Further Reading

- Hamm, Mark S. The Abandoned Ones: The Imprisonment and Uprising of the Mariel Boat People. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1995.
- Palmer, Capt. Gary W., USCG, Guarding the Coast: Alien Migrant Interdiction Operations at Sea, Connecticut Law Review 29 (1997): 1565–1615.
- Rivera, Mario A. Decision and Structure: U.S. Refugee Policy in the Mariel Crisis. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1991.
- Rosenberg, Lori D., International Association of Refugee Law Judges Conference: The Courts and Interception: The United States Interdiction Experience and Its Impact on Refugees and Asylum Seekers, Georgetown Immigration Law Journal 17 (2003): 199.

U.S. Coast Guard. "Alien Migrant Interdiction-Overview"
<http://www.uscg.mil/hq/g-o/g-opl/AMIO/AMIO.htm>
 (2005).

U.S. Coast Guard, "History of the U.S. Coast Guard in Illegal Immigration (1794-1971)" <http://www.uscg.mil/hq/g-o/g-opl/AMIO/amiohist.htm> (2005).

Cases, Statutes, and Executive Orders Cited

Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, Inc., 509 U.S. 155 (1993)
Cuban American Bar Association, Inc. v. Christopher, 43 F.
 3d 1412 (11th Cir. 1995)

Haitian Refugee Center, Inc. v. Christopher, 43 F. 3d 1431
 (11th Cir. 1995)

Cuban Refugee Adjustment Act, Pub. L. No. 89-732, 80
 Stat. 1161 (1966)

Executive Order 12324, 46 Fed. Reg. 48,109 (1981)

Executive Order 12807, 57 Fed. Reg. 23,133 (1992)

Presidential Proclamation No. 4865, 46 Fed. Reg. 48,108
 (1981)

CULTURAL DEFENSE

Strictly speaking, there is no such thing as a "cultural defense." Instead, the term refers to all of the ways in which a defendant can use evidence of his cultural background—the "shared organization of ideas that includes the intellectual, moral, and aesthetic standards" prevalent in his community of origin—to argue that his conduct was either not criminal, should be excused, or should be punished less severely.

Courts have traditionally been hostile to cultural defenses, viewing them as incompatible with the Rule of Law, the idea that "to apply a law justly to different cases is simply to take seriously the assertion that what is to be applied in different cases is the same general rule." More recently, however, three different kinds of cultural defenses have begun to gain a degree of judicial acceptance.

First, courts have allowed defendants to use cultural evidence to show that they lacked the mental state required by a particular crime. An example is People v. Moua, in which a young Hmong man was accused of raping and kidnapping a young Hmong woman. Prior to trial, the defendant introduced evidence that abducting and having intercourse with an unmarried woman against her will, and despite her protests, was an expected part of the Hmong's "marriage by capture" tradition. The court dismissed the charges on the ground that the defendant lacked the specific intent required by rape and kidnapping.

Second, courts have allowed defendants to use cultural evidence to establish criminal defenses such as provocation, self-defense, duress, and necessity. In People v. Croy, for example, a jury acquitted a Native American man accused of murdering a police officer after a historian testified that, in light of the U.S. government's repeated persecution of the defendant's tribe, the defendant could have reasonably believed he was acting in self-defense.

Third, courts have allowed defendants to use cultural evidence as a mitigating factor during sentencing. Such evidence is particularly common in child-abuse cases, where the defendant argues that he should be given a lenient sentence because he was simply disciplining his child in accord with his cultural traditions. For example, a Mexican woman was sentenced to probation for beating her son with a spoon and biting him after she introduced evidence that such punishment was standard discipline in Mexico.

There are two basic rationales for recognizing cultural defenses. To begin with, such recognition promotes individualized justice, the idea that the defendant's punishment should match his personal culpability. An individual who commits a criminal act either because his cultural values required him to do so or because he did not know the act was illegal in the United States is not as personally culpable as someone who commits the same criminal act freely and with knowledge of its illegality.

Recognizing cultural defenses also promotes cultural pluralism. By judging individuals according to the standards and values of their native cultures, cultural defenses help preserve those cultures, maintain a culturally diverse society, and ensure that minority groups are not penalized simply for being different.

KEVIN JON HELLER

References and Further Reading

Levine, Kay L., Negotiating the Boundaries of Crime and Culture: A Sociolegal Perspective on Cultural Defense Strategies, Law and Social Inquiry 28 (2003): 1:39-86.

Note: The Cultural Defense in Criminal Law, Harvard Law Review 99 (1986): 6:1293-1311.

Renteln, Alison Dundes. The Cultural Defense. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

People v. Moua, No. 315972-0 (Cal. Super. Ct. Fresno County Feb. 7, 1985)

People v. Croy, 710 P.2d 392 (Cal. 1985)

CUMMINGS v. STATE OF MISSOURI, 71 U.S. 277 (1866)

See Test Oath Cases

D

DANDRIDGE v. WILLIAMS, 397 U.S. 471 (1971)

The federal welfare program called Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), enacted as part of the Social Security Act of 1935, was repealed in 1996. Under AFDC, states calculated a standard of need for each family, then allocated welfare grants based on that standard. Generally, the standard of need increased with each additional person in the household. However, some states, like Maryland, imposed an upper limit on the amount of money a family might receive.

Several families affected by Maryland's policy sued the state under the Equal Protection Clause, arguing that the maximum grant irrationally discriminated against children in large families. The Supreme Court upheld the policy in a five-to-three decision. Applying the minimum level of constitutional scrutiny, the Court held that the policy was rational. The Court credited Maryland's argument that it maintained financial equity between welfare recipients and the working poor and created an incentive for members of large families to seek employment.

Dandridge was one of a series of cases initiated in the late 1960s and early 1970s to test the constitutionality of state welfare policies. Many of these cases were successful, and some poverty rights activists believed that the Supreme Court would eventually establish a constitutional right to welfare. Dandridge, however, signaled that the Court was prepared to approach state welfare policies with greater deference. In the wake of 1996 welfare reform, lower courts have cited Dandridge to uphold state policies that deny benefit increases when a child is born to a family on welfare, thus permitting states to use financial disincentives to deter poor women from having a child while receiving government benefits.

MARTHA F. DAVIS

References and Further Reading

- Davis, Martha. Brutal Need: Lawyers and the Welfare Rights Movement, 1960–1973. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993.
- Krislov, Samuel. The OEO Lawyers Fail to Constitutionalize a Right to Welfare: A Study of the Uses and Limits of Judicial Process, Minnesota Law Review 58 (1973): 211–245.
- Lawrence, Susan E. The Poor in Court: The Legal Services Program and Supreme Court Decision Making. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1990.
- Sparer, Edward. “The Right to Welfare.” In The Rights of Americans: What They Are—What They Should Be, Norman Dorsen, ed. New York: Pantheon Books, 1971, 65–93.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Social Security Act* of 1935, Pub. L. No. 74-271, 49 Stat. 620
- See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Fourteenth Amendment; Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970); Wyman v. James, 400 U.S. 309 (1971)

DARROW, CLARENCE (1857–1938)

The most celebrated criminal defense lawyer of the twentieth century, Clarence Seward Darrow achieved near legendary status in a series of highly publicized cases in which he championed individual rights and progressive political causes. He was born in Kinsman, in rural northeastern Ohio. His father, a seminary graduate who became a freethinker, worked as a furniture maker and undertaker. His mother, whom Darrow called his greatest influence, died when he was fifteen. His parents instilled a lifelong reverence for books, which expressed itself in later literary efforts at fiction and criticism, culminating in a masterful autobiography, The Story of My Life (1932).

Darrow attended preparatory school for one year (1873) at Allegheny College. Though an indifferent student and contemptuous of formal education, he taught school for three years in Ohio while he read law. He studied law for one year at the University of Michigan (1877–1878) and apprenticed with a lawyer in Youngstown, Ohio, where he was admitted to the Ohio bar.

Darrow practiced law and participated in Democratic Party activities in rural northern Ohio. He moved to Chicago in 1887 where he sought out the patronage of Judge John Peter Altgeld, who arranged Darrow's appointment as legal counsel for the city of Chicago. In 1891, Darrow joined the law department of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway. He also advised Altgeld during his successful campaign for governor in 1892.

Darrow's sympathy for poor people and victims of injustice led him to join numerous reform clubs. A lifelong opponent of capital punishment, he encouraged Governor Altgeld to pardon the surviving anarchists convicted of the terrorist bombing during the Chicago Haymarket riot. He also intervened after Chicago's popular mayor was assassinated, challenging the killer's competence in an unsuccessful effort to prevent his execution.

Sympathizing with labor and disapproving of the industrialists' influence over political power, Darrow resigned in 1894 as counsel for the railroad in order to represent Eugene Debs, the militant president of the American Railway Union. Prior to New Deal legislation, employers enlisted the aid of law enforcement to crush unions by charging organizers with criminal conspiracy. This crime broadly prohibited two or more persons from agreeing to do anything unlawful, and pro-owner prosecutors reasoned that labor's goal was the unlawful injuring of employers' economic interests.

Darrow rose to prominence representing union leaders in criminal cases. His vigorous defense of Debs at his criminal conspiracy trial is credited with causing the railroad to influence the government to drop the case. (This did not prevent Debs from being convicted of contempt for violating a federal injunction.) In 1898, Darrow defended Thomas I. Kidd, general secretary of the Amalgamated Woodworkers' International Union, who was tried for criminal conspiracy in Oshkosh, Wisconsin. Darrow's jury argument lasted two days. Drawing on sources from the Bible to Victor Hugo, Darrow lionized Kidd as a "great soul" devoted to "humanity's holy cause" and accused the prosecutors and industrialists of being the true conspirators for their effort to prevent freedom of association for the sake of property rights. The jury found Kidd not guilty. In 1903, Darrow added to his reputation as a labor lawyer, representing the United Mine Workers in arbitration proceedings in Pennsylvania, where he won the workers wage increases and back pay.

In 1908, Darrow defended radical union leader William D. ("Big Bill") Haywood in Iowa, where he was tried for the murder of former governor Frank Steunenberg. Darrow persuaded the jury to reject the testimony of the state's main witness, a confessed killer, and the jury acquitted Haywood.

In 1911 union leaders persuaded Darrow to represent the McNamara brothers, union activists charged with the terrorist bombing of the Los Angeles Times building that claimed twenty-one victims. Darrow eventually pled his clients guilty, avoiding death sentences for them, but in doing so he permanently alienated organized labor. In this highly charged atmosphere, Darrow was accused of attempting to bribe two jurors. He was obliged to remain in Los Angeles for two years and faced two separate trials. The first trial provided the occasion for one of his greatest speeches, and the jury acquitted him. In the second trial, the jury could agree neither to convict nor acquit. Though the case was eventually dropped, his reputation suffered.

Darrow returned to Chicago, economically and emotionally depleted, where he rebuilt his practice, specializing in criminal cases. He returned to civic prominence as a pro-war spokesman during the Great War and as an opponent of the League of Nations after the war.

Darrow distinguished himself from most populists and progressives by his outspoken support for African-American rights. In the 1890s, he promoted the creation of Chicago's first interracial hospital. In 1910, he defended interracial marriage in an address to a precursor of the NAACP. His biographer Kevin Tierney records that Darrow gave more time and money to African-American causes than any other white person of the day.

In 1925, Darrow defended eleven members of the Sweet family and their friends, who had been charged with conspiracy to commit murder. The death occurred when Dr. Ossian Sweet, an African American, moved into a white neighborhood of Detroit and a mob attacked his home. When Sweet and other occupants defended themselves, a bystander was shot and killed. Darrow's forceful confrontation of race hatred and energetic assertion of the right to self defense resulted in a hung jury. A few months later, the state retried one of Sweet's brothers. Darrow won an outright acquittal, and the remaining charges were dropped.

Darrow's two most publicized cases occurred during the 1920s. In 1924, he defended Leopold and Loeb, two young college graduates who murdered a teenage neighbor. Public sentiment strongly favored executing the killers, who came from wealthy Jewish families and whose motive was intellectual thrill-seeking. Darrow entered pleas of guilty and devoted himself to the improbable goal of saving his clients from hanging. His argument remains one of the most forceful pleas against capital punishment, and it convinced the sentencing judge to impose life prison terms. The crime inspired numerous books, plays, and films, and Darrow's defense established him as a national spokesperson against capital punishment.

In the summer of 1925, Darrow appeared for the defense in the Scopes "monkey trial" in Dayton, Tennessee, where a schoolteacher was charged with violating a state statute banning the teaching of evolution. William Jennings Bryan, populist orator and former Democratic presidential candidate who had campaigned for the legislation, agreed to serve as special prosecutor. Scopes was convicted as expected, though his judgment was later reversed because the judge rather than jury fixed the fine. The national news media closely covered Darrow's defense of science and his ridicule of religious ignorance. The case helped marginalize the antievolution crusade as a rural movement and identified science with tolerance and religion with censorship. Darrow dramatized the conflict by calling Bryan as an expert witness on Christianity and questioning him about Biblical passages that seemingly required interpretation. The case was popularized for later generations by the film Inherit the Wind (1960).

Darrow's career vindicated the importance of defense lawyers in protecting groups and individuals from efforts to control unpopular thought and behavior by criminal law enforcement. He was by temperament an agnostic who questioned the reality of freedom of will and an individualist who asserted his right to drink during Prohibition. He insisted on the value of privacy, protesting, "Wouldn't it be better that every rogue and rascal in the world should go unpunished than to say that detectives could put a Dictograph into your parlor, your dining room, in your bedroom, and destroy that privacy which alone makes life worth living?"

While he recognized the need for collective action to achieve social reform, Darrow's skepticism left him equally suspicious of moral absolutes and of popular opinion. This explains how his populist convictions could coexist with hostility to expansive government power, accounting for paradoxes such as his support for Democratic candidates and opposition to New Deal programs. He flirted with electoral politics only twice, running unsuccessfully for Congress in 1896 as a Democrat and successfully for the Illinois legislature in 1902 as an Independent. He held appointed positions, including chair of the National Recovery Review Board in 1934.

A humanist who viewed all humans as flawed, Darrow's strategy, which succeeded even when his clients were guilty of wrongdoing, was to fight to establish a broader vision of a controversy in which his clients' conduct did not deserve condemnation. In an age when judicial construction of the Bill of Rights provided fewer protections, he employed common-law doctrines like the presumption of innocence and right to self-defense to protect unpopular clients against the totalitarian tendencies he feared were inherent in the modern state.

Darrow married Jessie Ohl in 1880, and the couple moved to Andover, Ohio. The couple's only child, Paul Edward Darrow, was born in 1883. The Darrows were divorced in 1897. In 1903, Darrow married Ruby Hamerstrom, a journalist with whom he had no children.

MICHAEL H. HOFFHEIMER

References and Further Reading

- Boyle, Kevin. Arc of Justice: A Saga of Race, Civil Rights, and Murder in the Jazz Age. New York: H. Holt, 2004.
- Cowan, Geoffrey. The People v. Clarence Darrow: The Bribery Trial of America's Greatest Lawyer. New York: Times Books, 1993.
- Darrow, Clarence. Resist Not Evil. Chicago: C. H. Kerr, 1903.
- . Farmington. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1932.
- . Attorney for the Damned: Clarence Darrow in the Courtroom, Arthur Weinberg, ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957.
- . Crime: Its Causes and Treatment. Montclair, N.J.: Patterson Smith, 1972.
- . The Story of My Life. New York: Da Capo Press, 1996.
- Higdon, Hal. Leopold and Loeb: The Crime of the Century. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999.
- Larson, Edward J. Summer for the Gods: The Scopes Trial and America's Continuing Debate Over Science and Religion. New York: Basic Books, 1997.

Sayer, James Edward. Clarence Darrow: Public Advocate. Monograph series no. 2. Dayton, OH: Wright State University, 1978.

Stone, Irving. Clarence Darrow for the Defense. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, Doran and Company, 1941.

Tierney, Kevin. Darrow: A Biography. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Publishers, 1979.

Vine, Phyllis. One Man's Castle: Clarence Darrow in Defense of the American Dream. New York: Amistad, 2004.

See also Capital Punishment; Prohibition; Scopes Trial

DAVIS v. ALASKA, 415 U.S. 308 (1974)

In Davis, the Supreme Court established that the Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause generally guarantees criminal defendants the right to relevant cross-examination of prosecution witnesses about their criminal records.

Davis was tried for burglarizing a bar and stealing the safe. The prosecution's star witness was a teenager, Green, who testified that he saw Davis standing on the road near where the empty safe was later found. Since Green had recently been adjudicated as a juvenile delinquent for two burglaries, Davis's attorney wanted to question Green about his juvenile record to show that Green was eager to identify Davis in order to deflect suspicion from himself. However, the state courts barred Davis from revealing Green's prior record because juvenile adjudications were confidential under state law.

Davis appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which reversed by a vote of seven to two. The Court stressed that criminal defendants have the right to conduct probing cross-examinations of their accusers in order to discredit them. Since witnesses have traditionally been discredited by their criminal histories, the Court concluded that Davis should have been allowed to reveal Green's criminal history and that his Confrontation Clause right to do so trumped the state's interest in keeping juvenile records confidential. Since Davis, the Court has occasionally struck down other limits on cross-examination, such as the ruling in Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988), barring a rape defendant from revealing the complainant's sexual relationship with another key witness, while emphasizing that judges still retain discretion to protect witnesses from unnecessary harassment.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Jonakait, Randolph N., Restoring the Confrontation Clause to the Sixth Amendment, UCLA Law Review 35 (1988): 557.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988)

See also Confrontation Clause; Defense, Right to Present

DAVIS v. BEASON, 133 U.S. 333 (1890)

Davis v. Beason (1890) was an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court of a conviction for unlawfully attempting to register to vote in violation of an Idaho statute that denied the franchise to would-be voters who practiced polygamy, belonged to an organization that practiced polygamy or taught, advised, counseled, or encouraged polygamy. The statute also required that applicants swear an oath to that effect.

The Utah statute was created in a nationwide atmosphere of anti-Mormon sentiment and must be viewed in the context of the federal acts of Congress aimed at the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons). From 1852, when Brigham Young made public a church practice that had gone on underground for at least two decades, to at least 1890, when the church officially banned the practice, the public practice of polygamy was the touchstone that ignited popular sentiment against the young church.

Samuel Davis and other Mormons registered to vote in Utah and, in so doing, as required by the Utah statute, took an oath stating that they were not polygamists and did not belong to any organization that taught or encouraged polygamy. Thus, because they belonged to the Mormon Church that practiced and encouraged polygamy, they had committed perjury and violated the statute. Davis argued that the statute under which he was convicted violated the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment.

The case was short on constitutional analysis, relied heavily upon the first Mormon case of two years prior, Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878), and was transparent in its condemnation of Mormon beliefs, "To call [the Mormons'] advocacy [of polygamy] a tenet of religion is to offend the common sense of mankind."

As it had done in Reynolds, the Court first distinguished Mormonism from true religion, describing it as a "cultus or form of worship of a particular sect." The Court stated that the First Amendment religious freedoms were enacted as a response to the "oppressive measures" enacted by the dominant religions in European countries, but were never intended to protect acts "inimical to the peace, good order, and morals of a society."

What if certain sects had advocated promiscuity, suttee (the Hindu practice of a wife throwing herself upon her deceased husband's funeral pyre), or human sacrifice, the Court asked. “Suppose one believed that human sacrifices were a necessary part of religious worship, would it be seriously contended that the civil government under which he lived could not interfere to prevent a sacrifice?”

The Court concluded with a note that at least thirteen state constitutions expressly excluded “acts of licentiousness” from free exercise protection, including those of California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, New York, and South Carolina.

The case was the third in a series of defeats for the polygamous Mormon Church, following Reynolds v. United States (1878) and Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U.S. 15, 45 (1885). It hit the church particularly hard because, in upholding the state law, the Court made it impossible for Mormons to vote in local elections and greatly diminished the local political clout that Mormons had previously been able to wield due to their geographic concentration. However, the final and most serious blow to Mormon polygamy was to come five years later in Late Corp. of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. United States.

KEITH E. SEALING

References and Further Reading

- Ostling, Richard, and Joan Ostling. Mormon America: The Power and the Promise. New York: Harper, 1999.
- Sealing, Keith. Polygamists out of the Closet: Statutory and State Constitutional Prohibitions Against Polygamy Are Unconstitutional Under the Free Exercise Clause. Ga. St. U. L. Rev. 17 (2001): 691.
- Van Wagoner, Richard. Mormon Polygamy: A History. Gaithersburg, MD: Signature Books, 1989.

See also Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)

DAWSON, JOSEPH MARTIN (1879–1973)

Joseph Martin Dawson, ordained Baptist minister and advocate of religious liberty and church–state separation, was cofounder of Americans United for the Separation of Church and State, for which he served as first acting director and executive secretary (1947–1948). The first full-time executive director of the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs (1946–1953), Dawson left an indelible mark on Baptist social thought, linking it for decades with a brand of church–state separationism that shaped a generation of American jurists, including Justice Hugo Black.

Born in 1879 near Waxahachie, Texas, Dawson was a natural leader with a passion for writing and preaching, which served him well throughout his career as a champion of religious liberty. A graduate of Baylor University (1904 valedictorian), Dawson was founding editor of the school’s student paper, The Lariat. During and after college, Dawson served as pastor at several Texas churches, including a thirty-one-year stint (1915–1946) at the First Baptist Church of Waco.

Under the influence of the writings of Walter Rauschenbusch, Dawson incorporated elements of the “social gospel” in his sermons and publications. An opponent of racial prejudice, Dawson once publicly condemned the Ku Klux Klan from the pulpit of the First Baptist Church to an audience consisting almost entirely of Klan members.

Dawson opposed government funding of religious institutions, including hospitals and schools, as well as the use of public schools to teach religious doctrine. As Dawson writes in Journal of Church and State, “What the Constitution of the United States forbids and what the constitutions of all the states forbid . . . is the making of any law or the action of any government authority in pursuance of any law that involves the interlocking of the official functions of the state (or any of its agencies) with the official functions of any church.” This view, according to Dawson, is consistent with military chaplaincy and clergy offering invocations at legislative sessions because, in both cases the government is not making an agreement or contract with a religious organization, but rather, with “an individual qualified to perform the services asked for.” Ironically, many contemporary separationists disagree.

In 1951, Dawson was instrumental in helping to convince President Harry S. Truman not to assign a U.S. ambassador to the Vatican. Dawson found common cause with nativists and secularists in their suspicion of the influence of Roman Catholic immigrants on American public life. But what some considered a legitimate concern to preserve American democracy, others saw as religious bigotry. Writes Dawson in Separate Church and State Now: “The Catholics . . . would abolish our public school system which is our greatest single factor in national unity and would substitute their old-world, medieval parochial schools, with their alien culture.” This sentiment, however, was widely helped by pre-Vatican II American Protestants, including conservatives, liberals, and moderates.

In 1957, Baylor honored its distinguished alumnus and former trustee by founding the J. M. Dawson Institute of Church–State Studies, which began publishing the Journal of Church and State in 1959.

FRANCIS J. BECKWITH

References and Further Reading

- Dawson, Joseph Martin. Christ and Social Change. Philadelphia: The Judson Press, 1937.
- . Separate Church and State Now. New York: R. R. Smith, 1948.
- . America's Way in Church, State, and Society. New York: Macmillan, 1953.
- . Baptists and the American Republic. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1956.
- . "The Meaning of Separation of Church and State in the First Amendment." Journal of Church and State 1 (1959):37–42.
- . A Thousand Months to Remember: An Autobiography. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 1964.
- Dunn, James. "The Ethical Thought of Joseph Martin Dawson." Th.D. diss., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1966.
- Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- Reynolds, J. A. "Dawson, Joseph Martin." In The Handbook of Texas Online, <http://www.tsha.utexas.edu/handbook/online/articles/print/DD/fda52.html>.
- Summerlin, Travis L. "Church-State Relations in the Thought of Joseph Martin Dawson." Ph.D. diss., Baylor University, 1984.

See also Americans United for Separation of Church and State; Baptists in Early America; Catholics and Religious Liberty; Wall of Separation

DAYS OF RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCE AS NATIONAL OR STATE HOLIDAYS

One question that has arisen on several occasions is whether the government can establish a day of religious observance as an official state or national holiday consistent with the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. Some observers argue that to do so constitutes an unconstitutional establishment of the religion whose special day has been designated an official holiday. Courts have considered claims that declaring Good Friday or Christmas Day an official holiday is an unconstitutional establishment of religion. The courts are divided on the issue as it pertains to Good Friday, generally sustaining the constitutionality of the holiday if a secular purpose exists. By the same token, courts have uniformly concluded that declaring Christmas Day a government holiday poses no constitutional problem because of the secular nature of the day.

In 1995, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that an Illinois state law maintaining Good Friday as a holiday on which schools must be closed violated the Establishment Clause (Metzl v. Leininger, 57 F. 3d 618, 7th Cir., 1995). The court noted that Good Friday is the only religious holiday on which schools must be closed in Illinois (schools are not required to close, for example, on Jewish holidays). Because Illinois law already permitted students to miss school on religious holidays, the court concluded that the special accommodation for Good Friday served no secular purpose and thus violated the Establishment Clause. The court did note in dicta, however, that if the state had defended the holiday on the grounds that the schools would otherwise experience a high degree of absenteeism on that day, the case might have been decided differently.

A few other courts have also found that making Good Friday a state holiday violates the Establishment Clause when the purpose appears to be to promote Christian worship. For example, a federal district court in Wisconsin in Freedom From Religion Foundation v. Thompson, 920 F. Supp. 969 (W.D. Wisc., 1996), held that a Wisconsin statute providing that "[o]n Good Friday the period from 11:00 A.M. to 3:00 P.M. shall uniformly be observed [as a state holiday] for the purpose of worship" violated the Establishment Clause. Similarly, a California state appellate court held unconstitutional a California governor's order that state offices be closed from noon until 3:00 P.M. on Good Friday—the three most sacred hours of that religious holiday (Mandel v. Hodges, 127 Cal. Rptr. 244, 1976).

But other courts have rejected claims that establishing Good Friday as a state holiday violates the Establishment Clause when the decision is motivated by secular reasons. For example, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit upheld the constitutionality of a Kentucky statute making Good Friday a state holiday on the grounds that the legislature acted in order to provide a holiday on the third busiest travel day of the year (Granzeier v. Middleton, 173 F. 3d 568, 6th Cir., 1999). Similarly, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit upheld a Maryland statute making Good Friday and the Monday after Easter Sunday school holidays on the grounds that the schools would otherwise have a high rate of absenteeism on those days (Koenick v. Felton, 190 F. 3d 259, 4th Cir., 1999). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit upheld an Indiana law giving state employees a holiday on Good Friday when the state presented evidence that the purpose was to create a holiday during a time period when there would otherwise be four months without one (Bridenbaugh v. O'Bannon, 185 F.3d 796, 7th Cir., 1999).

Yet another circuit court, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, found that a Hawaii statute declaring Good Friday a state holiday did not violate the Establishment Clause since, in the court's view, Good Friday in Hawaii had become the first day of an annual three-day spring weekend devoted to shopping and recreational pursuits and that the establishment of that day as a holiday merely accommodated those secular activities (Cammack v. Waihee, 932 F.2d 765, 9th Cir., 1991). Finally, a federal district court in Ohio rejected a claim that giving municipal workers a holiday on Good Friday violated the Establishment Clause since the purpose of the holiday was to satisfy union demands, not to advance the religion of Christianity (Franks v. City of Niles, 29 Fair Empl. Prac. Cas. (BNA) 1114, N.D. Ohio, 1982).

On the other hand, courts are uniform in their conclusion that declaring Christmas Day a state holiday does not violate the Establishment Clause. Even the Seventh Circuit judges in Metzl v. Leininger (1995), who found the Illinois law making Good Friday a state holiday to violate the Establishment Clause, conceded that designating Christmas Day (and Thanksgiving Day) a state holiday did not offend the Constitution: “Some holidays that are religious, even sectarian, in origin, such as Christmas and Thanksgiving, have so far lost their religious connotation in the eyes of the general public . . . [that they] have only a trivial effect in promoting religion” (Metzl v. Leininger, 1995). Similarly, a federal district court judge in Ohio rejected a challenge to Christmas Day as a government holiday on the grounds that the day had become a secular holiday (Ganulin v. United States, 71 F. Supp. 2d 824, S.D. Ohio, 1999). Four justices of the U.S. Supreme Court in Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984), agreed that making Christmas Day a state holiday did not violate the Establishment Clause:

When government decides to recognize Christmas Day as a public holiday, it does no more than accommodate the calendar of public activities to the plain fact that many Americans will expect to spend time visiting with their families, attending religious ceremonies, and perhaps enjoying some respite from preholiday activities. The Free Exercise Clause, of course, does not necessarily compel the government to provide this accommodation, but neither is the Establishment Clause offended by such a step.

State statutes that prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on designated religious holidays have received limited judicial scrutiny. But in 1981, the Connecticut Supreme Court declared a state statute unconstitutional that prohibited the sale of alcohol on Good Friday, holding that such law constituted an establishment of the Christian religion (Griswold Inn v. State, 183 Conn. 552, 1981).

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

Brookman, Justin, The Constitutionality of the Good Friday Holiday, N.Y.U. L. Rev. 73 (1998): 193.

Hartenstein, John M., A Christmas Issue: Christian Holiday Celebration in the Public Elementary Schools is an Establishment of Religion, Cal. L. Rev. 80 (1992): 981.

Kleinfelder, Megan E., Good Friday, Just Another Spring Holiday? U. Cinn. L. Rev. 69 (2000): 329.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bridenbaugh v. O'Bannon, 185 F.3d 796 (7th Cir. 1999)

Cammack v. Waihee, 932 F.2d 765 (9th Cir. 1991)

Franks v. City of Niles, 29 Fair Empl. Prac. Cas. (BNA) 1114 (N.D. Ohio 1982)

Freedom From Religion Foundation v. Thompson, 920 F. Supp. 969 (W.D. Wisc. 1996)

Ganulin v. United States, 71 F. Supp. 2d 824 (S.D. Ohio 1999)

Granzeier v. Middleton, 173 F. 3d 568 (6th Cir. 1999)

Griswold Inn v. State, 183 Conn. 552 (1981)

Koenick v. Felton, 190 F. 3d 259 (4th Cir. 1999)

Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)

Mandel v. Hodges, 127 Cal. Rptr. 244 (1976)

Metzl v. Leininger, 57 F. 3d 618 (7th Cir. 1995)

See also Establishment Claus (I): History, Background, Framing; Sunday Closing Cases and Laws

DEATH PENALTY

See Capital Punishment

DEBS, EUGENE V. (1855–1926)

Eugene Debs was one of the most important figures in American labor history. He is most often remembered for being a proponent of socialism, but long before his time as the leader of the Socialist Party in the United States, Debs worked as a crusader for American workers. He was born to Alsatian immigrants and grew up in Terre Haute, Indiana. Debs left school at the age of fourteen to work for an Indiana railroad. As a young railway worker, he learned to appreciate the hardships that laborers endured on their jobs, leading him to pursue an active voice for workers' rights at a very young age.

Most of Debs's early labor activity involved the railroad. He quickly gained recognition through his involvement with the Terre Haute lodge of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and was elected the organization's secretary in 1875. Rising quickly through the ranks, he was recognized as the national secretary of the brotherhood by 1881. Initially, Debs held conservative views when it came to labor questions. For example, he argued against his group participating in the national railroad strikes of 1877.

It was at this time that Debs also gained an interest in participating in government. He first entered political service by running for city clerk of Terre Haute in 1879, and by 1885 he had enough support to win a seat in the Indiana State Assembly. Debs drew support from workers and business leaders in his hometown.

One of the qualities that allowed Eugene Debs to remain at the forefront of labor organization in the United States was his ability to change his ideals over time. When he first became involved in labor, he believed that small craft unions were more important than national organizations such as the Knights of Labor. For example, Debs refused to allow his members to participate in 1885 strikes against railroads brought by the Knights of Labor. Within a few years, however, Debs changed his views after seeing the inability of small labor organizations to deal with business managers effectively. Debs also began to speak out against the powers of corporate leaders in the United States, claiming that corporations hindered the majority of Americans from receiving a fair wage. By 1893, Debs had resigned as secretary of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and he began to organize a new labor organization, the American Railway Union (ARU).

Debs formed the American Railway Union in a politically charged atmosphere. Many members of the ARU came from the disgruntled ranks of the Pullman Palace Car Company. George Pullman angered labor leaders by his treatment of those that worked for his company. Pullman lowered wages, laid off workers, and raised prices at his company stores; his employees had no say in the matter. Pullman refused to listen to Debs's pleas for arbitration, so Debs led the American Railway Union into action. In June 1894, the union refused to handle Pullman cars and soon tied up most of the railroad traffic in the Midwest.

In response, the railroads brought in strikebreakers and developed a scheme to involve the federal government in the strike. Railroad leaders ordered the strikebreakers to attach Pullman cars to mail cars so that interfering with delivery of the mail would bring in the government. The U.S. attorney general as well as President Grover Cleveland used the power of the federal government to bring injunctions against labor leaders and enforce the timely delivery of the mails. The federal courts also brought cases against many of the labor activists, including Debs. On July 13, 1894, a federal district court sentenced Debs to six months in jail for violating a federal injunction. The sentence was upheld by the Supreme Court in the case of in re Debs (1895), in which the court claimed the sentence was just in protecting the interests of national sovereignty, where the government had the duty to protect interstate commerce and the delivery of the mails.

While in prison, Debs studied socialism and believed it could save the American worker. By 1897, he was putting together a socialist movement in the United States. Debs found success by building a coalition that embraced all viewpoints in the socialist sphere, ranging from moderate reformers to loyal Marxists. He soon organized the Social Democratic Party, mainly from holdovers from the American Railway Union. Debs ran for President in 1900 and received over four thousand votes. From this modest beginning, Debs became the leading spokesman for the Socialist Party in the United States. By the election of 1912, in a four-way race for the presidency with Woodrow Wilson, Theodore Roosevelt, and William Howard Taft, Debs received 6 percent of the vote, or almost nine hundred thousand votes.

Even though he never achieved the presidency, Debs tirelessly campaigned for workers' rights. He traveled the country participating in strikes and defending workers in industrial disputes. Debs also reached out to workers through print media when he became the associate editor of the Socialist publication, Appeal to Reason, in 1907.

Perhaps the greatest example of Debs's fiery rhetoric was leveled at the U.S. government for its participation in World War I. Debs declared that he was against all wars except for the one that would result in a worldwide socialist revolution. He urged American men not to serve in the military and spoke out against the war all over the country. For his remarks, Debs was prosecuted under the Alien and Sedition Act passed during the Wilson administration. He was eventually arrested and given a twenty-year prison sentence for encouraging resistance to the draft; he served three years in a federal prison in Atlanta, Georgia. While a prisoner in Atlanta, Debs made his final run for the presidency in 1920, polling over a million votes. On Christmas Day, 1921, the Republican president, Warren G. Harding, commuted Debs's sentence to time served and he was released. Debs spent the final years of his life in Terre Haute trying to recover his health from the time he spent in prison. He is remembered for tirelessly promoting the rights of all people and pushing for government reforms.

CHRISTOPHER R. TINGLE

References and Further Reading

- Currie, Harold W. Eugene V. Debs. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1976.
- Salvatore, Nick. Eugene V. Debs: Citizen and Socialist. Urbana: the University of Illinois Press, 1982.

DEBS v. UNITED STATES, 249 U.S. 211 (1919)

In Debs v. United States, the Supreme Court, in a unanimous opinion written by Justice Holmes, upheld the conviction of Eugene V. Debs, the American socialist, who was convicted of violating the Espionage Act of 1917, a statute that Congress enacted two months after the United States entered World War I. The Espionage Act made it unlawful to cause or attempt to cause insubordination or to obstruct recruitment for the armed forces. Debs had given two speeches opposing the war effort and the draft.

In affirming his conviction, the Court relied on the so-called “clear and present danger test,” which Justice Holmes had first articulated in the case of Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), another Espionage Act case decided during the same term in which the Court decided Debs. Although the First Amendment protects freedom of speech, the clear and present danger test allows speech to be punished “if the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent” (Schenck, 249 U.S. at 52).

The clear and present danger test rests on the idea that certain speech is fairly viewed as an act, and the government has the power to prohibit certain acts. On the authority of this test, Congress enacted the Smith Act in 1940, which prohibited advocating force to overthrow the U.S. government. The statute was used to punish political dissenters, principally communists, during World War II in the early 1940s and during the “red scare” in the late 1940s and 1950s.

Eventually, the clear and present danger test was replaced by the so-called incitement test, first articulated in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969). Under the incitement test, the government may punish only speech that is an incitement to imminent lawless action.

DAVID R. DOW

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

DEBTOR’S PRISONS

Debtor’s prisons existed in America from colonial days until the 1833 federal law abolishing the confinement of debtors. Federal debtor’s prisons may have been abolished in 1833, but they persisted in the states. Persons owing money to the local, state, or national government or to private citizens could be incarcerated to force the indebted to pay what they owed to the debtors. The majority of the inmates in debtor’s prisons owed money to private individuals. Their incarceration served as a persuasive method of collecting debt and as an incentive to others to settle debts. The prisoners lived in the debtor’s prisons and paid for their room, board, and meals from the “goalers” or “jailers.” The term “goal” applied to both prisons pronounced as “jail,” a term used in modern times. These prisons were separate from prisons housing those convicted of crimes.

Many debtor’s prisons grew overcrowded, and disease ran rampant in these unsanitary prisons. Many prisoners could not pay back their debts and relied on friends and relatives to pay what they owed in order to be freed from jail. The practice of using debtor’s prisons stopped as governments and people sought to use other methods of debt collection, such as property confiscation, without resorting to prisons. In modern America, people are still put into prison for nonpayment of alimony, various instances of fraud, refusal to pay child support, and other monetary violations. The debt owed in these cases is substantially higher than that owed by those jailed in colonial years. The system of debtor’s prisons is gone, but the law continues utilizing incarceration as a form of persuasion for debt collection.

JASON M. SOKIERA

References and Further Reading

Holton, Woody. Forced Founders: Indians, Debtors, Slaves, and the Making of the American Revolution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.
Rhode, Steve. “The History of Credit and Debt,” http://www.myvesta.org/history/history_debtorprison.htm, (2003).

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

The Declaration of Independence stands as a rejection of British tyranny as well as the emboldened embrace of a republican form of democracy that has, albeit imperfectly, stood the test of time in America. The Declaration of Independence draws from and expanded upon a notion of natural rights—the principle that government’s role in relation to its people is to provide for the protection of certain key rights that derive from nature and are therefore inalienable and fundamental. After brief introductory remarks regarding the need for independence, the often quoted second paragraph begins: “We hold these truths to be self evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.” It continues by describing the role of government in a republican democracy so as to secure these rights and describes the foundation for government as not being divined from the heavens (as in the British system), but from the people.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

It is no surprise that Jefferson then outlined the many colonial grievances against British rule, including taxation without representation, since the notion of a people-based democratic rule constituted an overwhelming rejection of the tyrannical rule of unchecked power over the citizenry the colonists had suffered at the hands of the English. The Declaration of Independence persists as an outline of American popular governance. Since government derives its sovereignty from the people via the polls, it is thus subject to ongoing revision through the casting of ballots by the electorate. Next, the government cannot infringe on certain core “unalienable rights” of the people, such as the right to due process of liberty or the protection against governmental takings of property without just compensation. There is also a lasting irony in the notion that while the founding fathers rejected the subservience of British rule, they at the same time struggled with the enslavement of African Americans on their own shores. Slavery in America defied some of the principles of freedom for all, a notion that embodied the words of American independence.

JAMES F. Van ORDEN

References and Further Reading

Becker, Carl. The Declaration of Independence. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1922.

DEFAMATION AND FREE SPEECH

To be defamed is to be falsely described. To bear false witness against someone has been prohibited since biblical times. That prohibition can be found in Exodus, the second book of the Bible. Later, Iago in Shakespeare’s Othello said, “Good name in man and woman, dear my lord, is the immediate jewel of their souls: Who steals my purse steels trash . . . But he that filches from me my good name robs me of that which not enriches him, and makes me poor indeed.” In modern times, in the United States, states seek to protect their citizens from harm caused by statements that steal one’s good name by letting their citizens recover damages by means of tort law. A tort is a civil wrong that allows someone who is wronged to bring a lawsuit to recover compensation for harm caused by the wrong. The tort of defamation enables someone whose good name has been stolen—who has been defamed—to bring a lawsuit to seek monetary compensation for damage to reputation and for emotional distress.

Because defamation is a tort, it is developed by states, not the federal government, through their judicial decisions or legislative enactments. Because there are fifty states, as well as the District of Columbia and U.S. territories, each of which formulates its own tort law, defamation law can vary from state to state.

General Principles of Defamation

Despite variations among states as to the scope of defamation law, defamation has some consistent principles. Defamation is speech: libel is written, slander is oral. For a statement to be defamatory, generally it must be about an individual, it must be published, and it must tend to injure that individual’s reputation in the community. Publication does not necessarily mean printed and distributed, although that is a familiar method of publication. A statement can also be published if it is overheard by someone other than the person defamed. The definition of community may also be debated. One can ask whether a statement is defamatory if its injury comes from what a small group of people will think of the person defamed, or whether the opprobrium must come from a larger population. If a plaintiff proves that he or she has been defamed, the next step is to seek compensation.

Tort actions protect citizens from harm by compensating them for that harm. Besides benefiting the plaintiff, compensation for harm can also deter a tortfeasor from committing further harm. The availability of compensatory damages can deter others as well. In addition to awarding compensatory damages, juries may also award punitive damages against a tortfeasor, another deterrent. One purpose of the availability of damages in defamation law, therefore, is to deter harmful speech.

While speech can cause harm, speech is also protected from governmental infringement by the First Amendment to the Constitution. Thus arises a conflict between a state’s use of its judicial system to protect its citizens from harmful speech and society’s goal of encouraging robust debate free from state interference. Beginning in 1964 with New York Times v. Sullivan, 367 U.S., 254 (1964), the Supreme Court of the United States decided a number of cases to balance those competing interests.

New York Times v. Sullivan*—Actual Malice Standard for Public Figures

In 1960, the New York Times published an advertisement signed by the “Committee to Defend Martin Luther King and the Struggle for Freedom in the South.” The advertisement said that “thousands of Southern Negro students are engaged in widespread nonviolent demonstrations in positive affirmation of the right to live in human dignity as guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and the Bill of Rights.” It accused the police in Montgomery, Alabama, of terrorizing those students. L.B. Sullivan was the elected city commissioner who supervised the police. Because some of the statements in the advertisement were incorrect, he sued the New York Times for defamation and recovered $500,000. In reversing that recovery, the Supreme Court said erroneous statement is inevitable in free debate and held that in order to protect debate, the First Amendment required a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood unless he proves that the statement was made with “actual malice,” that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. This statement has become the widely quoted standard for determining when a public officer may recover damages for defamation.

In 1967, the Supreme Court applied this actual malice standard to actions brought against public figures. The result of this standard is that a plaintiff’s claim for defamation will be dismissed, and therefore will not go to trial, unless the plaintiff has evidence that would prove that the defamer acted with malice as defined by the Supreme Court. If a plaintiff does present evidence at trial, he or she can only recover damages if the jury believes the evidence about malice. Proving malice is a high hurdle for a public official or a public figure to overcome. Because of this, if an official or public figure loses a defamation case, the loss does not necessarily mean that the challenged statements are true, only that the publisher did not act with malice.

Negligence Standard for Private Individuals

In 1974, the Supreme Court decided Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S., 323 (1974). That defamation case was brought by Elmer Gertz, a lawyer who was neither a public official nor a public figure. He had represented the family of a man who was killed by a policeman. The policeman had been convicted of the man’s murder, and the family was suing him for damages. Robert Welch, Inc. published a magazine that warned of a conspiracy to discredit local police so that they would be replaced by people who would support a communist dictatorship. The magazine published a story that falsely accused Gertz of being a communist and of helping to frame the policeman. The jury awarded Gertz $50,000, but the verdict was overruled by the judge because Gertz had not proved that the magazine editor had acted with malice when he published the author’s story. Gertz, therefore, recovered nothing.

In Gertz, because the plaintiff was a private individual, the Supreme Court rebalanced a state’s interest in protecting reputations with the Constitutional interest in protecting speech. The Court sent the case back to the trial court to apply a standard different from the New York Times malice standard. The new standard articulated in Gertz that is applicable to private individuals differs from the standard of Sullivan in two ways. First, a private plaintiff can bring suit by showing that the defendant acted with some fault, even if the fault does not amount to malice. If the plaintiff cannot prove malice, however, the manner in which a plaintiff can prove damages is limited. Unlike in Sullivan, in which no justice dissented, in Gertz the justices split, five votes to four. Two of the dissenters would have reinstated the jury’s verdict and allowed state law to govern. In contrast, the other two would not have permitted liability on a showing of mere negligence.

Negligence

The standard that the Court articulated in Gertz was that a private individual did not need to prove malice, but could recover for defamation by proving that the defendant was merely negligent. The Court explained that a different standard is necessary for private plaintiffs because they do not have the same access to the media to deliver their messages as public officials and public figures have. The Court did not give states free rein to determine how to apply defamation law to private individuals, however. The Court held that the First Amendment limited damages for these plaintiffs to recovery of actual damages, but not the usual presumed damages often awarded in defamation cases. The significance of this ruling requires an understanding of the unusual remedial structure of defamation law.

Damages for Defamation

In most tort actions a plaintiff must present evidence of harm before a jury can award damages to compensate the harm. In defamation per se actions, however, traditionally a jury could award presumed damages to the plaintiff. Defamation is per se when the defamatory statement is particularly injurious, such as an accusation of the commission of a crime. For defamation per se, a jury could assess damages, not based on evidence of actual injury to the plaintiff but rather based on the seriousness of the defamatory statement. A jury could presume from the egregiousness of the statement that it must have caused damage. From that presumption the jury could award whatever amount it determines to be appropriate. In that case the plaintiff is not required to produce any evidence that the statement actually harmed his or her reputation or caused emotional distress.

Not all defamatory statements would entitle a plaintiff to presumed damages. If the statement is not defamatory on its face, it will be labeled per quod. Often such statements are defamatory only because those who hear them know the context. In many states that lesser libel or slander may not be actionable unless the plaintiff can prove that the statement caused special damages, which are measurable economic losses such as lost wages. Without proof of economic injury, a plaintiff cannot bring suit, cannot prove that the statement is defamatory, and cannot recover for harm to reputation or emotional distress. In this way defamation law eliminates cases deemed less important, with importance measured by whether or not the plaintiff was injured financially. This approach devalues the impact of mental anguish but is consistent with other traditional areas of tort law, which do not recognize mental anguish as a compensable harm. Consistent with that approach, some states require a plaintiff to prove that his or her reputation was damaged by the defamation before permitting recovery for emotional distress.

In Gertz, the Court held that without proof of malice, a plaintiff could not recover traditional presumed damages because the largely uncontrolled discretion of juries to award damages where there is no loss unnecessarily compounds the potential of any system of liability for defamatory falsehood to inhibit the vigorous exercise of First Amendment freedoms. Elimination of presumed damages for negligent, but not malicious, defamation means that a private plaintiff must prove actual harm to reputation or prove emotional distress.

The Supreme Court was explicit, however, that after proving loss, whether economic, reputational, or emotional, a plaintiff could recover both special damages: those out-of-pocket economic losses as well as damages for harm to reputation and for humiliation and mental anguish. The Court did not set the constitutional bar for recovery so that damages would be recoverable only if the defamatory statement caused economic injury. While state law cannot permit greater recovery for defamation than allowed under the First Amendment, states may permit less. Thus, some states may retain the traditional rule that to recover anything for certain types of defamatory statements, a plaintiff must prove economic injury (special damages).

Truth

Another legal presumption that the Supreme Court invalidated as interfering with vigorous debate was the traditional presumption that a defamatory statement is false; truth is a defense that, if proved, would enable a defendant to avoid liability. In Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767 (1986), the Supreme Court held that when a plaintiff sues a media defendant for defamation, if the statement involves a matter of public concern the plaintiff must bear the burden of proving that the statement is false. Allocation of burden of proof is a procedural matter that becomes important when evidence is inconclusive—when neither party can prove the truth or falsity of a statement. When that evidence is inconclusive, the party who needs to prove something (who has the burden of proof) will lose. The Supreme Court said that requiring a media defendant to prove the truth of a matter of public concern deters such speech because of the fear that liability will unjustifiably result. As in Gertz, the justices in Hepps split five votes to four. The four dissenters stated that requiring a private person to prove that a defamatory statement is false gives a character assassin an absolute license to defame by means of statements that can be neither verified nor disproved.

Private Plaintiffs and Matters of Private Concern

In 1985, a little over twenty years after having decided Sullivan, the Supreme Court ruled that state defamation law may apply without constitutional restrictions in suits that do not involve matters of public concern. The case, Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, 472 U.S. 749 (1985), involved an incorrect statement in a credit report about a private company. The report was sent to five subscribers, with the caveat that the subscribers were not to reveal the information. Greenmoss Builders brought suit in defamation, and the jury awarded it $50,000 in presumed or compensatory damages and $300,000 in punitive damages. The jury did not find malice as defined by Sullivan. This raised the question of whether the standard of Gertz for recovery of damages should apply, which would allow recovery only for proven damages.

In Greenmoss, none of the opinions written by the justices had more than four votes. A majority of justices agreed on the result of the case, but not the reasoning. Four of the justices distinguished Greenmoss from Gertz on the ground that the statements in Greenmoss were not matters of public concern. Those justices reasoned that speech that is not of public concern has reduced constitutional value and its protection is outweighed by the state's interest in protecting a person's good name—a basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human that is at the root of any decent system of ordered liberty. Two justices who concurred in the result would overrule Gertz to allow the states more freedom to apply their defamation laws to protect private individuals.

One of those justices, Justice White, questioned the wisdom of the Sullivan case, with which he joined in 1964. In retrospect, he would recommend limiting damages in cases involving public matters in a Gertz-like manner rather than require a showing of malice before an action may be brought. According to Justice White, the malice standard has created two evils: first that the stream of information about public officials and public affairs is polluted by false information, and second that the defeated plaintiff may be destroyed by falsehoods that might have been avoided with a reasonable effort to investigate the facts. Four justices in Greenmoss dissented on the ground that even speech about economic matters such as credit reports implicates matters of public concern. Those four would have retained the rules articulated in Gertz for Greenmoss, limiting recovery to proven damages and not permitting recovery of presumed or punitive damages.

CANDACE SAARI KOVACIC-FLEISCHER

References and Further Reading

- Bollinger, Lee C., and Geoffrey R. Stone, eds. Eternally Vigilant: Free Speech in the Modern Era. Chicago: Chicago University Press, 2002.
- Smolla, Rodney A. Law of Defamation, 2nd ed., Eagan, Minn.: Thomson West, last update 2005.
- Sullivan, Kathleen M., and Gerald Gunther. Sullivan and Gunther's First Amendment Law, 2nd ed. University Casebook Series, St. Paul, Minn.: Thomson West Press, 2003.

DEFENSE OF MARRIAGE ACT

On September 21, 1996, the Defense of Marriage Act was signed into law. It was developed in response to the possibility and fear that same-sex marriage might soon become legal, at least in Hawaii. In the House Committee on the Judiciary's Report on the Defense of Marriage Act, the committee referred to the Hawaii case as an orchestrated legal assault being waged against traditional heterosexual marriage by gay rights groups and lawyers. In Baehr v. Lewin, 852 P.2d 44 (1993), individuals whose applications for marriage were denied solely on the ground that they were of the same sex filed a complaint alleging that the denial of licenses violated their right to privacy and equal protection as guaranteed by the Hawaii Constitution. The First Circuit Court, City and County of Honolulu, granted the defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, and the plaintiffs appealed.

The Hawaii Supreme Court held that pursuant to the Hawaiian Constitution, the applicant couples did not have a fundamental constitutional right to same-sex marriage arising out of the right to privacy or otherwise. Moreover, the court held that pursuant to the Hawaiian Constitution, sex was a suspect classification for purposes of equal protection analysis and was subject to the strict scrutiny test. Therefore, the statute in question was presumed to be unconstitutional unless on remand the defendant Lewin surpassed the requirements set forth under the strict scrutiny test.

The Defense of Marriage Act has two primary purposes. The first is to defend the institution of traditional heterosexual marriage. The second is to protect the right of the states to formulate and determine their own public policy in regards to the implications that might result in the recognition by one state of the right for homosexual couples to acquire marriage licenses.

The act, which allows other states to disregard completely an otherwise valid same-sex marriage, has two distinct parts. Section 2, entitled "Powers Reserved to the States," amends 28 U.S.C. 1738 by adding a new section, 1738C to provide that:

No State, territory, or possession of the United States, or Indian tribe shall be required to give effect to any public act, record, or judicial proceeding of any other State, territory, possession or tribe respecting a relationship between persons of the same sex that is treated as a marriage under the laws of such other State, territory, possession or tribe, or a right or claim arising from such relationship.

The committee would emphasize the narrowness of this provision in that it merely provides that, in the event that Hawaii or some other state permits same-sex couples to marry, other states will not be obligated or required, by operation of the Full Faith and Credit Clause of the U.S. Constitution, to recognize that marriage, or any right or claim arising from it. Section 2 therefore is concerned exclusively with the potential interstate implications that might result from a decision by one state to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples. Proponents of interstate recognition of same-sex marriage assert that the language of the Full Faith and Credit Clause of the U.S. Constitution requires states to give full faith and credit to such marriages performed in other states.

Section 3 defines marriage for federal purposes by providing that:

In determining the meaning of any Act of Congress, or any ruling, regulation, or interpretation of the various administrative bureaus and agencies of the United States, the word "marriage" means only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife, the word spouse refers only to a person of the opposite sex who is a husband or a wife.

There is nothing novel about the definitions contained in Section 3. The definition of marriage is derived from The State of Washington, Singer v. Hara, 522 P.2d 1187, 1191-92 (Wash. App. 1974); that definition—a legal union of one man and one woman as husband and wife—has found its way into the standard law dictionary. It is fully consistent with the Supreme Court's reference, over one hundred years ago, to the union for life of one man and one woman in the holy estate of matrimony. The definition of spouse obviously derives from and is consistent with this definition of marriage.

The most important aspect of this provision is that it applies to federal law only. It does not, therefore, have any effect on the manner in which any state might choose to define the words "marriage" and "spouse." The determination of who may marry in the United States is uniquely a function of state law. The general rule for determining the validity of a marriage is lex celebrationis—that is, a marriage is valid if it is valid according to the law of the place where it was celebrated.

The legal and social implications of the Defense of Marriage Act will have a profound impact in the arena of civil rights. By passing this act, Congress is not only condoning discrimination against same-sex couples but is also perpetuating it. Specifically precluding same-sex couples from marrying perpetuates discrimination against same-sex couples, just as miscegenation laws perpetuated racial discrimination. The consequences include denying these couples the rights and benefits of marriage such as inheritance rights, as well as making the children of such marriages illegitimate if these families were to cross state lines.

Such rights and benefits are by no means nominal. Legal as well as economic benefits extended to spouses include property rights, tax breaks, veterans' and social security benefits, testamentary benefits, recovery for loss of consortium, employment benefits, lower insurance premiums, spousal testimonial privileges, financial support upon separation, and status of next of kin to make medical decisions or burial arrangements. Furthermore, laws that make class-based distinctions, whether based upon race, gender, sexual orientation, or religion, proclaim to the world that the targeted group is different and should be treated as such.

MARIANGELA VALLE-PETERS

References and Further Reading

- Ryan, Brett P., Love and Let Love: Same Sex Marriage, Past, Present, and Future and the Constitutionality of DOMA, U. Haw. L. Rev. 22 (2000): 185.
- Paige, Rebecca S., Wagging the Dog—If the State of Hawaii Accepts Same-Sex Marriage Will Other States Have to? An Examination of Conflict of Laws and Escape Devices, Am. U. L. Rev. 47 (1997): 165.
- Treuthart, Mary Patricia, Adopting a More Realistic Definition of "Family," Gonz. L. Rev. 26 (1991): 91.
- Eskridge William N. Jr., A History of Same-Sex Marriage, Va. L. Rev. 79 (1993): 1419.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Murphy v. Ramsey*, 114 U.S. 15, 45 (1885)
28 U.S.C. §1738(c)
1 U.S.C. §7
H.R. Rep. 104-664, 1996 U.S.C.C.A.N 2905 (1996)
U.S. Const. art. IV, §1 (Full Faith and Credit Clause)

See also Same-Sex Marriage Legalization

DEFENSE, RIGHT TO PRESENT

The Constitution guarantees a criminal defendant the right to present a complete defense to the charges against him or her. The right to present a defense is not explicitly stated in the Constitution, and the Supreme Court did not speak of a general right of criminal defendants to present evidence until the twentieth century. Indeed, many American jurisdictions placed severe restrictions on the ability of defendants to present evidence in their defense until relatively recent times. For example, many jurisdictions in the nineteenth century flatly precluded criminal defendants from testifying in their own behalf because it was thought that they were likely to perjure themselves. It was not until the Supreme Court's 1960 decision in Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570 (1961), that all such bans were finally declared unconstitutional.

By the middle of the twentieth century, however, the Supreme Court had begun to recognize a general right to present a defense and, over the next several decades, the Court found the right to be implied by several different constitutional provisions. In 1948, in In re Oliver, 233 U.S. 257 (1948), the Supreme Court declared that the Due Process Clause provides a criminal defendant "an opportunity to be heard in his defense," including the right "to offer testimony." In Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988), the Court held that the Sixth Amendment Compulsory Process Clause guarantees defendants the right not only to subpoena favorable witnesses but also to present their testimony. Finally, in Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987), the Court recognized that the Fifth Amendment Self-Incrimination Clause, as well as the Compulsory Process and Due Process Clauses, implies that a criminal defendant has the right to present his or her testimony as part of the defense case.

Litigation over the right to present a defense usually arises when a jurisdiction's evidentiary rules preclude criminal defendants from presenting certain types of evidence in their defense. Since the right to present a defense is of constitutional magnitude, the Supreme Court has held that rules of evidence and criminal procedure must occasionally yield to a defendant's need to introduce evidence in his or her favor.

Therefore, the Court concluded in Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973), that the defendant's due process right to present a defense outweighed a state rule against hearsay evidence that had been invoked to exclude testimony that another man had confessed to the crime for which the defendant was on trial. Similarly, the Court declared in Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967), that the defendant's Compulsory Process Clause right to obtain witnesses in his favor trumped a state rule barring the defendant from presenting the testimony of his or her alleged accomplices and codefendants. In Cool v. United States, 409 U.S. 100 (1972), the Court ruled that a judge unconstitutionally burdened the defendant's Compulsory Process Clause right to call a codefendant who testified in her favor by instructing the jury that it should be exceptionally cautious in accepting the codefendant's testimony. The Court held in Rock that a state rule barring a witness whose testimony had been hypnotically refreshed had to yield to the defendant's constitutional right to testify in her defense.

However, the right to present a defense is not absolute, and the Supreme Court has upheld several types of limitations on the right. First, the exclusion of defense evidence may be justified by society's interest in conducting orderly trials. Thus, defense evidence may be excluded if the defendant fails to abide by the rules of pretrial discovery or is attempting to surprise the prosecutor unfairly. Therefore, in Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), the Court upheld state laws requiring defendants to give pretrial notice of their intent to present certain defenses, such as alibi and insanity, or face exclusion of evidence relating to those defenses; the Court has also upheld exclusion as a sanction for other types of discovery violations. In Taylor, for example, the Court affirmed a judge's ruling excluding the testimony of a defense witness as a sanction against defense counsel who had failed to disclose his plan to call the witness until the trial was underway.

Second, a defendant's right to present a defense may yield to local rules designed to improve the reliability of the trial process. Therefore, in United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303 (1998), the Supreme Court upheld a military justice rule that precluded the defendant from presenting polygraph evidence in his favor. The Court explained that "state and federal rulemakers have broad latitude under the Constitution to establish rules excluding evidence from criminal trials. Such rules do not abridge an accused's right to present a defense so long as they are not 'arbitrary' or 'disproportionate' to the purposes they are designed to serve."

Third, the Supreme Court has curtailed the right to present a defense by limiting the right to the introduction of evidence in support of the defense. The Court held in Gilmore v. Taylor, 508 U.S. 333 (1993), that the right to present a defense does not, therefore, include the right to have the judge deliver instructions to the jury in support of the defense.

Fourth, a jurisdiction may entirely eliminate the right to present a particular defense entirely by changing the law so as to eliminate the defense. For example, the Supreme Court in Montana v. Egelhoff, 518 U.S. 37 (1996), upheld a state law prohibiting defendants from proving that they lack the mental state necessary to be guilty of a crime by introducing evidence of their voluntary intoxication. The Court in Egelhoff viewed the prohibition on defense evidence of voluntary intoxication as permissible because states have traditionally been accorded the freedom to define crimes and the available defenses to those crimes.

Even with these limitations, criminal defendants still enjoy a core constitutional right to present relevant and reliable evidence in support of their defenses. Subject to reasonable rules designed to assure a fair and orderly trial, a defendant must be permitted to present favorable witnesses and evidence. The right to present a defense thus protects defendants from those local authorities who may otherwise be all too willing to tilt the scales of justice in favor of the prosecutor.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.
Westen, Peter, The Compulsory Process Clause, Michigan Law Review 73 (1974): 71.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973)
Cool v. United States, 409 U.S. 100 (1972)
Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570 (1961)
Gilmore v. Taylor, 508 U.S. 333 (1993)
In re Oliver, 233 U.S. 257 (1948)
Montana v. Egelhoff, 518 U.S. 37 (1996)
Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987)
Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988)
United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303 (1998)
Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)
Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970)

See also Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973); Due Process; Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987); Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background; Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988); Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)

DEFIANCE OF THE COURT'S BAN ON SCHOOL PRAYER

For much of the twentieth century, religion was an important part of the curriculum in many K–12 public schools. In the early 1960s, however, the Supreme Court held that prayer and Bible reading were unconstitutional in those schools. In Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), the Court held that a short nondenominational prayer composed by the New York Board of Regents and recommended by it for daily use in the public schools violated the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. The Court reasoned that “in this country it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as a part of a religious program carried on by government.” The following year, in Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963), the Court held that it was unconstitutional for school boards to require the reading of Bible passages or the recitation of the Lord’s Prayer in public schools. The Court declared: “In the relationship between man and religion, the state is firmly committed to a position of neutrality.” In both cases the Court forcefully asserted that the separation of church and state was best for government and for religion.

Among religious leaders, conservative Christian evangelicals and Roman Catholics were the primary opponents of the decisions. The vast majority of Protestant leaders and organizations approved of Engel and Schempp. Indeed, after Engel, thirty-one Protestant leaders published a manifesto asserting that the Court’s ruling protected “the integrity of the religious conscience and the proper function of religious and governmental institutions.” Jewish leaders, moved in part by a concern about their minority status in an overwhelmingly Christian nation, concurred in supporting public secularism.

Despite the opinions of many religious leaders, the majority of Americans disagreed with the Court. Indeed, the school prayer and Bible reading decisions were met with strong opposition and noncompliance from the public. The Supreme Court received five thousand letters denouncing Engel, and a Gallup Poll showed that 80 percent of Americans favored prayer in the public schools. Critics accused the Court of secularizing the United States and promoting communist atheism. Disturbed by the intensity of the public response to Engel, Justice Clark took the unusual step of denouncing press coverage of the case in an American Bar Association speech.

Engel and Schempp were openly defied in the South, where public officials encouraged the resistance, and in the Midwest. There was a greater degree of compliance with the decisions in the rest of the country. When school boards continued classroom religious practices in northern states, states attorneys general ordered them to stop doing so. Despite the resistance, Engel and Schempp worked changes in classroom practices. One national survey showed that the percentage of classrooms in which prayers were recited declined from 60 percent before 1962 to 28 percent in the 1964–1965 school year; the percentage in which Bible reading was taking place declined from 48 to 22 percent.

Congress also responded strongly to the Court’s decisions. Within days of the Engel decision, senators introduced five proposed constitutional amendments to overturn it, and the House received twenty-nine proposals to revoke the Court’s ruling. By 1975, 215 such amendments had been introduced in Congress. While none of those proposed amendments was successful (they were opposed by the majority of Protestant religious leaders and the Catholic Church eventually adopted a neutral stance), the proponents of school prayer did get Congress to enact the 1984 Equal Access Act. The act, which the Court upheld in

Board of Education v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 247 (1990), provides that K–12 public schools must treat student religious groups who wish to use meeting rooms equally with nonreligious groups.

Those concerned about the diminishing role of religion in the United States have also tried to work around the Engel and Schempp decisions. More than twenty years after those decisions, twenty-five states permitted or required that a moment of silence be observed in public school classrooms. In Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), the Supreme Court held that one such statute, a 1981 Alabama statute authorizing a period of silence “for meditation or voluntary prayer,” violated the Establishment Clause because it had no secular legislative purpose and was a poorly disguised effort to return prayer to public schools. More recently, the Court has sustained Establishment Clause challenges to prayers at public school graduations (Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 1992) and at high school football games (Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290, 2000). In both cases the Court held that government may not coerce anyone to support or participate in a religious exercise. Notwithstanding the Court’s consistent position banning prayer and Bible reading in public schools, noncompliance continues to be a problem.

DENISE C. MORGAN

References and Further Reading

- Alley, Robert S. School Prayer: The Court, the Congress, and the First Amendment. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1994.
- Dent, George W., Jr., Religious Children, Secular Schools, Southern California Law Review 61 (1988): 4:864–942.
- Jeffries, John C., Jr., and Ryan, James E., A Political History of the Establishment Clause, Michigan Law Review 100 (2001): 2:279–370.

DEFINING RELIGION

The First Amendment prohibits laws “respecting an establishment of religion” or “prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” Three terms are crucial to determining the meaning of the religion clauses of the First Amendment: “establishment of religion,” “free exercise,” and “religion.” Much of the debate over the meaning of the religion clauses concerns the first two terms, but the meaning of the third term is equally important and in many respects even more difficult to resolve. Defining religion is crucial because the First Amendment prohibits the government from “establishing” a set of beliefs and practices only if those beliefs and practices fall within the category of “religion.” Likewise, the government’s general authority to regulate behavior is much more constrained if that behavior can be characterized as “religious.”

The task of defining “religion” as that term is used in the First Amendment religion clauses is complicated by the fact that the courts often seem to apply one definition of religion to problems arising under the Establishment Clause and a different definition to problems arising under the Free Exercise Clause. This task will become more difficult as the country becomes religiously more diverse. An increasing number of citizens belong to nontraditional faiths, and their beliefs will not always fit easily within the framework of Western religion with which the courts are most familiar.

Traditional Definitions of Religion

Until the middle of the twentieth century, the task of defining constitutionally protected religion was viewed by the Supreme Court as a relatively simple one. During the nineteenth century the constitutional significance of religion was often viewed as coextensive with the dominance of the Christian faith. In Justice Joseph Story’s 1851 Commentaries on the Constitution, for example, he wrote that the “real object of the [First Amendment] was, not to countenance, much less to advance, Mahometanism, or Judaism, or infidelity, by prostrating Christianity; but to exclude all rivalry among Christian sects, and to prevent any national ecclesiastical establishment.” Although the Supreme Court never took quite such a narrowly focused view of the subject, until well into the twentieth century the Court continued to define religion in a way that coincided with Christianity and other Western religions. In United States v. Mcintosh, 283 U.S. 605 (1931), Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes described religion in the most traditional manner possible: “The essence of religion is belief in a relation to God involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation.”

Broadening the Definition of Religion: The Conscientious Objector Cases

A series of cases involving conscientious objectors to the draft during the Vietnam War caused the Court to move beyond the traditional definition of religion in First Amendment cases. These cases involved a provision of the military conscription laws that exempted from military service individuals who were conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form because of their “religious training and belief.” The statute defined “religious training and belief” in the traditional way as “an individual’s belief in a relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation, but [not including] essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views or a merely personal moral code.” If the Court had adhered to the literal meaning of this provision, it would have been faced with a statute that would deny conscientious objector status to many different groups of believers, agnostics, and atheists whose views on religion did not fit the traditional model.

In contrast to the narrow precision of its previous opinions on the subject, the Court took a more ecumenical and open-ended approach to the definition of religion in its conscientious objector cases. The Court started by asserting that “in no field of human endeavor has the tool of language proved so inadequate in the communication of ideas as it has in dealing with the fundamental questions of man’s predicament in life, in death or in final judgment and retribution.” The Court then attributed to Congress the intent to include within its conscientious objector provision “the ever-broadening understanding of the modern religious community.”

The Court thus interpreted the statutory term “religious” by reference to the broad ideas of modern theologians such as Paul Tillich. At one point the Court noted that, in developing its standard, it was reminded of Tillich’s notion that God is “the source of your being, of your ultimate concern, of what you take seriously without any reservation.” The Court derived the basic holding of the case from this concept of an “ultimate concern.” According to the Court, the statutory term “religious training and belief” applied to anyone who expressed a “sincere and meaningful belief which occupies in the life of its possessor a place parallel to that filled by the God of those admittedly qualifying for the exemption.” The Court then used this definition to extend conscientious objector status to several individuals whose religious views were abstract and theologically unspecific. In a later decision the Court would extend its broad approach to the concept of religion to cover applicants whose views bordered on atheism.

Bifurcating the Definition of Religion

Despite the fact that the Court’s conscientious objector decisions technically only involved a matter of statutory interpretation, the decisions had clear constitutional overtones. Indeed, Justice Harlan noted that the Court’s rather tortured interpretation of the statute was necessary because “limiting this draft exemption to those opposed to war in general because of theistic beliefs runs afoul of the religious clauses of the First Amendment.” Thus, the Court’s broad interpretation of religion became the touchstone of the Court’s modern Free Exercise Clause decisions. Under these decisions, the Court extended constitutional protection to members of nontraditional religious groups, such as the Native American Church, as well as individuals whose religious beliefs were derived solely from their individual religious introspection, rather than from a specific organized faith.

The Court has not, however, applied this same expansive view of religion to its interpretations of the Establishment Clause. At first glance, this seems inconsistent with the constitutional text, which mentions the word religion only once and seems to imply that the term should be defined identically with regard to both clauses. The problem with this interpretation is that it would create serious difficulties for any modern government. Everything that modern government does in some way exerts an impact on what some people “take seriously without reservation.” If this expansive definition were used consistently in all First Amendment contexts, virtually everything the government does would potentially be activity “respecting an establishment of religion.”

In response to this problem, some constitutional theorists have suggested bifurcating the First Amendment definition of religion. Under this scheme, the courts would use a broad definition of religion in enforcing the Free Exercise Clause (to provide the broadest possible protection of individual liberty) and a narrow definition in enforcing the Establishment Clause (to give government the broadest possible authority in the areas of education and social services). One such suggestion is Laurence Tribe’s early recommendation that the Free Exercise Clause should protect all “arguably religious” activities and that the Establishment Clause should permit government to engage in any “arguably nonreligious” action.

This suggestion generated its own negative response. There are two main criticisms of the argument for a bifurcated definition of religion. The first is that this argument conflicts with the unitary implications of the constitutional text. The second is that a bifurcated definition would create three different tiers of religion, each of which would receive different constitutional treatment. Under such a system, a traditional form of religious belief would be unquestionably religious and therefore actions motivated by this belief would receive free exercise protection, but the religion would be prohibited from receiving direct government support or endorsement. Conversely, secular beliefs that are unquestionably nonreligious would receive no free-exercise protection, but would not be barred under the Establishment Clause from receiving direct government support or endorsement. Any category of beliefs and actions that included some religious elements along with some secular elements, however, would receive favorable treatment under both constitutional provisions because such beliefs would be arguably religious and arguably nonreligious.

Modern Definitions for Establishment Clause Cases

For whatever reason, the Supreme Court has never adopted a bifurcated definition of religion. It has also, however, never defined religion in the Establishment Clause context. In Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987), a case involving state-mandated teaching of creationism, the Court emphasized that “concepts concerning God or a supreme being of some sort are manifestly religious”; however, the Court has never stated whether any other indicia of religion are necessary or sufficient to trigger the application of the Establishment Clause. The lower courts have occasionally mentioned other factors that contribute to a finding that a particular set of beliefs is religious. In one prominent case, Judge Arlen Adams mentions three factors: whether the beliefs concern fundamental problems of human existence; whether the beliefs purport to provide a comprehensive belief system; and whether the beliefs include the formal indicia of religion, such as an administrative structure, rituals, clergy, liturgies, and holidays.

The Supreme Court has embraced no single test that will definitively determine in every case whether an Establishment Clause case implicates “religion.” Conversely, the test for religion announced by the Court in the conscientious objector cases is so broad that the Free Exercise Clause is potentially implicated in a variety of different contexts. In the end, the courts seem to have settled on an instrumental as well as intuitive definition of religion. The definition applied in the Establishment Clause context is narrow enough to permit the government to do its modern job of providing social services and operating public schools that teach a broad range of subjects (including controversial topics such as morality and evolution). Conversely, the definition of religion applied in the free-exercise context is expansive enough to avoid having any citizen suffer at the hands of the government solely because that person’s unpopular religious beliefs offend the political and religious majority.

STEVEN G. GEY

References and Further Reading

- Choper, Jesse H., Defining “Religion” in the First Amendment, U. Ill. L. Rev. 579 (1982).
 Feofanov, Dmitry N., Defining Religion: An Immodest Proposal, Hofstra L. Rev. 23 (1994): 309.
 Freeman, George, The Misguided Search for the Constitutional Definition of “Religion,” Ga. L. J. 71 (1983): 1519.
 Greenawalt, Kent, Religion as a Concept in Constitutional Law, Calif. L. Rev. 72 (1984): 753.
Note, Toward a Constitutional Definition of Religion, Harv. L. Rev. 91 (1978): 1056.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- United States v. Macintosh*, 283 U.S. 605 (1931)
United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965)

See also Accommodation of Religion; Atheism; Ceremonial Deism; Concept of “Christian Nation” in American Jurisprudence; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Religion in “Public Square” Debate; Selective Draft Law Cases (1918), Selective Service Act of 1917

DEJONGE v. OREGON, 299 U.S. 353 (1937)

In 1934, about three hundred people attended a meeting organized by the Communist Party in Portland, Oregon, to support a maritime workers’ strike. Fewer than 15 percent of them were Communist Party members. Speaker Dirk DeJonge, a party member, spoke against police shootings of strikers and raids on party headquarters and workers’ halls. He encouraged attendees to buy party literature, join the party, and gather people to attend another Communist Party meeting the following night.

Police raided the orderly meeting, confiscated party literature, and arrested DeJonge and three other meeting organizers. DeJonge was charged, convicted, and sentenced to seven years in prison under the Oregon criminal syndicalism statute for helping conduct a Communist Party meeting. Criminal syndicalism laws prohibit advocating or organizing a group to use unlawful means to overthrow business owners or government. The prosecution did not claim that DeJonge advocated illegal acts, but did present Communist Party literature from other sources that suggested the party supported such advocacy.

The Supreme Court struck down the conviction as a violation of the essence of constitutionally guaranteed personal liberty. The Court ruled unanimously that government may not proscribe “the holding of meetings for peaceable political action.” The First Amendment, as applied through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, prohibits states from regulating free speech or assembly that does not incite violence or crime. In 1969, in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), the Court said states may forbid only advocacy of criminal acts that is directed toward and likely to produce imminent illegal action.

SUSAN DENTE ROSS

References and Further Reading

Blasi, Vincent, The Pathological Perspective and the First Amendment, Colum. L. Rev. 85 (1985): 449.
Parrish, Michael E., New Deal Symposium: The Great Depression, the New Deal, and the American Legal Order, 59 Wash. L. Rev. 723 (1984).
U.S. Constitution. Amendments One, Fourteen.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)

DELAWARE v. PROUSE, 440 U.S. 648 (1979)

The Supreme Court in this case made it clear that police officers may not ordinarily stop a person's car without probable cause or reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. The car in Delaware v. Prouse was stopped by a police officer who had not observed any suspicious activity at all. He claimed to have made the stop randomly, just to make a spot check to see if the driver possessed his license and registration.

Upon approaching the stopped car, the officer smelled marijuana and, ultimately, he found some inside. The Court held that the marijuana should be suppressed because the officer had no right under the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution to stop the car, given the driver's reasonable expectation of privacy.

Justice White reasoned for the majority that permitting such suspicionless spot checks would only contribute marginally, if at all, to the goal of highway safety. Since the Court could not "conceive of any legitimate basis upon which a patrolman could decide that stopping a particular driver for a spot check would be more productive than stopping any other driver," approving such stops would have created a "grave danger" of abuse of discretion. "This kind of standardless and unconstrained discretion," Justice White concluded, "is the evil the Court has discerned when . . . it has insisted that the discretion of the official in the field be circumscribed."

Subsequent Supreme Court decisions have permitted police to operate suspicionless, drunk-driving roadblocks when they take great care to avoid this sort of "standardless and unconstrained discretion" in the selection of cars to be stopped. But, the core of the Prouse decision remains vital and has been applied in other settings as well—for example, when a city sought to stop cars simply to see whether occupants possessed drugs.

JOHN M. BURKOFF

See also Automobile Searches; California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565 (1991); Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925); Checkpoints (roadblocks); Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Seizures

DEMONSTRATIONS AND SIT-INS

Demonstrations and sit-ins served as powerful tools in the struggle for equality in the civil rights movement and other civil liberty struggles. Both forms of protest adhere to the principles of nonviolence endorsed by such figures as Mahatma Ghandi in India and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. in the United States.

The most famous example of a sit-in occurred in 1960 in Greensboro, North Carolina. In February 1960, four African-American students from Greensboro A&T sat at a Woolworth's lunch counter. The lunch counter was not integrated and the four men were refused service. This began a three-month-long struggle to integrate the lunch counter. Each day, more African-American students and supporters sat down at the counter and were refused service. They withstood verbal and physical abuse, threats, and jail time and persevered in their efforts. The lunch counter eventually integrated and the sit-in first begun in Greensboro spread throughout the South as increasing numbers of civil rights groups adopted the sit-in strategy. Despite the abuse, at no time did the students and supporters of the Greensboro sit-in resort to violence.

Demonstrations have taken place for centuries and usually serve as public forums to protest injustice and wrongs perceived by the people. In the modern era, demonstrations serve as important ways in which to get a particular viewpoint or message spread to others. Demonstrations are often used for political reasons, with various groups attempting to get their messages heard. The civil rights movement used demonstrations effectively to gain media attention on their struggle and turn America against prejudice and bigotry.

JASON M. SOKIERA

References and Further Reading

Bermanzohn, Sally Avery. Through Survivors' Eyes: From the Sixties to the Greensboro Massacre. Nashville, Tenn.: Vanderbilt University Press, 2003.

Hairston, Otis L., Jr. Greensboro North Carolina (Black America Series). Mount Pleasant, S.C.: Arcadia Publishing, 2003.

DENATURALIZATION

As discussed earlier, U.S. citizenship may be acquired at birth or through the statutory process of naturalization. A U.S. citizen may lose citizenship in two ways. Loss of citizenship can occur when or if the citizen voluntarily relinquishes it through an act of expatriation. A person may also lose citizenship through the process of denaturalization or revocation of citizenship. Denaturalization may occur when an individual has failed to comply with all of the prerequisites for naturalization and, as a result, naturalization was improperly granted.

The general statutory requirements for naturalization require that an individual be eighteen years of age and a lawful permanent resident; meet the applicable continuous residence and physical presence requirements; demonstrate good moral character, attachment to the principles of the Constitution, and a favorable disposition to the good order and happiness of the United States; demonstrate understanding of English and U.S. government and history; and be not otherwise barred from naturalization. There are some exceptions to these general requirements identified in the statute and discussed generally elsewhere. Revocation of naturalization can occur if lawful permanent residence was improperly granted since one of the statutory grounds for naturalization requires that the individual possess the status of a lawful permanent resident.

The Immigration and Nationality Act identifies the grounds for denaturalization and the process for revocation of citizenship. Revocation of naturalization will occur if a person illegally procured citizenship or citizenship was obtained by concealment of a material fact or willful misrepresentation. The government bears the burden of proof and must establish by clear and convincing evidence that naturalization was improperly granted based on one of these grounds.

Revocation can only occur if the government can establish that the naturalized citizen intentionally concealed a material fact or intentionally made a material misrepresentation. The government must further prove that the naturalization was granted based on the material misrepresentation or concealment. Examples of material facts that can result in denaturalization if intentionally made include such facts as the length and location of residence in the United States, marital or family status, occupation, name or other facts of identity, and past criminal record.

Naturalization may be illegally procured if an individual failed to satisfy one of the statutory requirements for naturalization. As noted earlier, this ground for denaturalization can reach a naturalized citizen's initial status as a lawful permanent resident and any prior immigration status in the United States as a noncitizen. There is some overlap between this ground for denaturalization and the intentional material misrepresentation or concealment ground; however, they are separately identified in the statute and viewed as separate grounds.

Denaturalization can occur at any time if naturalization was improperly granted based on misrepresentation or concealment, or if naturalization was illegally procured. The denaturalization process generally occurs through a judicial proceeding instituted by a U.S. attorney in a U.S. district court. The civil suit to revoke citizenship is filed in the judicial district where the naturalized citizen resides. A suit may only be filed if there is good cause indicating that there are grounds for denaturalization. The government will only prevail in the denaturalization lawsuit if it can present clear and convincing evidence of one of the two grounds for denaturalization. This significant burden on the government is designed to protect the status of citizenship.

ENID TRUCIOS-HAYNES

References and Further Reading

- Gallagher, Anna Marie. Immigration Law Service, 2nd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing, 2004. Chapter 14.
- Immigration and Nationality Act* §312(a), 8 U.S.C. § 1423(a).
- Immigration and Nationality Act* §313, 8 U.S.C. § 1424.
- Immigration and Nationality Act* §316 (a), (b), 8 U.S.C. § 1427(a), (b).
- Immigration and Nationality Act* §318, 8 U.S.C. § 1429.
- Immigration and Nationality Act* § 329(a), (b), 8 U.S.C. § 1440(a), (b).
- Immigration and Nationality Act* §340(h), 8 U.S.C. § 1451(h).
- Immigration and Nationality Act* § 349(a), 8 U.S.C. § 1481(a).
- Kungys v. U.S.*, 485 U.S. 759 (1988).
- Kurzban, Ira J. Immigration Law Sourcebook, 9th ed. Washington, D.C.: American Immigrant Lawyers Association, 2004.
- Legomsky, Stephen. Immigration and Refugee Law, 4th ed. Foundation Press, 2005, 1312.
- Mailman, Gordon, and Yale-Loehr. Immigration Law and Procedure. New York: Matthew Bender, § 100.02 [1][a].
- Rosenberg v. U.S.*, 60 F. 2d 475 (3d Cir. 1932).
- Schneiderman v. United States*, 320 U.S. 118 (1943).
- U.S. v. Costello*, 275 F. 2d 355 (2d Cir. 1960).
- U.S. v. D'Agostino*, 338 F. 2d 490 (2d Cir. 1964).
- U.S. v. DeLucia*, 256 F. 2d 487 (7th Cir. 1958).
- U.S. v. Rossi*, 319 F. 2d 701 (2d Cir. 1963).

DENNIS v. UNITED STATES,
341 U.S. 494 (1951)

In Dennis v. United States, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the conviction of eleven national leaders of the Communist Party (CPUSA) under the Smith Act (Alien Registration Act) of 1940 for conspiring to organize the CPUSA to “teach and advocate the overthrow and destruction of the Government of the United States by force and violence.” Dennis was the leading precedent upholding cold war prosecution of communists and others suspected of leftist sympathies during the 1950s.

The Truman administration, led by Attorney General Tom Clark, sought Smith act indictments against the CPUSA leadership in 1948 to fend off Republican criticism that Democrats were lax in ferreting communists out of positions of influence in American life, and also as a way of indirectly promoting Truman’s aggressive and expensive policy of containment of the Soviet Union. The trial before U.S. District Court Judge Harold Medina in New York City was a raucous affair that resulted in convictions of all the defendants, followed by contempt citations of their attorneys. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld those contempt convictions when they were appealed (Sacher v. United States, 343 U.S. 1, 1952; In re Isserman, 345 U.S. 286, 1953). These convictions and subsequent disbarment of some of counsel had a chilling effect on the availability of legal representation for radicals during the cold war.

On appeal of the Smith Act convictions, Chief Judge Learned Hand wrote for the court of appeals panel, affirming the convictions on the basis of a reworked clear-and-present-danger test: “whether the gravity of the ‘evil,’ discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger.” In the case of communists, Hand thought the answer to be clearly in the affirmative because he considered communism to be a mortal menace to American freedom. Under the Hand formula, if the apprehended evil is great enough, its likelihood can be remote and still provide a basis for government censure.

On appeal to the Supreme Court, the justices affirmed by a vote of six to two. (Justice Tom Clark recused himself because of his earlier participation in the case as attorney general.) Chief Justice Fred Vinson wrote the plurality opinion, in which only three other members of the Court joined. (This opinion, despite lacking majority status, is accepted as the opinion for the Court and will be treated as such here.)

Like Judge Hand, Justice Vinson subscribed wholeheartedly to the then prevalent belief that the CPUSA was “a highly organized conspiracy, with rigidly disciplined members” committed to “overthrow of the Government by force and violence.” In this view, the CPUSA had a unique constitutional status, placing it and its members at least partially outside the protections that the First Amendment afforded other political movements.

With those assumptions constituting the foundation of his opinion, the Chief Justice then went on to endorse Judge Hand’s sliding-scale calculus. He applied it in such a way as to permit the federal government to suppress what he called “advocacy” as well as “incitement.” In doing so, he forced free-speech doctrine, and the clear-and-present-danger test in particular, back into its World War I era formulation, which considered a mere bad tendency as within government’s power to crush. Vinson also adopted Justice Felix Frankfurter’s balancing approach (as opposed to Justice Hugo Black’s absolutism), weighing national security against individual liberty to communicate. Security easily won. The Vinson opinion permitted government to go beyond its unquestioned power to suppress actual evils like insurrection and incitement to punish communicative activities that had previously enjoyed some degree of First Amendment protection: advocacy, organizing, and belonging to political groups.

Yet, despite the speech-suppressive result of his holding, in dicta Justice Vinson inconsistently endorsed Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes’s dissent in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925), and Justice Louis D. Brandeis’s concurrence in Whitney v. California (1927), both of which repudiated bad-tendency readings and provided a wide latitude for political speech. Such incompatibilities in Justice Vinson’s opinion help account for its short-lived actual influence.

Because Vinson’s opinion was only a plurality, the concurrences assumed greater than usual significance. Frankfurter construed away the clear-and-present-danger test altogether. This required considerable intellectual contortion on his part since he had previously identified himself with Justices Holmes and Brandeis, whose views would have condemned the Dennis result and its doctrine. He dismissed the Holmes/Brandeis vision as “a sonorous formula,” as “dogmas too inflexible” to be applied in the real world, and as merely “attractive but imprecise words.” As a substitute for clear and present danger, now drained of all meaning, Frankfurter substituted balancing, which had the double vice of enhancing judicial power while invariably privileging government authority over freedom of speech.

Justice Robert H. Jackson's concurrence went even further than Justices Vinson's and Frankfurter's in embracing an apocalyptic vision of Communism. From that metajudicial assumption, he derived an unlimited power of government to suppress speech. In his view, communists could claim no effective constitutional protection for their activities.

Justices Black and William O. Douglas dissented, Black expressing the "hope . . . that in calmer times, when present pressures, passions and fears subside," a later Court would "restore the First Amendment liberties to the high preferred place" they had previously occupied.

Justice Black's hope was realized seventeen years later in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1968), which did in fact reinstate the Holmes/Brandeis reading of clear and present danger to canonical status. Since then political discourse has enjoyed nearly absolute immunity from government suppression. But in the interim, Dennis plowed wide inroads into First Amendment liberties, depriving not only communists but also much of the American Left of freedoms to speak, publish, organize, and agitate enjoyed by all other Americans. It was the major constitutional bulwark of the cold war.

Moreover, though Dennis has been ignored by judges and condemned by academics and civil libertarians since 1968, it has never been overruled. It remains valid precedent, at least technically, available to authorize suppression of the speech, press, and assembly liberties of some feared, loathed, and/or radical group in the future.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK

References and Further Reading

- Belknap, Michal R. Cold War Political Justice: The Smith Act, the Communist Party, and American Civil Liberties. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1977.
- Kutler, Stanley I. The American Inquisition: Justice and Injustice in the Cold War. New York: Hill and Wang, 1982.
- Murphy, Paul L. The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Urofsky, Melvin I. Division and Discord: The Supreme Court Under Stone and Vinson, 1941–1953. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.
- Wiecek, William M., The Legal Foundations of Domestic Anticommunism: The Background of Dennis v. U.S., Supreme Court Review (2001): 375–434.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
- In re Isserman*, 345 U.S. 286 (1953)
- Sacher v. United States*, 343 U.S. 1 (1952)

DEPARTMENT OF HOMELAND SECURITY

The Department of Homeland Security (DHS) was created on November 25, 2002, by the Homeland Security Act. In the wake of the attacks of September 11, 2001, President Bush established the Office of Homeland Security by executive order. Following congressional calls for the reorganization and refocusing of government agencies to bolster national security, the Office of Homeland Security was supplanted by a full-scale department to be headed by a new secretary of homeland security. After much wrangling between the president and Congress over the scope and the extent of legislative oversight of the new entity, DHS came into being in the largest government reorganization since the 1940s. It subsumed twenty-two existing federal agencies consisting of approximately 180 thousand federal employees, and represents the third largest government department.

The Department of Homeland Security's mandate is to reduce America's vulnerability to terrorism, prevent terrorist attacks inside the country, and manage recovery efforts in the event of such an attack. Agencies such as the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Secret Service, the Federal Emergency Management Administration, the Customs Service, and others were placed under the department's authority. Former Pennsylvania Governor Tom Ridge was named as the first secretary of homeland security.

A primary aim of the Homeland Security Act is to assist with the collection, analysis, and sharing of intelligence information relating to security threats to the homeland and to enabling DHS to be proactive in forestalling attacks. However, threats to national security inevitably create tensions with the constitutional liberties and freedoms Americans have long cherished. The breadth and nature of DHS's mandate have generated significant criticism from civil libertarians who argue that the legislation undermines privacy rights and government openness by restricting public access to government information while lowering barriers to the monitoring and interception of electronic communications.

The Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) of 1966 provides a right to the public to have access to information regarding government activities to prevent "wrongdoing" by the federal government; however, section 214 of the Homeland Security Act provides blanket authorization for DHS to withhold certain information relating to national security-related "critical infrastructure" if provided voluntarily by private companies. While supporters contend that such a provision is critical to encouraging the sharing of critical information with the government, critics note that information voluntarily provided to DHS by a nuclear power company related to a nuclear spill could not be shared with other government regulatory agencies or the general public. Section 214, it is contended, significantly undermines the purpose of FOIA.

Section 225 expands the government's ability to monitor electronic communications absent a judicial warrant. One provision within this section expands the scope of cases in which Internet service providers (ISPs) are shielded from liability for turning over private communications to the government. Although prior statutes went further to protect the privacy of ISP subscribers from unreasonable searches and seizures in line with the Fourth Amendment, the new law lowers the standard necessary to permit disclosure of private Internet communications. The section also expands the government's ability to install monitoring devices temporarily without a warrant on certain electronic devices in an "emergency situation" or on computers deemed "protected," which Courts have understood to mean those involved in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce or communication. Although the standard of a "reasonable expectation of privacy" that has governed consideration of Fourth Amendment searches and seizures is in a state of flux and may well have shrunk in this new world of Internet connectivity, section 225 certainly narrows the scope of privacy rights over certain electronic communications.

The Homeland Security Act has also been criticized for eroding individual rights by authorizing the president to suspend collective bargaining rights for DHS employees if he or she deems that union activities are having a "substantial adverse impact" on homeland security. The act also limits liability, even in cases of negligence, for makers of critical vaccines against smallpox or anthrax with whom the department has contracted.

Sensitive to the civil liberties implications of the legislation, section 705 of the law created a position for the officer for civil rights and civil liberties while section 222 creates a privacy officer. The former is tasked with conducting investigations on allegations of civil rights abuses in DHS and providing advice to the secretary of homeland security as to matters concerning civil liberties. The officer, for example, has established a training program for DHS employees called Civil Liberties University. The privacy officer is similarly responsible for advising the secretary and for reporting on the privacy implications of DHS activities and new technologies.

Although DHS includes some administrative structures to review the privacy and civil rights effects of the Homeland Security Act, this has not prevented groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union from initiating litigation concerning border security practices or the sharing of airline passenger screening procedures. The focus on homeland security appears unlikely to recede in importance in the near future, so pressures on civil liberties will no doubt endure.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Jones, Karen E., Comment and Casenote: The Effect of the Homeland Security Action on Online Privacy and the Freedom of Information Act, University of Cincinnati Law Review 72: 787.

Thessin, Jonathan, Recent Developments: Department of Homeland Security, Harvard Journal on Legislation 40 (2003): 513.

See also Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Patriot Act; Wiretapping Laws

DERSHOWITZ, ALAN (1938–)

Alan Dershowitz, professor of law at Harvard University, is a prolific writer, social activist, and legal commentator who has been described by Newsweek as "the nation's most peripatetic civil liberties lawyer and one of its most distinguished defenders of individual rights."

Early in his career Dershowitz clerked for Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg. At the time of his teaching appointment at the age of 28, he was the youngest tenured faculty member ever at Harvard Law School. Dershowitz, who specialized in appellate work, has since been involved in a number high-profile criminal defense cases, including the trial of Claus Von Bülow, and served as an advisor to O. J. Simpson's defense team. Acknowledging that his philosophy as a civil-liberties lawyer is to "challenge the government at every turn," Dershowitz has campaigned for Jews in the former Soviet Union and has taken on less highly publicized cases involving issues of individual rights, many of them on a pro bono basis.

Dershowitz articulated his concept of civil rights, which he views as deriving from past human experiences with injustice rather than from God or natural law, in a 2002 book entitled Shouting Fire: Civil Liberties in a Turbulent Age. He has been at the forefront of a discussion, provoked by the events of September 11, concerning the legality and propriety of the use of torture in exceptional circumstances. Addressing the hypothetical “ticking bomb scenario” in which torture is contemplated as a means of last resort to extract information needed to forestall a massive terrorist attack and save lives, Dershowitz’s proposal to regulate torture through a “warrant” system has sparked debate among civil-rights lawyers and academics. The concept of a torture warrant system—a delicate balance of conflicting rights that ensures judicial oversight and government accountability at the cost of establishing a damaging legitimizing precedent for torture—represents a salient new component in Dershowitz’s concept of civil liberties.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Dershowitz, Alan. Shouting Fire: Civil Liberties in a Turbulent Age. Boston: Little, Brown, 2002.
- Williams, Marjorie, and Ruth Marcus. 1991. Courting fame, fanning flames: lawyer Alan Dershowitz, from rogues to riches. The Washington Post, February 10, F1.

DESIGNATED PUBLIC FORUMS

First Amendment law concerning government regulation of the freedom of speech tends to develop in strands. One such strand is forum analysis, which concerns the constitutional limitations on government control of speech and expression on government property.

The Supreme Court’s forum analysis includes three types of forums. The traditional public forum includes public streets, sidewalks, and parks, all places historically reserved for expressive activities. The designated public forum is any other government property intentionally held open for expressive activities. The nonpublic forum comprises all of the remaining government property, such as jails and military bases. The forum label dictates the analysis the court will apply.

The Supreme Court uses essentially the same test for traditional and designated public forums. The test has several requirements. First, the government generally cannot enact content based regulations that discriminate against a particular message (Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 1981). Second, the government can enact content-neutral time, place, and manner regulations, but only if the regulations are reasonable (Perry Education Ass’n v. Perry Local Educators’ Ass’n, 372 U.S. 229, 1963). Reasonable regulations are defined by the Supreme Court as those that are narrowly tailored to serve a substantial government interest and leave open ample alternative channels of communication (see, for example, Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 1989).

It is important to emphasize that heavy use does not dictate whether a designated public forum is created. Instead, the government’s intent is critical. Thus, airports generally are not designated public forums but rather nonpublic forums, because they are places where people congregate to travel, not to speak (see, for example, International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. v. Lee, 502 U.S. 1022, 1992). Similarly, a public school during school hours is a nonpublic forum and not a designated public forum because it is dedicated to teaching and learning, not to freedom of expression (see, for example, Bethel School District No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 1986).

On the other hand, public schools opened to the community for the after-hours exchanges of communication can become designated public forums. If a public school becomes a designated public forum after hours, school officials are prevented from excluding certain groups because of their message (see, for example, Good News Club v. Milford Central School, 553 U.S. 98, 2001). (The exclusion of a religious group from after-hours discussions of character and morals while allowing all other nonreligious groups to do so is impermissible content based discrimination.)

S. FRIEDLAND

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bethel School District No. 403 v. Fraser*, 478 U.S. 675 (1986)
- Good News Club v. Milford Central School*, 553 U.S. 98 (2001)
- International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. v. Lee*, 502 U.S. 1022 (1992)
- Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators’ Association*, 372 U.S. 229 (1963)
- Ward v. Rock Against Racism*, 491 U.S. 781 (1989)
- Widmar v. Vincent*, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)

DEWITT, GENERAL JOHN (1880–1962)

John DeWitt, the army general in charge of Japanese American relocation in World War II, was born in 1880 at Fort Sidney, Nebraska, and reared on army posts. Eager to join the Spanish–American War of 1898, DeWitt left Princeton University in his sophomore year. The conflict left a lasting impact on DeWitt, and instead of returning to Princeton, he decided to join the regular army. His responsibilities in the military included work as a supply officer, desk duty, and Philippines tours of service before serving in France during World War I as director of supply and transportation for the First Army Corps. Dewitt served in the War Department from 1919 to 1930 in positions that included chief of the storage and issue branch, acting assistant chief of staff, and assistant commandant of the General Staff College. In 1930, he became quartermaster general and in 1937 was named commandant of the Army War College. Two years later, DeWitt became commander of the West Coast Fourth Army and the Ninth Corps Area.

General DeWitt's appointment as commander on the West Coast and the 1941 Pearl Harbor attack by the Japanese Imperial Navy would be important factors resulting in the internment of Japanese Americans in prison camps. Prior to the Pearl Harbor attack, DeWitt had a history of racist behavior toward African Americans and Asians during his career in the then segregated army; he preferred that they serve in the more dangerous and combat-focused infantry units. Fueled by his disdain for minorities and by widespread fear of more attacks by the Japanese military, DeWitt put in place a plan to restrict the rights of Japanese Americans.

Although unsubstantiated by the other federal agencies, DeWitt made claims to government officials against Japanese and Japanese Americans that they were enemy aliens with no loyalty to the United States, had committed acts of espionage, and therefore had to be detained. As a result of public hysteria on the West Coast, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed Executive Order 9066 on February 12, 1942, making it legal for the United States to confine Japanese Americans to internment camps in the western United States. General DeWitt directed the operation to round up approximately one hundred twenty thousand Japanese and Japanese Americans into internment camps.

Nearly fifty years after the internment of Japanese Americans, the U.S. government acknowledged that their internment had been a mistake derived from fear and prejudice. The Justice Department made the decision no longer to defend internment and Congress enacted a bill of redress for internment camp survivors in which President Reagan included an apology.

DeWitt's career in the U.S. Army spanned almost fifty years. He retired in 1947 with the Distinguished Service Medal at the rank of lieutenant general. Seven years after his retirement, Congress promoted DeWitt to full general. He died in 1962 of a heart attack.

BA-SHEN WELCH

References and Further Reading

Daniels, Roger. Concentration Camps: North American Japanese in the United States and Canada During World War II. Malabar, FL: Robert E. Krieger Publishing Company, Inc., 1981.

Irons, Peter. Justice at War: The Story of the Japanese American Internment Cases. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

United States Army Quartermaster Museum. Major General John L. DeWitt 28th quartermaster general February 1930–February 1934 (online). Fort Lee: USA Quartermaster Center (retrieved 2 July 2003). Available from http://www.qmfound.com/MG_John_DeWitt.htm.

DIAL-A-PORN

Dial-a-porn services provide prerecorded, sexually explicit messages via telephone. In 1983, following concerns that young people were being harmed by exposure to offensive and damaging messages that were easily accessible, Congress amended the Communications Act of 1934. Section 223(b) prohibited obscene or indecent telephone communications to any person under eighteen years of age or to any other person without that person's consent.

Critics of the legislation claimed that it was unconstitutional content based regulation of free speech. After the Second Circuit ruled that indecency is not a separate category of speech, Congress amended section 223(b) to prohibit all indecent and obscene commercial telephone communications directed to any person, regardless of age.

In Sable Communications v. FCC, 492 U.S. 115 (1989), the Supreme Court upheld Congress's total ban on obscene transmissions. Since obscenity is not protected by the First Amendment, Congress may regulate the dissemination of obscene materials, so long as it has a legitimate governmental interest in such regulation. It struck down, however, the total ban on indecent communications, which may be regulated only when a compelling governmental interest exists, and then only by the least restrictive means available. Although the Court held that the welfare of minors is a compelling governmental interest, a total ban on indecent communication was not the least restrictive means to further that interest.

In response, Congress enacted the Helms amendment, prohibiting any indecent commercial telephone communication available to minors, but allowing a waiver for adults agreeing to abide by a "presubscription" procedure. The Second Circuit has since upheld the amendment.

DEBORAH ZALESNE

References and Further Reading

Burrington, William W., and Thaddeus J. Burns, "Hung Up on the Pay-Per-Call Industry? Current Federal Legislative and Regulatory Developments,” Seton Hall Legis. Journal 17 (1993): 359, 365.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Carlin Communications v. FCC, 837 F.2d 546, 560 (2d Cir. 1988)
Dial Information Services Corp. v. Thornburgh, 938 F.2d 1535 (2d Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 966 (1992)
Sable Communications v. FCC, 492 U.S. 115 (1989)
Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. § 223(b) (1983)
Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. § 223(b) (1990) (Helms amendment)

DICKERSON v. UNITED STATES, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)

Prior to the leading case of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, decided in 1966, the U.S. Supreme Court used the standard of “voluntariness” in determining the admissibility of a confession. The Miranda decision replaced this standard in most cases with a prescribed set of warnings that must be given prior to custodial interrogation. Failure to give the warnings would render a confession inadmissible, even if it were given voluntarily.

In the midst of the widespread criticism that Miranda generated, Congress enacted 18 U.S.C. section 3501, which purported to overturn Miranda insofar as it applied in federal criminal cases. Under the statute, which was totally ignored for thirty years, the failure to give the warnings did not prevent a confession from being admitted as long as it was voluntary.

In Dickerson v. United States the trial court granted Dickerson’s motion to suppress a statement he made to the F.B.I. on the ground that the Miranda warnings had not been given. The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, holding that under section 3501 the confession was voluntary and therefore admissible. In reversing the court of appeals, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the rule in Miranda was based on the Constitution and, as such, could not be overruled by an act of Congress. The Court refused to overrule Miranda on its own, finding that it has become part of routine police procedures and that subsequent cases have reaffirmed Miranda’s core ruling while reducing its negative impact on legitimate police practices.

STEVEN B. DOW

References and Further Reading

Dripps, Donald A., Constitutional Theory for Criminal Procedure: Dickerson, Miranda, and the Continuing Quest for Broad-but-Shallow, William & Mary Law Review 43 (2001): 1–77.

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure, 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2004.

Prebble, Amanda L., Manipulated by Miranda: A Critical Analysis of Bright Lines and Voluntary Confessions Under United States v. Dickerson, University of Cincinnati Law Review 68 (2000): 555–588.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
 18 U.S.C. section 3501 (1994)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation; Miranda Warning

DIES, MARTIN (1900–1972)

Martin Dies, born in Colorado, Texas, in 1900, served in the House of Representatives from 1931 to 1944, where he gained notoriety as the first chairman of the House Un-American Activities Committee. A protégée of Speaker of the House John Nance Garner, Dies was initially an early supporter of President Franklin Roosevelt’s New Deal. He ultimately became disillusioned with the program, however, and in 1938 he introduced a resolution to create a special committee to “investigate subversive and un-American propaganda” with which he hoped to attack the New Deal.

Between 1938 and 1944, during his tenure as chairman of the HUAC, Dies used the committee’s wide-ranging mandate to hunt for communists, generating much publicity from the unsupported charges of Communist and Nazi subversion that emanated from HUAC hearings. Dies’s tactics became the model for the later subversion investigations of the post-1945 “red scare.”

The committee fed on names. Witnesses before the committee were asked to identify those they suspected of being communist. They were permitted to ramble and indulge in blind accusations with little guidance from the chairman or committee members. Membership records of alleged communist organizations were released publicly without substantiation. Hearings before HUAC were rarely impartial and reflected Dies’s political persuasion. After 1939, consulting seldom, if at all, with other committee members, Dies turned HUAC hearings into a one-man road show that often gave right-wing extremists an arena to cast suspicion on liberal organizations and individuals.

Although Dies left the House in 1944, the committee was reauthorized in 1945, becoming the most notorious of the McCarthy era investigating committees. Dies re-entered Congress in 1953, but by this time his reputation had been eclipsed by that of Joseph McCarthy. Dies was not appointed to HUAC. He left Congress in 1959, but continued his devotion to the anticommunist cause as a dedicated member of the John Birch society. He died in 1972.

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

Goodman, Walter. The Committee: The Extraordinary Career of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1968.

Ogden, August Raymond. The Dies Committee: A Study of the Special House Committee for the Investigation of Un-American Activities. Washington, DC: Catholic University Press, 1945.

See also House Un-American Activities Committee; John Birch Society; McCarthy, Joseph; New Deal; Roosevelt, Franklin Delano

DISCIPLINING LAWYERS FOR SPEAKING ABOUT PENDING CASES

Lawyers sometimes believe that it is important to influence public opinion as part of the representation of a client. Perhaps the aim is to present a favorable case to potential jurors, or perhaps the client is a public figure whose reputation may be affected by the outcome of the proceedings. In any event, when lawyers discuss a pending case at a news conference or make statements to reporters, these extrajudicial comments may have a negative impact on the fairness of the trial process. Courts and bar associations therefore seek to limit speech concerning pending cases. These limitations pose a conflict between two constitutional rights: the First Amendment press-freedom guarantee and the litigants' right to a fair trial, protected by the Sixth Amendment.

The Supreme Court has tried to balance these rights. After a mid-century trial accompanied by a media frenzy, the Court granted a writ of habeas corpus sought by a doctor who had allegedly killed his wife, on the grounds that the publicity prevented him from receiving a fair trial (Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333, 1969). In the wake of the Sheppard case, many states adopted rules to limit extrajudicial statements by lawyers. The Court considered a First Amendment challenge to one of these rules and concluded in a divided decision that many existing rules were unconstitutional vague (Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1991). The rule in effect in most jurisdictions now prohibits a lawyer from making an extrajudicial statement that will have a "substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing an adjudicative proceeding."

W. BRADLEY WENDEL

References and Further Reading

Cole, Kevin, and Fred Zacharias, People v. Simpson: The Agony of Victory and the Ethics of Lawyer Speech, Southern California Law Review 69 (1996): 1627–1678.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991)

Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1969)

ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 3.6 (2002)

See also Cameras in the Courtroom; Due Process; Gag Orders in Judicial Proceedings; Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991); Right of Access to Criminal Trials; Rights of the Accused

DISCIPLINING PUBLIC EMPLOYEES FOR EXPRESSIVE ACTIVITY

A public employee's right to free speech under the First Amendment is not unlimited and employers have the right to discipline employees for expressive activity under certain circumstances (Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563, 1968). The employer has an interest in ensuring that its employees do not undermine its operations or interfere with accomplishment of its objectives. At the same time, employees do not give up their constitutional rights when they accept government employment. Indeed, government employees may play a particularly important role in enlightening the public about governmental operations by contributing to public debate and alerting the public about potential wrongdoing. Thus, the courts have developed a test for determining when public employers can discipline their employees for expressive activity.

The threshold requirement for protected speech is that it must relate to a matter of public concern. If speech relates to an employee's private grievance, discipline based on the speech does not implicate the First Amendment. (For further information, see Matters of Public Concern Standard in Free Speech Cases.) In addition, even if the speech addresses matters of public concern, when the employee's speech rights are outweighed by the disruption that the speech causes to the operations of government, the employer can discipline the employee for speech. The more central the speech is to matters of concern to the public, the more disruptive to government operations it must be in order to justify discipline. The impact of the speech on discipline, working relationships, work performance, and government operations is a significant consideration in weighing the government's interests

(Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378, 1987). In the 2005 term (Garcetti v. Ceballos, 361 F.3d. 1168, 9th Cir. 2004, cert. granted, 125 S. Ct. 1395, 2005), the Supreme Court had to decide whether an employee who brings to light suspected wrongdoing in speech required by job duties is protected from discipline, thus further refining the balancing test.

In some cases, the government disputes that discipline was motivated by the employee's protected speech, asserting a lawful basis for the discipline. To prevail on a constitutional claim, the employee must prove that the protected speech was a motivating factor in the employer's decision to discipline (Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 1977). The employee must show that the person who made the decision was aware of the speech. In addition, proof of actual motivation is necessary; this can involve evidence such as the timing of the discipline in relation to the speech, employer unhappiness with the speech, or the pretextual nature of the employer's asserted reason for the discipline. If the employee proves that the speech motivated the employer, the employer can avoid liability by showing that it would have disciplined the employee for legitimate reasons even if the employee had not engaged in the protected speech. When there is disagreement about what the employee actually said, the employer may rely on what it reasonably and in good faith believes was said in deciding whether to discipline the employee (Waters v. Churchill, 511 U.S. 661, 1994). To ensure that it acts reasonably, the wise employer will investigate prior to discipline when employee statements may have First Amendment protection.

ANN C. HODGES

References and Further Reading

- Deskbook Encyclopedia of Public Employment Law*, Malvern, PA: Center for Education and Employment Law, 2005.
- Hudson, David L., Jr. Balancing Act: Public Employees and Free Speech, First Amendment Center, 2002.
- Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech, vol. 2, Eagan, MN: Thomson/West, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Garcetti v. Ceballos*, 361 F.3d. 1168 (9th Cir. 2004), cert. granted, 125 S. Ct. 1395 (2005)
- Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle*, 429 U.S. 274 (1977)
- Pickering v. Board of Education*, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
- Rankin v. McPherson*, 483 U.S. 378 (1987)
- Waters v. Churchill*, 511 U.S. 661 (1994)

See also Matters of Public Concern Standard in Free Speech Cases; Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977); Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968); Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378 (1987); Speech of Government Employees

DISCOVERY MATERIALS IN COURT PROCEEDINGS

In civil as well as criminal court proceedings, discovery serves as a tool whereby all parties to an action can discover, before a trial on the matter's merits, precisely what evidence will be offered at the trial. The discovery process provides each party to an action the opportunity to examine the evidence that will be used against them as well as to find or discover the evidence to be used in their favor. The rules of procedure place few limits on the kinds of evidence subject to discovery, whereas the rules of evidence place significant limits on the admissibility of discovered evidence at trial. For example, a deposition transcript may be used, in whole or in part, but only pursuant to the applicable rules of evidence governing admissibility and the applicable rules of procedure that set out particular conditions precedent to their use.

Because the facts conceded in a party's responses to requests for admission are not subject to dispute at trial, these responses are commonly used for document authentication, for impeachment purposes, or as proof of the existence or nonexistence of an element of a claim. Physical examinations can be used to prove the extent of a party's injuries. Expert witnesses may be called to give their conclusions or opinions regarding information, likely obtained through discovery, provided to them before trial. In court proceedings, discovery is an equalizer, arming all parties to an action access to the same information before it is presented to the trier of fact.

KATHRYN H. CHRISTOPHER

References and Further Reading

- Federal Rules of Civil Procedure*. St. Paul, MN: Thompson/West, 2005.
- Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure*. St. Paul, MN: Thompson/West, 2005.
- Federal Rules of Evidence*. St. Paul, MN: Thompson/West, 2005.
- Friedenthal, Jack H., Mary Kay Kane, and Arthur R. Miller. Civil Procedure, 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thompson/West, 2005.
- Giannelli, Paul C. Understanding Evidence. New York: Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., 2003.
- Imwinkelried, Edward J. Evidentiary Foundations, 5th ed. New York: Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., 2002.

Park, Roger C., David P. Leonard, and Steven H. Goldberg. Evidence Law: A Student's Guide to the Law of Evidence as Applied in American Trials. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1998.

Shreve, Gene R., and Peter Raven-Hansen. Understanding Civil Procedure, 3rd ed. New York: Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., 2002.

DISCRIMINATION BY RELIGIOUS ENTITIES THAT RECEIVE GOVERNMENT FUNDS

Religious entities currently receive government funds in a variety of ways and for a variety of purposes. Increasingly, the government is turning to nongovernmental entities—including religious and secular nonprofit organizations—to provide the sorts of services that the government used to provide directly. As a result, religious groups presently receive funds from state and federal governments to provide all kinds of social services, from elementary education to drug rehabilitation. In fact, under the federal programs begun in 1996 known generally as “charitable choice,” religious groups have the right to participate in various funding opportunities on the same terms as secular organizations.

This raises a number of political and constitutional issues. First is the straightforward issue of whether such funding is constitutionally permissible. Much of the Supreme Court’s Establishment Clause jurisprudence over the last fifty years has centered on whether (and to what extent) religious entities can receive government funds. Yet, its decisions in cases like Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000), and Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002), seem to suggest that as long as religious groups are not privileged over competing secular groups, they can constitutionally receive government funds to do social-service work.

Aside from the issue of funding is another difficult one, which is just as contentious and even more complicated. This issue is one of discrimination. It is widely accepted that the government cannot discriminate on the basis of religion when hiring employees. The Constitution’s Equal Protection and Free Exercise Clauses require this. Yet, it is just as widely accepted that religious groups should have the right to so discriminate. This, too, is seen as a matter of free exercise. Accordingly, religious organizations are exempt from the Title VII statute, which generally forbids businesses from discriminating against employees on the basis of religion. Charitable choice thus creates a problem by crossing up these two competing intuitions. What should happen when religious groups receive government funds in programs like charitable choice? Should they continue to enjoy the right to select staff along religious lines? Should they, like governmental actors, be barred from engaging in this sort of discrimination?

This question is one on which people vehemently disagree. Both sides have good points to make. On one hand, allowing religious organizations to keep their Title VII exemption is, in a sense, to allow government-funded discrimination. It means that workers in publicly funded positions (performing what had until recently been government work) can be terminated solely because of their religious beliefs. While it may be fine for religious groups to prefer coreligionists in their own affairs, surely the government—under the Equal Protection and Establishment Clauses—must ensure that when it acts, all of its citizens are treated equally. Moreover, given that religious groups are the only groups that have the right to staff religiously, they are being unfairly privileged over secular organizations, perhaps in violation of the Establishment Clause.

Yet, those who defend religious staffing in charitable choice have their arguments as well. They point to the fact that religious staffing has always been a prerogative of religious organizations, and for good reason. In a diverse country, religious staffing is what enables a group to maintain a religious identity; it is part and parcel of their right under the Free Exercise Clause to practice their religion. Without a right to hire along religious lines, a Jewish social-justice organization might well become Jewish in name only. To tell a religious group that it can have government funds only if it gives up its right to staff religiously, supporters argue, would be essentially to bribe them out of their religious identity—a quintessential violation of the unconstitutional-conditions doctrine.

How this debate will be resolved is far from clear. As for current practice, the law is mixed. Title VII exempts religious groups without regard to whether they are receiving government funds. As a result, the general rule is that religious organizations can discriminate along religious lines. Yet there are exceptions to this rule. In some programs (like the AmeriCorps VISTA program, for example), special federal contracting rules require all parties contracting with the government (including religious ones) to pledge that they will not discriminate on the basis of religion. States and cities sometimes have quite similar rules for their contracting partners. In such cases, the default rule is reversed and religious organizations must give up their religious staffing rights to receive government funds. There is no doubt, however, that this issue is of increasing importance in the charitable-choice debate. Indeed, battles over this discrimination issue have been a central impediment to legislative proposals to expand charitable choice, principally because those working against charitable choice have made it the fulcrum of their attack. How the foregoing issues will play out in the Congress and the courts is perhaps impossible to predict.

As a concluding note, it is important to keep in mind that this discussion has only been concerned with discriminations on the basis of religion. Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits all organizations that receive federal funds, religious and secular alike, from discriminating in employment on the basis of race, color, or national origin. (As those defending religious staffing like to note, Title VI does not list religion as a protected characteristic.) No federal law currently prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, so religious and secular organizations are entitled to discriminate on that basis with the use of federal funds. Lastly, it is worth noting that, while they protect the right of religious groups to discriminate on the basis of religion in hiring, charitable-choice provisions do not permit religious groups to discriminate among beneficiaries on the basis of religion. Under current federal law, that sort of religious discrimination is flatly condemned, although some worry that it may exist in practice.

CHRISTOPHER C. LUND

References and Further Reading

- Esbeck, Carl H., Stanley W. Carlson–Thies, and Ronald J. Sider. The Freedom of Faith-Based Organizations to Staff on a Religious Basis. Washington, DC: Center for Public Justice, 2004.
- Green, Steven K., Religious Discrimination, Public Funding, and Constitutional Values, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 30 (2003): 1:1–55.
- Laycock, Douglas, The Underlying Unity of Separation and Neutrality, Emory Law Journal 46 (1997): 1:43–74.
- Lund, Christopher C., Of Government Funding, Religious Institutions, and Neutrality, Tulsa Law Review 40 (2004): 2:321–342.
- Lupu, Ira C., and Robert W. Tuttle. Government Relationships With Faith-Based Providers: The State of the Law. Albany, NY: Roundtable on Religion and Social Welfare Policy, 2002.
- Saperstein, David, Public Accountability and Faith-Based Organizations: A Problem Best Avoided, Harvard Law Review 116 (2003): 6:1353–1396.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Zelman v. Simmons–Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)
- 42 U.S.C. § 2000e (Title VII)
- 42 U.S.C. § 604a (Charitable Choice)

See also Accommodation of Religion; Charitable Choice; Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom; Establishment Clause Doctrine; Supreme Court

Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clause; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine; Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Mitchell v. Helms, 463 U.S. 793 (2000); Religion in “Public Square” Debate; Religious Freedom Restoration Act; School Vouchers; State Action Doctrine; State Aid to Religious Schools; State Regulation of Religious Schools; Tax Exemptions for Religious Groups and Clergy; Title VII and Religious Exemptions; Unconstitutional Conditions; Zelman v. Simmons–Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

DISCRIMINATORY PROSECUTION

In deciding whom to prosecute, prosecutors may not deliberately use impermissible arbitrary criteria, such as race, religion, national origin, or the exercise of protected statutory or constitutional rights. This discriminatory prosecution violates the defendant's equal protection rights under the Fourteenth Amendment or as incorporated through the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment if the case is federal. A finding of discriminatory prosecution generally justifies a dismissal of the indictment or conviction unless the state can establish a compelling justification for its selectivity. A discriminatory prosecution claim does not serve as a defense on the merits to the underlying charge; it is simply a constitutional defect in the prosecution rather than a determination of a defendant's innocence or guilt.

Just as the legislative branch is prevented from enacting laws that deny equal protection, so too is the executive branch restrained from enforcing laws in a way that denies equal protection. As the Supreme Court in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886), explained well over a century ago in reference to an administrative agency's actions, “[t]hrough the law itself be fair on its face, and impartial in appearance, yet if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution.”

While the foregoing is relatively uncontroversial, the more debatable issue is what elements a defendant must prove to prevail in a claim of discriminatory prosecution and how a defendant can obtain such evidence. Allegations of discriminatory prosecution are very difficult to prove. Courts almost invariably reject defendants' claims.

Discriminatory prosecution claims are judged according to ordinary equal protection standards. In Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598 (1985), the Court stated that the defendant must show that the prosecutor's charging decision "had a discriminatory effect and that it was motivated by a discriminatory purpose." Courts have required a burden of proof ranging from a reasonable inference of impermissible discrimination to convincing evidence.

Proof of a discriminatory effect, also referred to as a disparate impact, requires showing that similarly situated people, in an identifiable group other than the defendant's, were not but could have been prosecuted. Obtaining such evidence may be very difficult, especially if the similarly situated people's offenses have not come to the attention of the police, perhaps because they focused their efforts on one group rather than another. Even if a discriminatory effect can be shown, this does not show that the prosecutor purposefully caused or intended such an effect. Defendants must instead produce evidence that they have been intentionally and purposefully singled out for prosecution on the basis of arbitrary or invidious criteria. Put differently, a defendant must show that the prosecutor chose to prosecute because of, rather than in spite of, the defendant's membership in an identifiable group.

Just as it is difficult to prove discriminatory prosecution, it is also difficult for a defendant to obtain discovery of evidence from the prosecution to establish the claim. In United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456 (1996), defendants moved for discovery on their claim that federal "crack" cocaine laws were selectively enforced against blacks. The Supreme Court held that in order to obtain discovery regarding the state's charging practices, a defendant must establish a "colorable basis" for discriminatory effect and discriminatory purpose. To demonstrate discriminatory effect, the defendant must make a "credible showing" that the state could have, but failed, to prosecute similarly situated people of a different race. A defendant cannot simply point at the race of those prosecuted and presume that people of all races commit all types of crimes. A colorable basis refers to evidence tending to show the existence of discriminatory effect and intent. This showing appears to be less onerous than a prima facie case but more difficult than a nonfrivolous showing.

The Supreme Court in Armstrong reasoned that restricting a defendant's access to discovery would be a significant barrier to the litigation of insubstantial claims. Requiring a credible showing would serve to balance a state's interest in vigorous law enforcement and a defendant's interest in avoiding selective prosecution. Many legal commentators, however, argue that the defendant's burden is too onerous, primarily because the facts that might show discriminatory prosecution, especially those that might show discriminatory intent, are often exclusively in the prosecutor's possession.

Nonetheless, courts have sound reasons for their highly deferential approach to prosecutors' charging decisions. Because of concerns about separation of powers, courts are reluctant to intrude on a province constitutionally assigned to the executive branch. In addition, prosecutors have special expertise that courts institutionally do not have in assessing the severity of a crime, the probability of a conviction, public opinion, or the deployment of scarce prosecutorial resources. Courts also fear that subjecting a prosecutor's motives and decision-making to outside scrutiny might chill law enforcement, or that a less restrictive approach to discriminatory prosecution claims would unleash an unmanageable number of such claims, resulting in additional long delays and costs in the criminal justice system. Finally, there is the underlying presumption that a prosecutor properly discharges his or her official duties in good faith.

On the other hand, this restrictive approach may eliminate legitimate claims. It may be very difficult for a defendant to prove racial and other forms of discrimination since discrimination is much more subtle than in the past and may even be unconscious. Some empirical studies purport to show that minorities with prior criminal records and convicted of drug offenses who refuse to plead guilty or who are associated with white victims are charged and punished more severely than comparable nonminorities. In addition, if the criminal justice system is perceived as unfair or racist because the courts fail to recognize discriminatory prosecution, then communities may cooperate less with the police, resulting in less effective law enforcement. Because there is rarely a judicial remedy for discriminatory prosecution claims, it remains true that the primary check against prosecutorial abuse is political.

ANTONY PAGE

References and Further Reading

- Davis, Angela J., Prosecution and Race: The Power and Privilege of Discretion, Fordham Law Review 67 (1998): 13–67.
- McAdams, Richard H., Race and Selective Prosecution: Discovering the Pitfalls of Armstrong, Chicago Kent Law Review 73 (1998): 605–667.
- Poulin, Anne B., Prosecutorial Discretion and Selective Prosecution: Enforcing Protection After United States v. Armstrong, American Criminal Law Review 34 (Spring 1997): 1071–1125.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- McCleskey v. Kemp*, 481 U.S. 277 (1987)
- Oyler v. Boles*, 368 U.S. 448 (1962)
- United States v. Armstrong*, 517 U.S. 456 (1996)

Wayte v. U.S., 470 U.S. 598 (1985)
Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886)

See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Race and Criminal Justice

DISESTABLISHMENT OF STATE CHURCHES IN THE LATE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY AND EARLY NINETEENTH CENTURY

It is one of the ironies of our constitutional history that at the time the U.S. Constitution was adopted, including its requirement that the newly created federal government refrain from establishing religion, churches established by state law not only were permitted by state constitutions of the time, but also were common (Tarr, 1989). Establishment was accomplished via measures that imposed taxes on citizens to support the officially recognized church, attendance requirements, and religious oaths (McLoughlin, 1971, pp. 767–797; 849–850; 1183). In the years following the ratification of the Constitution, however, a movement to disestablish state churches made rapid progress. The principal driving force behind the drive to disestablish state churches in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries was opposition to paying taxes to support a church other than the one that an individual attended. In addition, the movement's supporters also wished to prevent the civil government from coming between individuals and God and to be free to worship without interference (Tarr, p. 82; Adams and Emmerich, 1989).

State Establishment of Religion

During the time of the nation's founding, states imposed taxes and assessments to pay pastors and religious teachers. In Virginia, the Bill for Establishing a Provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion, introduced in 1784, would have continued the pre-Revolution practice of using general taxes to support the state's church (Tarr, 1989, 81–82). Vermont's legislature passed a law in 1783 that established its system of religious taxation (McLoughlin, 1971, 797–798). There, each town by majority vote established a denomination as the town's church, which would then be supported by local taxes (McLoughlin, 798). Citizens who did not want to pay a tax to that church could, through a system of certificates, become exempt from that tax.

Connecticut and Massachusetts also levied taxes for the support of churches and religious schools in the late 1700s, and both provided for some exemptions (McLoughlin, 922–925; 1162; 1205). New Hampshire went further. Its religious taxes were written into its first constitution (McLoughlin, 844–845), under which each town established its religion and assessed taxes on its inhabitants to support the schools and ministries. Unlike other states, however, New Hampshire did not provide for any exemptions for dissenters.

States also used religious oaths to establish a state church. Early constitutions, such as those of New Jersey, Georgia, South Carolina, and New Hampshire, required anyone seeking public office to profess a belief in Christianity and Protestantism (Adams and Emmerich, 1989, 1576). North Carolina and Pennsylvania required citizens to take strict belief oaths before holding public office, and Delaware required “all officeholders to profess belief in the Trinity and the divine inspiration of the Bible” (Adams and Emmerich, pp. 1576–1577). Vermont's 1777 constitution included a loyalty oath, as did Massachusetts' original constitution (McLoughlin, 1971, pp. 797; 1184).

The Disestablishment Movement

The fight over religious taxes sparked the disestablishment movement, and eliminating taxes was the crucial act of disestablishment in many states. The Virginia proposal to use tax revenues to support Christian teachers was so unpopular that, after its defeat, the victors were able to pass Thomas Jefferson's Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom, which included the provision that “no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place or ministry whatsoever” (Padover, 1943). As early as 1783, Connecticut's legislature began passing laws exempting people from religious taxation (McLoughlin, 1971, 922–923). After support for state churches declined, however, the legislature tightened the exemption requirements in 1790 (McLoughlin, p. 926). These renewed religious requirements—the combination of paying taxes or having to show church membership and attendance—once again fueled opposition. A year later, the strict requirements were repealed, effectively disestablishing the state church in Connecticut (McLoughlin, pp. 937–938).

Massachusetts and New Hampshire took longer to repeal their religious taxes. As late as 1803, New Hampshire courts refused to grant exemptions to dissenters from religious taxes (McLoughlin, 1971, 863–870, citing Muzzy v. Wilkins, 1803). Eventually, forcing citizens to pay taxes to religious denominations to which they did not belong led to passage of New Hampshire's Toleration Act of 1819, which ended religious taxation (McLoughlin, pp. 895; 898–902). The end of religious taxes in Massachusetts was finalized in 1833 (McLoughlin, p. 1259) through enactment of the eleventh amendment to the state constitution (McLoughlin, pp. 1205–1206; 1253–1260).

The U.S. Constitution eliminated religious tests for holding federal office (U.S. Const., Art. VI, Cl. 3: “[N]o religious Test shall ever be required as a qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.”), and states eventually followed the federal lead (Adams and Emmerich, 1989, 1578). The increased role in public affairs by various sects and the growth of religious pluralism led to the elimination of religious tests (Adams and Emmerich, p. 1578–1579; McLoughlin, 1971). “[B]y 1793 Delaware, South Carolina, Georgia, and Vermont had completely removed religious tests from their constitutions” (McLoughlin). The voters of Massachusetts supported abolishing the oath requirement for public office, although this did not occur until 1920 (McLoughlin, pp. 1184–1185). In fact, some religious oath provisions remained in place until 1961, when they were finally struck down when the Supreme Court overturned a Maryland law requiring officeholders to declare their belief in God (see Torasco v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 1961).

SAMUEL A. MARCOSSON

References and Further Reading

- Adams, Arlin M., and Charles J. Emmerich, A Heritage of Religious Liberty, U. Pa. L. Rev. 137 (1989): 1559, 1621–1622.
- Borden, Morton. Jews, Turks, and Infidels. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- McLoughlin, William G. New England Dissent 1603–1833. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1971.
- Padover, Saul K., ed. The Complete Jefferson: Containing His Major Writings, Published and Unpublished, Except His Letters. Reprint Services Corp., 1943, 946–947.
- Tarr, G. Alan, Church and State in the States, Wash. L. Rev. 64 (1989): 73.

DIVERSITY IMMIGRATION PROGRAM

Source and Purpose

Immigration is the act of moving to or settling in another country or region, temporarily or permanently. The Diversity Immigration Program, also popularly known as the “DV lottery program,” is a congressionally mandated immigrant visa program administered on an annual basis by the Department of State under the authority of section 203(c) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA). More specifically, as amended, section 203 of the act creates a new class of immigrants known as “diversity immigrants.” Since 1990, the act makes available 55,000 permanent resident visas annually to persons from countries with low rates of migration to the United States. To qualify, DV visa applicants must comply with simple, but strict, eligibility standards, which require first being chosen by a computer-generated random lottery. The act provides that visas are made available to six geographic regions; however, a greater number of visas go to regions and countries with lower rates of immigration to the United States and no visas go to citizens of countries who have sent more than fifty thousand immigrants to the United States in the past five years. It also limits the number of visas a country may receive to no more than 7 percent in any given year.

History and Events That Led to the DV Program

In its effort to diversify, the legislative history of the Diversity Visa Program is remarkably distinct from previous immigration laws such as the Quota and National Origin Acts of 1921, 1924, and by extension 1952; these overtly discriminated on the basis of national origin in the issuance of immigrant visas to aliens seeking entry to the United States. In 1965, Congress imposed a general prohibition against these forms of discrimination by establishing a seven-category preference system. The passage of the Immigration Act of 1990 was a major overhaul of the 1965 Immigration Nationality Act and therefore consistent with its goals. While it creates new categories of immigrants, it furthers the widely held view of America as a country of immigrants. To be sure, the 1990 act can be traced from a 1981 report issued by a congressional Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy. In that report, the commission recommended three goals upon which Congress could fashion U.S. immigration policy: (1) family reunification; (2) economic growth balanced with the view of protecting the U.S. labor market; and (3) cultural diversity consistent with national unity. These goals served as the basis of the 1990 act; the third served as the foundation for the Diversity Visa Program.

Goals and Actions

Critics decry the 1990 act as simply another bad legislative scheme designed to lure cheap foreign labor. However, advocates and especially President George H. W. Bush sold the 1990 statute as a blend of tradition of family reunification and increased immigration of skilled individuals to meet U.S. economic needs of the 1990s. The act also made several policy changes that are worth noting in contrast to the 1965 statute. For example, the annual allocation of numerically restricted visas was set at two hundred seventy thousand under the 1965 act, but the 1990 law established a flexible worldwide cap based on family, employment, and “diversity” by increasing the total eligible immigration under the new flexible cap. It also provided for unrestricted immigration of certain immediate relatives of U.S. citizens and residents while placing emphasis on employment considerations.

The old preferences for occupation, especially the so-called third and fifth of the 1965 act, placed similar emphasis on employment and immediate families. The new law provides more latitude and flexibility. While it provides for diversity immigrants, it explicitly excludes natives of countries that are oversubscribed. It also requires that prospective immigrants establish that they have at least a high school education or its equivalent with at least two years of work experience in an occupation requiring at least two years of training or experience.

Summarily, the 1990 act increased the total immigration under the overall flexible cap of 675 thousand immigrants beginning in fiscal year 1995, which was preceded by the 700 thousand levels during the years 1992 through 1994. In all, the 675 thousand level consists of 480 thousand family-sponsored individuals, 140 thousand employment-related immigrants, and fifty-five thousand “diversity” immigrants to whom visas are randomly assigned to facilitate the selection of persons from previously underrepresented countries. While the diversity immigration lottery program so far accounts for little more than one-third of the ten-year cumulative increase in permanent immigration, it appears to have had the effect of boosting the employment-related immigration category that was a major objective of the new law. However, critics remain unimpressed and argue that immigration from other parts of the world, such as Africa, is still disproportionately underrepresented under current immigration law.

Impact on Rights and Civil Liberties

An important aspect of the Immigration Act of 1990 is that it repealed the prohibition on politics and policy as grounds for denial of visas to the United States. Specifically, the act revised all grounds for exclusion and deportation by significantly rewriting the political and ideological grounds for exclusion. It ended the ban on communist nonimmigrant visa applicants in effect since 1952 and authorized the attorney general of the United States to revise and establish new nonimmigrant admission categories. The act also authorized the attorney general to grant temporary protected status to undocumented nationals of designated countries subject to armed conflict and natural disasters.

It also created a new subcategory for religious persons seeking immigrant visas under a “special immigrant admission” category. Prior to the 1990 act, religious workers were simply not categorized at all; the new designation limited the number of persons to whom visas are granted under this category. Critics charge that limiting the number of religious workers amounts to the denial of free exercise of religion, but this view has yet to face judicial scrutiny. The act also established a short-term amnesty program to grant legal residence to up to 165 thousand spouses and minor children of immigrants who were granted amnesty under the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (IRCA).

Summary

From numerical restriction to worldwide flexible cap, the overall impact of the U.S. immigration policy of diversity immigration under the 1990 immigration act has been a marked improvement over previous legislation. Focusing on legal immigration by enabling family-based immigration, the act appears to have had the effect of boosting employment-related immigration—one of its major objectives, as well as increased diversity-based immigration. Certainly, opening new immigration possibilities for immigrants from parts of the world previously underrepresented, oppressed, or fleeing from oppression to be part of the American experience of freedom is central to a new immigration policy. The debate over illegal immigration and perhaps the legalization of those already in the country continues as evidenced by recent congressional debates.

MARC GEORGES PUFONG

References and Further Reading

- Bush, George H. W. Statement on Signing the Immigration Act of 1990, November 29, 1990. (S. 358, approved November 29, Public Law No. 101-649).
<http://bushlibrary.tamu.edu/research/papers/1990/90112910.html>.
- Immigration and Nationality Act Amendment of 1965*, Pub. L. No. 89-236, 79 Stat. 911 (codified as amended in scattered sections of 8 U.S.C.).
- Immigration Act of November 29, 1990* (104 Statutes at Large 4978).
- Pub. L. No. 101-649, §§ 131-162, 104 Stat. 4997-5012 (codified at 8 U.S.C.A. § 1153(c) (2000)).
- Select Commission to Study and Evaluate . . . Existing Laws, Policies, and Procedures Governing the Admission of Immigrants and Refugees to the United States. Pub. L. No. 95-412, 92 Stat. 907 (1978).
- Select Committee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, 97th Cong., 1st Session, U.S. Immigration Policy and the National Interest XI (Joint Committee, 1981).
- Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugee and International Law, House Committee on the Judiciary, 101st Cong, 2nd Session, Family Unity and Employment Opportunity Immigration Act of 1990 (Amendment in the Nature of a Substitute to the Comm. Print, May 7, 1990).

DNA AND INNOCENCE

DNA—the common abbreviation for deoxyribonucleic acid—is the genetic substance that determines the characteristics of all living things. DNA consists of two long, interlocking molecular chains. The links of these chains are called bases and a portion of these bases is unique to each human being. Only identical twins share the exact same sequence of DNA bases. Consequently, DNA bases hold the key to distinguishing biologically between one human being and another.

At crime scenes, DNA samples can be collected from blood, hair, skin, saliva, and/or semen. These samples can then be compared to the DNA profiles of suspects in the case. In addition, as a result of the federal government establishing an index system called CODIS (Combined DNA Index System), samples of DNA gathered at crime scenes can be compared to DNA profiles stored in state data banks. In the United States, all fifty states have enacted laws to provide for the collection and retention of DNA samples of all individuals convicted of murder and/or sex offenses. Forty-seven states require all violent offenders to submit DNA samples and thirty states actually require “all felons” to provide DNA samples to be stored in CODIS. Currently, CODIS contains information from over six hundred fifty thousand convicts.

Although CODIS was instituted in 1994, DNA evidence has been extremely useful in helping to identify, apprehend, and convict some of the most violent criminals in sexual assault and homicide cases since the mid-1980s. When properly collected, tested, and preserved, DNA provides an accurate means of identifying and eventually convicting individuals who left DNA at the scene of a crime.

However, DNA can also be and has been a viable tool for exonerating the innocent. Every year since 1989, the FBI has reported that, in 25 percent of the sexual assault cases that they handled, the primary suspects were excluded by forensic DNA testing. To date, there have been at least 150 cases in which DNA technology has been used to eliminate suspects who were charged with serious crimes that they did not commit or to exculpate individuals who were wrongfully convicted.

Approximately fifty nonprofit legal clinics in the United States now utilize DNA technology to help establish the innocence of their clients. Many of these clinics, referred to as “innocence projects,” are housed at universities where students of law, journalism, and/or forensics work together under the supervision of attorneys to establish evidence that will exonerate wrongfully convicted individuals.

These innocence projects make use of state statutes that allow defendants to access DNA testing in order to prove their innocence. Thirty-eight states have now enacted postconviction state statutes related to DNA testing. Most state statutes, however, are limited in scope. For example, in many jurisdictions, DNA testing is limited to defendants who have claimed innocence at trial. Consequently, defendants who plead guilty in state courts are prohibited from accessing DNA testing. Thirty-three states also deny access to DNA testing if the defendant fails to request testing within six months of being found guilty.

Like state prisoners, federal prisoners are also allowed access to DNA testing if they assert their innocence. Under the Innocence Protection Act (which took effect on October 30, 2004), a federal criminal defendant may obtain DNA testing by filing a motion on or before October 2009 or within three years of being convicted.

In addition to establishing rules and procedures to govern DNA testing of federal prisoners, the Innocence Protection Act also provides funding to state governments to review systematically all death penalty cases in which DNA testing may be appropriate. The law does not, however, compel states to develop postconviction DNA testing and procedures equal to the federal guidelines. Consequently, many state criminal defendants can and will be denied access to DNA testing.

One of the simplest ways in which defendants are denied access to DNA testing is when prosecutors and state officials, under political pressure to reduce crime, destroy physical evidence as soon as the appeals process is exhausted. In destroying the evidence, these officials destroy the possibility of a defendant's access to DNA testing. More stringent state laws governing the retention of physical evidence in criminal cases could help resolve this problem and thereby guarantee greater access to justice for the wrongfully accused and convicted. Technology is always advancing, so often physical evidence can be subjected to new DNA tests that had not previously existed. This new technology could be the key to freedom for some individuals. But without the physical evidence to test, no such hope of freedom exists.

In the event that exculpatory DNA evidence is obtained, a new trial will generally be granted. In some instances, however, exculpatory DNA has not resulted in the granting of a new trial. For example, when Joseph O'Dell presented a Virginia court with exculpatory DNA evidence, the court indicated that the evidence did not matter and O'Dell was subsequently executed. Unfortunately, courts in other jurisdictions have also concluded that newly discovered exculpatory DNA evidence does not necessarily mandate a new trial. Thus, although DNA testing has the potential to exonerate the innocent, it is not always procedurally embraced by the justice system.

In other instances, the potential of DNA to exonerate the innocent is mismanaged as a result of poor testing procedures. For example, the Pennsylvania State Crime Lab discovered that one of its scientists had performed shoddy DNA testing. They were consequently forced to schedule the retesting of 615 cases. The New Jersey State Crime Lab discovered that its scientists had failed to control for contamination of DNA samples and they subsequently reopened 102 cases for retesting. Similarly, the manager of the DNA Unit at the Oklahoma City Police Department Crime Lab was fired because of flawed analysis. It was disclosed that none of the scientists who worked in the DNA section of the Houston Police Department Crime Lab was qualified by education or training to do his or her job. As a result of this discovery, evidence in 378 cases had to be redone.

In 2005, another DNA scandal was brought in to public light. It was revealed that a Virginia State Crime Lab senior analyst responsible for conducting DNA tests in capital cases had made significant mistakes in DNA testing. As a result of this, 160 cases had to be re-examined. The mistakes committed by this analyst came to light after it was discovered that a DNA test that clearly supported the innocence claims of Earl Washington, Jr., a death row inmate, had been ignored. According to an audit report of the Virginia State Crime Lab, not only did the laboratory's leading DNA analyst generate erroneous test results in a capital case, but also the laboratory's system of retesting samples to catch these errors completely failed. The external audit of the Virginia State Crime Lab (allegedly the best DNA lab in the country) provided proof that crime labs should not be allowed to police themselves. Considering the professional relationship between crime labs and police departments, it is not surprising that a pro-prosecution bias sometimes exists and blinds individuals to the reality of exculpatory DNA evidence. If, however, DNA testing is to be used in the pursuit of justice, expert oversight of state police crime labs may be necessary to address this problem.

Despite the challenges that DNA testing presents, it is clear that DNA has the potential to provide reliable evidence of guilt as well as innocence. If the United States, as a society, is to realize this potential fully, management of and access to DNA testing must be improved and eventually perfected.

JUDITH A. M. SCULLY

References and Further Reading

- Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Department of Justice. Survey of DNA Crime Laboratories, 2001.
- "The Case for Innocence." Frontline, www.pbs.org, aired January, 2000; updated October 2000.
- "Convicted by Juries, Exonerated by Science: Case Studies in the Use of DNA Evidence to Establish Innocence After Trial," The National Institute of Justice Research Report, 1996. www.ncjrs.org/pdffiles/dnaevid.pdf.
- Edds, Margaret. An Expendable Man: The Near Execution of Earl Washington Jr. New York: New York University Press, 2004.
- Evans, Colin. The Casebook of Forensic Detection. New York: John Wiley, 1996.
- Kurtis, Bill. The Death Penalty on Trial: Crisis in American Justice. Public Affairs Publisher, 2004.
- National Commission on the Future of DNA Evidence, www.ojp.usdoj.gov/nij/topics/forensics/dna/commission/.
- National Institute of Justice. "Postconviction DNA Testing: Recommendations for Handling Requests." September 1999, available at ncjrs.org/pdffiles1/nij/177626.pdf.
- Scheck, Barry, and Peter Neufeld. "DNA and Innocence Scholarship." In Wrongly Convicted: Perspectives on Failed Justice, Sandra D. Westervelt and John Humphrey, eds. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Scheck, Barry, Peter Neufeld, and Jim Dwyer. Actual Innocence. New York: Random House, 2000.
- Swedlow, Kathy. Don't Believe Everything You Read: A Review of Modern Post Conviction DNA Testing Statutes, Cal. W. L. Rev. 38 (Spring 2002): 355.
- Urs, Lori. "Commonwealth v. Joseph O'Dell: Truth and Justice or Confuse the Courts? The DNA Controversy." New England Journal on Criminal and Civil Confinement (Winter 1999): 25.
- Wambaugh, Joseph. The Blooding. New York: Bantam, 1989.

DNA TESTING

Deoxyribonucleic acid, or DNA, is the genetic information contained within the nucleus of cells. It is found in all living cells in the body and determines how the body grows and develops; it is essentially a recipe book for life. DNA controls inherited characteristics, such as the color of one's eyes and hair. DNA is made up of many millions of pieces of discrete information and their exact combination in any person is unique except for identical twins, who share the same DNA. DNA testing, sometimes called DNA profiling or fingerprinting, does not examine a person's entire DNA; instead, it focuses on a few highly variable components of the genetic code. This means that a DNA test gives a probability that two samples with the same genetic components come from the same person, a related person, or an unrelated person.

The techniques behind DNA testing were first developed in the United Kingdom by Sir Alec Jeffreys at the University of Leicester in 1984. Professor Jeffreys was a microbiologist studying inherited genetic variations between people. While he was examining the human myoglobin gene, he noticed what he called a "minisatellite"—a small sequence of DNA that was repeated many times and was theoretically open to a number of slight variations due to mutation and replication. By using these minisatellites as landmarks, Jeffreys was able to find and analyze systematically the differences in people's DNA.

Collection of DNA Evidence

DNA evidence can be recovered from a wide variety of cells and is very easily left behind at a crime scene. It can be recovered from buccal cells found in saliva, from semen, blood, or even from hair follicles. DNA can also be preserved for a long time, and some tests have been performed on remains that are hundreds of years old. The collection of DNA for testing can be a painless and comparatively nonintrusive process using a mouth swab or a hair, but most states in the USA require a blood sample to be drawn.

DNA Testing in the Courtroom

The world's first use of DNA testing in court was in a British immigration case in 1985 to determine the identity of a young boy. The boy in question had been born in the United Kingdom and was the son of British citizens of Ghanaian extraction. He traveled to Ghana and, upon his return, his passport was rejected as a possible forgery. The courts had to determine whether he was the boy in the passport or some other relative from Ghana. The family's lawyer asked Jeffreys for help and he was able to develop a genetic "fingerprint" that proved the boy was who his family said he was. Testing is frequently used in this way to determine paternity in cases where that is disputed.

The world's first application of DNA profiling in a criminal case also took place in the United Kingdom, in 1986. In that case two young girls had been raped and murdered three years apart, but the cases were similar enough that police suspected that they were victims of the same man. The police arrested someone who confessed to the second murder, but not the first, and asked Jeffreys to compare forensic evidence gathered from the two cases with those of the man in custody. The DNA profile showed that the same man was responsible for both murders, but that the man who had confessed was not that person. The police collected DNA samples from over five thousand local men and ultimately used the DNA evidence in the successful prosecution of the murderer, who tried to avoid detection by sending a friend to give a DNA sample in his place. DNA profiling first appeared in a courtroom in the United States in State of Florida v. Tommy Lee Andrews, 533 So. 2d 841 (Fla. Dist Ct. App 1988), and helped to convict Andrews of rape.

DNA Dragnets

As its name suggests, a DNA dragnet involves requesting a DNA sample from a large number of people in the hopes of obtaining a sample that matches one recovered from a crime scene. If the sample does not match, the police can eliminate that person from their inquiries, though police can become suspicious if a person refuses to give a sample. There is usually some attempt to target a particular subsection of the public—for example, local males within a particular age range and/or of a particular race—but this still encompasses a great many people.

In the United States a DNA dragnet can be particularly controversial because it is generally held that the Fourth Amendment protects one from "mass suspicionless searches" (Veronia School Dist. v. Acton, 94-590, 515 U.S. 646, 1995). Moreover, the idea that refusing to give a DNA sample might make the police more suspicious seems to defeat the spirit of the law's presumption of innocence. Problems can also arise depending upon the manner of the police in collecting samples. There have been a number of instances in the United States where DNA dragnets have been used, and people have subsequently complained that the police pressured them into giving samples and did not make it seem like a voluntary process. These problems have been exacerbated in cases in which a racial group was the target of a dragnet, leading to charges of racism in the execution of the dragnet.

Perhaps the greatest potential concern with DNA dragnets relates to the police use of the sample. Will it be compared only to the sample from the crime that sparked the dragnet or will it also be compared against samples recovered from other, unrelated crime scenes? Once the sample shows that the person is not connected to this crime, will the sample be destroyed or saved for future use and entered into the DNA database? Most jurisdictions now guarantee that a sample given in a dragnet will be returned or destroyed, along with any record of the DNA profile after it has been compared to the evidence and found not to be a match.

DNA Databases

Police forces rapidly understood the potential for DNA testing to be a powerful tool for law enforcement. As the techniques to analyze DNA became more sophisticated, faster, and cheaper, the possibility of creating a DNA database modeled after long established fingerprint databases grew to a reality. DNA samples recovered from a crime scene could be compared against a permanent record of known DNA samples. This created the possibility of suspects being positively identified many years after the offense took place, thus helping to solve so-called cold cases. A standardized repository for DNA evidence would also allow police in different jurisdictions to link crimes committed by the same person. The United Kingdom became the first country in the world to create a national DNA database in 1995. In the United States the Federal Bureau of Investigation's National DNA Index System became operational in 1998.

Collecting Samples for the DNA Database

Most jurisdictions now have laws mandating DNA testing and entry into a DNA database. Some limit this to those convicted of crimes such as murder and rape, but the trend has been to expand the range of offenses covered to all felonies, with the aim of constructing a database containing DNA samples from all the "active criminals" within that jurisdiction. Some protest against this as a violation of privacy, but the generally accepted position is that, when one commits a crime, one loses some rights and the collection of DNA from convicted criminals to construct a database is now almost universally accepted.

One problem common during the initial stages of setting up a DNA database and requiring DNA samples to be given was whether such measures could be applied retroactively. Should those already convicted and serving time in prison be required to give samples? Should those released on parole be required to give a DNA sample? While there is still no definitive pronouncement on these matters in the United States, the consensus is that DNA samples can be taken from prisoners, even if their offenses took place before the enabling legislation, and from those convicted afterwards. It can also be a condition of parole to provide a DNA sample, though opinion is divided on the question of whether those already given parole could be forced to give samples if that was not a requirement of their parole, and some jurisdictions have allowed this.

Problems with DNA Databases

Unlike fingerprints, DNA samples contain information that reveals something about the private life of the subject. This raises extra concerns regarding how this information is used.

DNA samples can reveal whether the person has genetic disorders or propensities towards medical conditions that have not yet manifested. This could place the state in a position in which it knows more about the health of the subject than the subject does. Subjects could even find out information about their health from the state that they would rather not have known. This also raises concerns about access to this information, particularly by private companies providing services such as insurance.

One of the biggest differences between the information in fingerprints and DNA tests is whose privacy interests are at stake. Fingerprints are thought to be unique, unrelated to other physical characteristics, and devoid of familial connection. DNA, on the other hand, can be very similar between blood relations. Criminals forfeit some of their privacy when they are convicted of a crime and must submit fingerprints and DNA samples to aid future identification. Their family members have not been convicted of anything, but the state will gain substantial information about them through the sample. In 2004, the United Kingdom saw the world's first conviction based upon familial DNA in the National DNA Database. Evidence recovered from the scene was almost identical to a sample in the database and police traced the family tree until they found the person responsible. As DNA databases grow in size, such convictions will become more likely in the future, leading some to question whether it is ethical to store and trace DNA information in this way.

Cross-Jurisdictional Issues for DNA Databases

There are concerns about who can have access to a DNA database, especially across jurisdictional boundaries and when one jurisdiction has different standards for collecting and maintaining evidence. For example, one jurisdiction might require samples taken from someone arrested but not convicted of a crime to be destroyed, but another might retain that sample. As the technical sophistication of databases increases and information is shared more across jurisdictions, the problems of differing sensitivities to the privacy considerations will come to the fore, as will the ethical use of information from one jurisdiction that would have been destroyed or never collected in another.

Implications of the Use of DNA Testing

As DNA testing is becoming more sophisticated and the relationship between genes is better understood, the range of information one can glean from a DNA is growing. DNA can provide information on gender, race, and eye color that could be used in conjunction with traditional policing techniques to link a particular person with a DNA sample. This raises the possibility of increasingly sophisticated DNA “photofits” of the person being sought.

While the extent to which our genetic makeup determines us as individuals is unknown, there is the suggestion that one day everything from eyesight to left handedness to sexual orientation could be revealed by DNA testing. The sheer range and wealth of information might force a re-examination of the ways with which DNA testing is dealt.

The potential to use DNA evidence to link people conclusively to crimes committed decades earlier can have a far reaching impact on the calculus to determine the statute of limitations on crimes, especially of a sexual nature. This capacity has led to pressure to extend the timeframe to prosecute in the knowledge that, while witnesses’ memories may deteriorate over time, forensic evidence, if properly tested and stored, can provide reliable evidence for many years to come.

DNA and Innocence

DNA can also be and has been used to show that through a miscarriage of justice, an innocent person has been convicted of an offense. This is troubling for any justice system and all the more so when the person was convicted of a capital crime. The availability of DNA evidence has prompted changes to allow new appeals based on DNA evidence.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- Laurie, Graeme. Genetic Privacy: A Challenge to Medico-Legal Norms. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Lazer, David. DNA and the Criminal Justice System: The Technology of Justice. Boston: MIT Press, 2004.
- National Conference of State Legislatures. “DNA and Crime,” <http://www.ncsl.org/programs/health/genetics/dna.htm>.
- National Criminal Justice Reference Service. “What Every Law Enforcement Officer Should Know About DNA Evidence,” <http://www.ncjrs.org/nij/DNAbro/intro.html>.
- Rothstein, Mark A., ed. Genetic Secrets: Protecting Privacy and Confidentiality in the Genetic Era. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Tutton, Richard, and Oonagh Corrigan, eds. Genetic Databases: Socio-ethical Issues in the Collection and Use of DNA. New York: Routledge, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

State v Andrews, 533 So. 2d 841 (Fla. Dist Ct. App 1988)
Vernonia Sch. Dist. 47J v. Acton, (94-590), 515 U.S. 646 (1995)

See also Capital Punishment and Right of Appeal; Cloning; Duty to Obey Court Orders; Right of Privacy; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; State Constitution, Privacy Provisions

DOE v. BOLTON, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)

In the 1960s, there was a marked change in attitude among physicians and attorneys toward abortion, which since the late nineteenth century had been a crime in most states except when performed to save the life of the mother. The American Medical Association and the American Bar Association advocated a more liberal approach to the interests of women in terminating unwanted pregnancies. In 1962, the American Law Institute (ALI) included a more tolerant abortion statute in its Model Penal Code. Approximately one-fourth of the states, including Georgia, enacted new abortion laws modeled after the ALI draft. In Doe v. Bolton, the Supreme Court ruled that the relatively enlightened Georgia abortion law was inconsistent with a woman's right to end her pregnancy as delineated in the companion case decided the same day—Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

Mary Doe, an indigent married Georgia citizen, was denied an abortion after eight weeks of pregnancy for failure to meet any of the conditions in the 1968 Georgia abortion statute. Georgia law prohibited abortion except when continued pregnancy would endanger a pregnant woman's life or injure her health, the fetus would likely be born with a serious defect, or the pregnancy resulted from rape. The law also limited the availability of abortion to Georgia residents and required that abortions be performed in hospitals accredited by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals (JCAH) and be approved by the hospital's abortion committee. The law also demanded that two other physicians concur in the attending physician's judgment that abortion is advisable.

The Supreme Court, in a seven-to-two decision, ruled in favor of the plaintiff, citing its holding in Roe that personal liberty as protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment includes the decision to terminate a pregnancy. The Court made clear that abortion was a medical procedure to be undertaken at the discretion of the attending physician. The state cannot prevent even late-term abortions if the physician judges that the abortion is necessary to protect the female patient's physical or mental health. In Doe the Court interpreted the concept of mental health broadly, allowing the physician to weigh physical, emotional, psychological, familial, and age factors—all of which are relevant to the patient's well-being.

The limitation of abortion to the three conditions specified in the Georgia law violates the rule announced in Roe that, during the first trimester, the state cannot place any restraints on a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy for whatever reason. The Court found each of the procedural requirements unduly burdensome as well. The state cannot require that abortions be performed in a hospital, that abortions be approved by a hospital committee, or that two additional physicians concur in the abortion decision. These limitations interfere with the attending physician's exercise of his or her professional judgment. The Court struck down the residency requirement on the grounds that the Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV, section 2, protects persons who enter a state seeking medical services, including abortion.

The broad definition of health in Doe ensured that pregnant women would be able to exercise their constitutional right to abortion throughout each of the three trimesters of pregnancy with minimal interference from the state.

KENNETH M. HOLLAND

References and Further Reading

- Curriden, Mark. "Doe v. Bolton: Mary Doe Has a Change of Heart, Pickets Abortion Clinics." ABA Journal 75 (1989): 26–27.
- Glidewell, Gail, "Partial Birth" Abortion and The Health Exception: Protecting Maternal Health or Risking Abortion on Demand? Fordham Urban Law Journal 28 (2001): 1089–1150.
- Jipping, Thomas J., Informed Consent to Abortion: A Refinement, Case Western Reserve Law Review 38 (1988): 329–386.
- Sargent, John D., Analysis of the United States Supreme Court Decisions Regarding Abortions: Roe v. Wade, No. 70-18, and Doe v. Bolton, No. 70-40, decided January 22, 1973. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, 1973.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Abortion; Privileges and Immunities (XIV); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

Domestic violence is abusive behavior within an individual in an intimate relationship or within family bonds. It includes wife-beating and, more generally, abuse of an intimate partner, whether married or not, and regardless of sexual orientation, child abuse, sibling abuse, and elder abuse. Nonetheless, when discussed, it most often refers to the violence used to control a wife or girlfriend, perhaps because, statistically, abuse of women by their male partners is the most reported and prevalent of family violence. Notwithstanding this understanding, intimate abuse is one of the most underreported crimes in society. Most statutes that address domestic violence include any single act of physical violence. However, most activists and theorists refer to a pattern of abusive conduct by an intimate designed to control his partner. Some scholars estimate that upwards of 50 percent of all women will be victims of battering during their lifetimes.

Control of an intimate is essential in defining the nature of domestic abuse. It is not uncommon for the batterer to blame his victim for his violence. Some of the most dangerous times for a victim of abuse are when she decides to leave her abuser and during pregnancy. During these times, the abuser loses some, if not all, control over the abused and attempts to regain control through force.

History

In early American history, following English common law and ecclesiastical tenets, women were afforded very few rights. Unmarried women were considered to be under the control of their fathers until marriage. Upon marriage, however, women were subject to the marital unity under the doctrine of coverture, which meant that a wife had no legal identity outside her husband. Some of the effects of these rules included women's inability to contract or to own property. The legal doctrine of chastisement had the greatest significance to the perpetuation and sanction of physical violence against women. Sir Henry Blackstone, in discussing the rights and responsibilities of husbands vis-a-vis their wives, said of English common law:

The husband also (by the old law) might give his wife moderate correction. For, as he is to answer for her misbehaviour, the law thought it reasonable to intrust him with this power of restraining her, by domestic chastisement, in the same moderation that a man is allowed to correct his servants or children.

During the mid-nineteenth century, married women's property acts, granting women the right to own property, were instituted across the United States and roughly accompanied the abandonment of coverture and the repudiation of chastisement. These changes in status, primarily for white women, came at approximately the same time as change in other forms of social status, namely, slavery. In fact, there is evidence that the emancipation of black slaves assisted in the formal repudiation of chastisement. One of the first cases to renounce chastisement, Fulgham v. State, 46 Ala. 143 (1871), was as much about ensuring that a male emancipated slave did not feel equal to white males as it was about denouncing physical violence against wives. After citing Judge Blackstone for the proposition that "the authority . . . to chastise" was asserted primarily, if not exclusively, by "the lower rank of the people," the court in Fulgham said:

A rod which may be drawn through the wedding ring is not now deemed necessary to teach the wife her duty and subjection to the husband. The husband is therefore not justified or allowed by law to use such a weapon, or any other, for her moderate correction. The wife is not to be considered as the husband's slave.

Thus, the complexities of societal violence confronted by those in poverty and by people of color became part of the landscape that permitted the political abandonment of wife-beating. Stereotypes of poverty and race, while fueling change for some women, continue even today to impede protection or redress for others.

Repudiation of chastisement altered social condoning of spousal violence in form, but not in substance. That is, after the abandonment of chastisement, courts continued to enforce male privilege of control in the home, even to the extent of tacit acceptance of violent conduct, through deference to family privacy. This deference reinforced norms of violence in the home through the guise of nonintervention by the state.

Modern History

The beginnings of the modern-day battered woman's movement in the mid-1970s are generally attributed to the feminist antirape movement of the 1960s and its existing organizational and political structures. Early strategies of the battered women's movement avoided legal remedies and redress by formal institutions. The law and these institutions were viewed as patriarchal and accommodating to the social structures that permitted intimate violence. Instead, activists established shelters as a means for protection and escape from the abusive relationship and engaged in public awareness campaigns.

In addition to nonlegal means for protection, the movement later began to use the justice system. The focus was to find means of reform that would eliminate, rather than perpetuate, violence in the home. Part of the strategy was to challenge notions of family privacy that denied protection from marital violence.

Activism in domestic violence led to the development of the battered woman syndrome as a judicially recognized description of victim's responses in abusive relationships. Recognition of this syndrome allows an expert to explain to a jury the mental state of a reasonable person in the defendant's situation. This kind of testimony is often necessary to support a defense of self in the context of a murder prosecution.

Recent efforts to reform the legal system and its ability to address domestic violence include no-drop prosecution rules, mandatory arrest, and inclusion in hate crime legislation. Some of these efforts are controversial and are as yet not fully tested for efficacy. Activists' reform efforts, within and outside the legal system, will continue as long as violence within the home exists as a social problem.

Other recent efforts for reform include those within the federal system such as the Violence Against Women Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-322, §§ 40001-40703, 108 Stat. 1902. This legislation includes funding for shelters, encouraging arrest and prosecution, and incentives for prevention through education and support programs. Unfortunately, in United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000), the Supreme Court significantly undercut the ability of this legislation to redefine intimate violence as a public problem rather than merely a matter of private concern. It held that Congress exceeded its authority under the Commerce Clause and section five of the Fourteenth Amendment by creating in the act a federal civil remedy for persons victimized by gender-motivated violence. The Violence Against Women: Civil Rights for Women Act, 42 U.S.C. § 13981 (2000), was promulgated to allow for a private right of action within the constitutional limits addressed by Morrison.

Resistance by activists to using the legal system for redress was not entirely unfounded. Current areas of concern involve ways in which the legal system is turned against battered women. This includes dependency or failure to protect actions by child welfare authorities against the battered woman for conduct by an abusive partner. When child protection may be the ultimate objective, removing a child from a non-abusing parent may nonetheless be detrimental to the child and may punish an individual for conduct not within her control.

Custody matters in family court are also problematic in abusive situations. Abusers often use children as leverage in maintaining control over their partners. Many judges disregard evidence of spousal abuse in considering the best interests of the child. This approach does not take into account the impact on the child in witnessing abuse of one parent by the other. Joint custody arrangements are routinely imposed, allowing the abuser access to his partner through the child and continuation of physical and emotional abuse. This result is gradually lessening as legislatures and judges include abusive behavior as a factor in the best interests analysis.

ZANITA E. FENTON

References and Further Reading

- Blackstone, William. Commentaries. 444-445.
 Dobash, R. Emerson, and Russell Dobash. Violence Against Wives: A Case Against the Patriarchy. New York: Free Press, 1979.
 Gordon, Linda. Heroes of Their Own Lives: the Politics and History of Family Violence, Boston 1880-1960. New York: Viking Press, 1988.

Schechter, Susan. Women and Male Violence: The Visions and Struggles of the Battered Women's Movement. Cambridge, Mass.: South End Press, 1982.

Siegel, Reva B., The Rule of Love: Wife Beating as Prerogative and Privacy, Yale L. J. 105 (1996): 2117.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bradley v. State, 1 Miss. 156 (Miss.1824)

Fulgham v. State, 46 Ala. 143 (1871)

State v. Kelly, 97 N.J. 178, 478 A.2d 364 (N.J. 1984)

United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000)

Wanrow v. State, 88 Wash.2d 221, 559 P.2d 548 (Wash.1977)

See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Marital Rape; Rape: Naming Victim; Sex and Criminal Justice

DON'T ASK, DON'T TELL

"Don't ask, don't tell" is a shorthand description for policies regulating who can serve in the U.S. armed forces. These policies generally restrict the admission and service of homosexuals in the military. While some form of restriction on military service by these individuals is as old as the nation, today's more restrictive military policies were first adopted during World War II.

The current military policies were enacted into statutory law in 1993. These provisions were implemented as provisions of the National Defense Authorization Act of fiscal year 1994, public law 103-160, and have been codified at 10 U.S.C. sec. 654. This legislation was a reaction to promises made by then presidential candidate Bill Clinton during the 1992 presidential campaign. Clinton had suggested that he would, after taking office, issue an Executive Order that would override the policies of the Department of Defense limiting the service of homosexuals in the military. The candidate's proposal was, at least in part, offered in recognition of the brutal murder that same year of a Navy enlisted man.

Development of a New Policy

The issue of the service of homosexuals in the military received substantial attention during 1993. The first part of the debate came with a report from the General Accounting Office, Congress's primary investigative and accountability agency, with a survey of the military policies and practices of twenty-five other nations.

On July 19, 1993, President Clinton announced a new policy on homosexuals in the military. This new policy consisted of several essential elements: those in the military would be judged on their performance and not their sexual orientation; the practice of not asking or inquiring about sexual orientation during the enlistment procedure would continue; an open statement made by a service member that he or she is a homosexual would create a rebuttable presumption that the individual intends to engage in prohibited conduct; and the provisions of the Uniform Code of Military Justice would be enforced in an even manner regardless of the service member's sexual orientation. The new policy was substantially based on sexual orientation. Yet, the term was not expressly defined.

The new policy announced by the Clinton administration was initially intended to be a "don't ask, don't tell, don't pursue" measure. But the President did not include "don't pursue" in his announcement. The secretary of defense added to the uncertainty about the announced policy when he testified before Congress that individual service members could publicly acknowledge their homosexuality without risking a military criminal investigation, but the individual statements might still be credible grounds for a military criminal investigation.

Many believe that the ambiguities in the newly announced administration policy encouraged Congress to act by including a provision in the 1994 National Defense Authorization Act. This measure was signed into law by the President on November 30, 1993. Section 571 of the public law, now codified at 10 U.S.C. sec. 654, describes homosexuality in the military as an "unacceptable risk to the high standards of morale, good order and discipline, and unit cohesion that are the essence of military capability." The law also codified the grounds on which a service member might be discharged.

On December 22, 1993, the Secretary of Defense announced regulations to implement the provisions of the new statute. These new regulations attempted to balance the statutory prohibition on the service in the armed forces by homosexuals and President Clinton's previously expressed desires. The new regulations provided that no one would be asked questions about his or her sexual orientation upon entering the armed forces. However, homosexual conduct could be grounds for rejecting a military enlistment, appointment, or induction.

In the years following the implementation of the "don't ask, don't tell" policies, records kept by the Department of Defense show that the number of discharges for homosexuality has increased. Data from the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network (SLDN) show that 617 service members were discharged during fiscal year 1994, with the number of discharges rising to 1,273 in 2001. The number of discharges has declined in the following years to 653 in 2004.

The Court's Consideration of Homosexuality in the Military

There have been numerous court challenges to the "don't ask, don't tell" policy since 1993. Most federal district and appeals courts have affirmed the regulations and their application as a necessary part of the military's needs for discipline and good order. However, two U.S. Supreme Court decisions have led to questions about the policy's continued validity.

The U.S. Supreme Court in its 1986 decision in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), held that there is no fundamental right to engage in consensual homosexual sodomy. Other federal courts followed this precedent in affirming the discharge of service members for overt homosexual activities. Most of these appellate decisions found that there was a rational relationship between the military's needs for unit cohesion and discipline and the policies adopted restricting homosexuals from serving in the military.

However, in 2003, the Supreme Court in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), found a Texas statute that prohibited sexual acts between same-sex couples unconstitutional. In this opinion, the Court focused on the liberty interests protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. The Lawrence decision holds that this liberty interest in privacy even protects a right for adults to engage in consensual and legal homosexual conduct.

While neither Supreme Court decision directly challenged the military's policies governing the service of homosexuals in the military, the Lawrence decision poses a problem for the armed forces. Article 125 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice defines sodomy as a court martial event for which criminal punishment may be imposed. That provision is now called into question by this most recent decision.

An indirect challenge to the "don't ask, don't tell" policies was before the U.S. Supreme Court during its 2005 term. This appeal challenged the right of the federal government to deny federal funds to institutions barring military recruiters from their campuses because of the military's policies regarding the service of homosexuals. A decision is expected in 2006.

JERRY E. STEPHENS

References and Further Reading

- Balkin, Jack, and Geoffrey Bateman, eds. Don't Ask, Don't Tell: Debating the Gay Ban in the Military. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Eskridge, William N. Gaylaw: Challenging the Apartheid of the Closet. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited*Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1994, Public Law 103-160, sec. 571, codified at 10 U.S.C. sec. 654DOUBLE JEOPARDY (V): EARLY HISTORY, BACKGROUND, FRAMING*Origins of the Guarantee

The Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment protects a person from being placed twice in jeopardy for the “same offense.” While the exact origins of this guarantee against double jeopardy are not known, there can be no doubt that it possesses a long history. Ancient Jewish law contained references to principles encompassed by double jeopardy law; early Greek and early Roman law provided some form of protection against double jeopardy; and a prohibition against double jeopardy, emanating from a reading given to a verse in the Old Testament by Saint Jerome in 391, entered canon law as early as 847.

English Common Law

By the second half of the eighteenth century, the protection against double jeopardy was firmly established in English common law through the pleas of autrefois acquit (a former acquittal), autrefois convict (a former conviction), and pardon. Indeed, in his Commentaries, published between 1765 and 1769, William Blackstone, perhaps the most influential writer on the common law, stated that the principle that “no man is to be brought into jeopardy of his life, more than once for the same offense,” upon which the pleas are based, constitutes a “universal maxim of the common law.”

Various theories have been offered to explain the introduction of the double jeopardy principle into the common law. One theory postulates that it came from the Continent through canon law or through Roman law. Another theory suggests that the twelfth-century power struggle between Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, and King Henry II, which ended in Henry’s retreating from his claim that the royal courts could punish clerics after they were convicted of a crime and stripped of their clerical status in an ecclesiastical court, led to the introduction of the principle. Still another theory claims that the protection against double jeopardy merely evolved over hundreds of years from Anglo-Saxon criminal procedure.

The scope of the common law’s protection against double jeopardy in the hundred years following the Norman Conquest in 1066 cannot be ascertained. The available evidence suggests that the earliest rulers paid little heed to questions of double jeopardy. For example, the Charter of Liberties issued by Henry I in 1101 did not contain a protection against double jeopardy, and in 1163, Henry II claimed he could try a cleric for murdering a knight despite the cleric’s acquittal of that offense in an ecclesiastical court.

Some cases decided at the beginning of the thirteenth century apparently recognized some protection against double jeopardy, but Magna Carta, which was originally issued by King John in 1215, contained no protection against double jeopardy. It is clear, however, that by the middle of the century the principle against double jeopardy had entered the common law. Nevertheless, its subsequent development and emergence into modern double jeopardy law was slow, perhaps because the power to prosecute for offenses had not yet coalesced in the state. At least since the Norman Conquest, criminal prosecutions could be brought not only by the king, but also by a private person in an action against another individual demanding punishment for the particular wrong the person suffered rather than for the offense against the public. By its very nature, the protection against double jeopardy constitutes a limitation upon the power of the state to prosecute and punish an individual, so the state’s gathering of the power to prosecute individuals is a prerequisite to a true double jeopardy situation.

Modern double jeopardy law began to emerge in England in the last half of the seventeenth century. By that time prosecutions by the king had begun replacing private prosecutions as the preferred method of prosecution. In addition, Edward Coke’s Institutes had been published posthumously in 1641 and 1644. Coke detailed the pleas of autrefois acquit, autrefois convict, and pardon and described the basis for double jeopardy, clarifying the concept and emphasizing its importance. Moreover, during the late 1600s, English courts began dealing with a variety of double jeopardy issues, expanding the protection against double jeopardy considerably. Among other things, the Court of King’s Bench held that a prosecutor could not seek a new trial following an acquittal (The King v. Read) and that an acquittal in another country barred a subsequent prosecution for the same offense in England (Rex v. Hutchinson). It also prohibited the practice frequently engaged in by trial judges of discharging the jury when an acquittal appeared imminent in order to afford the prosecutor the opportunity to bring a stronger case in a new trial (The King v. Perkins).

Double Jeopardy Protection in America before the Adoption of the Fifth Amendment

While double jeopardy law continued developing in England during the seventeenth century, it began to take root in the North American colonies. The first colonial enactment containing an express guarantee against double jeopardy appeared in 1641 when the Massachusetts Bay Colony enacted a detailed charter of liberties that served as the model for other colonies and constituted a forerunner of the federal Bill of Rights. The Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641 guaranteed that “[n]o man shall be twice sentenced by Civill Justice for one and the same Crime, offense, or Trespasse.”

Shortly thereafter, Connecticut, in its Code of 1652, adopted a provision against double jeopardy that it took from the Body of Liberties. In addition, the Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina, a document drafted by John Locke but never adopted, included a clause stating that “[n]o cause shall be twice tried in any one court, upon any reason or pretence whatsoever.”

After the Revolutionary War, the former colonies formed the United States of America under the Articles of Confederation. The articles, however, contained neither a Bill of Rights nor an express protection against double jeopardy. Most state constitutions at that time also did not contain an express guarantee against double jeopardy. The first state constitution to incorporate a protection against double jeopardy was the New Hampshire Constitution of 1784. It provided that “[n]o subject shall be liable to be tried, after an acquittal, for the same crime or offense.” In 1790, Pennsylvania ratified a new constitution containing a clause providing that “[n]o person shall, for the same offense, be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.”

Courts in several of the colonies and, after independence, the states recognized a prohibition against double jeopardy through decisional law. For example, courts in Virginia and New York acknowledged the English common law pleas of a former conviction and a former acquittal. Courts in Connecticut (Hannaball v. Spalding, 1 Root 86, Conn. Super. Ct., 1783; Coit v. Geer, 1 Kirby 269, Conn. Super. Ct., 1787) and Pennsylvania (Respublica v. Shaffer, 1 Dall. 236, Pa. Ct. Oyer and Terminer, 1788) also recognized a protection against double jeopardy.

The Adoption of the Fifth Amendment Guarantee against Double Jeopardy

As originally adopted, the U.S. Constitution did not contain a bill of rights. Its failure to do so caused great concern among the country’s populace and many of its leaders, including Thomas Jefferson. When the First Congress convened in 1789, Representative James Madison sought to rectify this omission by introducing a series of proposed amendments, including all those that ultimately became the Bill of Rights. One of Madison’s proposed amendments provided that “[n]o person shall be subject, except in cases of impeachment, to more than one punishment or one trial for the same offense.” A select committee of the House of Representatives redrafted the proposal to read: “No person shall be subject, [except] in case of impeachment, to more than one trial or one punishment for the same offense.”

During the debates on this proposal in the House, several representatives opposed the provision because they believed its language prohibiting more than one trial for the same offense contradicted established law and would, for instance, prevent a convicted individual from obtaining a new trial if prejudicial error infected the individual’s initial trial. One representative, arguing that the objective of a guarantee against double jeopardy is to preclude multiple punishments for a single offense, sought to amend the proposal by striking the words “one trial or,” but his proposed amendment was soundly defeated. An attempt to amend the proposal by inserting the words “by any law of the United States” after the words “same offense” also failed. The House subsequently adopted the proposed amendment concerning double jeopardy as submitted by the select committee and sent it and other proposed amendments to the Senate for its concurrence.

The Senate rewrote the proposed amendment on double jeopardy by substituting the phrase “be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb by any public prosecution” for the words “except in case of impeachment, to more than one trial or punishment.” It later deleted the words “by any public prosecution” and, after joining the provision with several others, approved it in its current form. The House agreed to the Senate’s version, and Congress submitted it to the states (along with other proposed amendments) for ratification.

The states ratified the double jeopardy provision (as well as nearly all the other proposed amendments) in 1791, making it part of the Fifth Amendment.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- Cogan, Neil H., ed. The Complete Bill of Rights: The Drafts, Debates, Sources, and Origins. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997, 297–314.
- Friedland, Martin L. Double Jeopardy. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1969, 1–16.
- Hunter, Jill. “The Development of the Rule Against Double Jeopardy.” Journal of Legal History 5(1) (1984):3–19.
- Rudstein, David S. Double Jeopardy: A Reference Guide to the United States Constitution. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004, 1–15.
- Sigler, Jay A. Double Jeopardy: The Development of a Legal and Social Policy. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1969, 1–37.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Coit v. Geer*, 1 Kirby 269 (Conn. Super. Ct. 1787)
- Hannaball v. Spalding*, 1 Root 86 (Conn. Super. Ct. 1783)
- The King v. Perkins*, Holt. K.B. 403, 90 Eng. Rep. 1122 (1698)
- The King v. Read*, 1 Lev. 9, 83 Eng. Rep. 271 (1660)
- Respublica v. Shaffer*, 1 Dall. 236 (Pa. Ct. Oyer and Terminer 1788)
- Rex v. Hutchinson*, 3 Keble 785, 84 Eng. Rep. 1011 (1677) (discussed in Beak v. Thyrrwhit, 3 Mod. 194, 87 Eng. Rep. 124 (K.B. 1688))

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Bills of Rights in Early State Constitutions; Colonial Charters and Codes; Constitutional Convention of 1787; Double Jeopardy: Modern History; Madison, James; Magna Carta; Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641; New Hampshire Constitution of 1784; Ratification Debate, Civil Liberties in; State Constitutions and Civil Liberties

DOUBLE JEOPARDY: MODERN HISTORY

Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb (U.S. Constitution, Amendment Five).

Twenty simple words contained in the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution protect individuals against being subjected to double jeopardy for any crime. While the phrase “double jeopardy” is commonly understood to prohibit multiple prosecutions and multiple punishments for the same criminal offense, the parameters of the Fifth Amendment promise are often difficult to distill and appreciate.

History provides only slight guidance to the contours of this protection. Instead, at least in the United States, the double jeopardy doctrine has been amplified, if not solidified, by judicial interpretations of these often quoted twenty simple words.

History

Double jeopardy is neither a new nor uniquely American concept. Rather, the principle of double jeopardy dates back to the early Roman period and has a historical pedigree spanning well over one thousand years. In fact, there are primitive notions of double jeopardy appearing in the Bible. In the book of Nahum, we are assured in one translation that “he will not take vengeance twice on his foes” and, in an alternate translation, “affliction will not rise up a second time.” While jurists and scholars debate the origins of double jeopardy, traces of the doctrine can be readily distilled from English common law. The doctrine does not, however, appear in the Magna Carta.

The first known codified reference to double jeopardy was set forth in the Digest of Justinian. Therein, the pronouncement was made that “the governor should not permit the same person to be again accused of a crime of which he had been acquitted.” The concept continued to change and improve through many kings and queens in England. Thereafter, the writings of Lord Coke and William Blackstone were commingled to provide us with the modern day concept of double jeopardy. Lord Coke is credited with carving out the three categories to which double jeopardy historically applied: autrefois acquit, autrefois convict, and former pardon. Blackstone further advanced the doctrine by pronouncing that “the plea of autrefois acquit, or a formal acquittal, is grounded on the universal maxim . . . that no man is to be brought into jeopardy of his life more than once for the same offense.”

A main distinction between historical doctrine and modern double jeopardy provisions is that the former only applied to capital crimes. In modern times, double jeopardy is not limited only to crimes affecting “life or limb” but, rather, applies to all criminal prosecutions and punishments in which an individual is at risk of multiple attacks on his or her liberty.

Colonial Massachusetts gave birth to the modern American approach to double jeopardy in its Body of Liberties published in 1641. As one author noted, “[t]his document bears a close resemblance to the Bill of Rights later to become a stock feature of American constitutions, state and federal.” Similar to prior pronouncements, the Body of Liberties provided that “no man shall be twice sentenced by civil justice for one and the same crime, offense, or trespass.”

Over one hundred years later, in 1784, New Hampshire became the first state to protect against double jeopardy in its Bill of Rights, proclaiming that “no subject shall be liable to be tried, after an acquittal, for the same crime or offense.” James Madison’s proffering at the Constitutional Convention five years later was strikingly similar to the previous colonial offerings declaring that “no person shall be subject, except in case of impeachment, to more than one trial, or one punishment for the same offense.” Yet, it was not until 1790 in the Pennsylvania Declaration of Rights that a phrase resembling our modern phraseology appeared. The Pennsylvania Declaration of Rights succinctly stated that “no person shall, for the same offense, be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.” From these ideals sprang the modern protection contained in twenty simple words.

International Application

In modern times, remnants of double jeopardy exist in many countries, including Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom, parts of Asia, and the United States. In fact, protection against double jeopardy is now provided for in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the European Union Constitution and numerous documents governing international criminal tribunals, including the International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia, the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, and the nascent International Criminal Court.

There are significant differences, however, between the English and American perspective of precisely when “jeopardy” attaches. The English rule, which retains the common-law approach, limits application of double jeopardy to instances in which a defendant has been acquitted or convicted. In other words, the English rule requires a full, completed trial. In contrast, the American rule attaches jeopardy as soon as the jury is sworn, in a jury trial, or when the prosecution offers its first piece of evidence in a trial before the court. Thus, the concept of jeopardy attaches much earlier in the American legal system than in its English counterpart.

Despite the apparent staying power of the general double jeopardy concept, England recently diluted its double jeopardy protection with parliamentary passage of the Criminal Justice Act 2003. England’s departure from the stricter version existing in the United States permits a subsequent prosecution following acquittal for certain offenses, such as murder, rape, kidnapping and manslaughter, when new and compelling evidence arises. Additionally, individuals acquitted prior to 2003 may nonetheless be subject to prosecution retroactively under the act. The revised English approach was motivated by notorious trials in which individuals adjudged not guilty later confessed to committing the crimes for which they were accused. Societal tolerance for such perceived travesties of justice waned and the English legislators responded to victims’ rights groups in altering their previously steadfast approach to double jeopardy.

American Application

While numerous countries maintain variations of double jeopardy, the American approach remains one of the more potent provisions. Enshrined in the Constitution, the proscription against double jeopardy cannot be undermined by the kind of legislative pronouncement that occurred in England and appears to be under way in Australia. Furthermore, unlike Korea, where the prosecution can appeal a defendant’s acquittal, only in the rarest instances may the state or federal government appeal a criminal judgment.

The American interpretation, however, has not always provided criminal defendants a formidable defense. For nearly two hundred years, the Fifth Amendment’s double jeopardy protection was limited solely to actions by the federal government and its subdivisions. Not until the Supreme Court’s 1969 decision in Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969), did the Double Jeopardy Clause extend equally to state governments. Benton considered the Fifth Amendment promise against multiple prosecutions and multiple punishments to “represent a fundamental ideal in our constitutional heritage” and, accordingly, held double jeopardy to be applicable to the states through incorporation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Having so found, the Supreme Court decision in Benton mandates that double jeopardy determinations now be governed by federal standards rather than state nuances.

Nonetheless, states retain certain flexibility under double jeopardy due to the dual sovereignty doctrine. In 1922, the Supreme Court explicitly recognized the power of distinct sovereigns to prosecute an individual for criminal conduct falling within the jurisdiction of both in United States v. Lanza, 260 U.S. 377 (1922). Thereafter, in 1985, the Court further expanded the dual sovereignty doctrine to permit separate prosecutions by distinct state sovereigns in Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82 (1985). By holding that each state has independent power to determine an individual's guilt or innocence under the state's criminal code for all conduct occurring within that state, the Supreme Court permitted a subsequent prosecution of Heath for murder, which resulted in a much harsher sentence than had been received in the other state prosecution. The Supreme Court held that separate, independent sovereigns possess the right to try a criminal defendant for conduct occurring within their separate borders. The conduct, constituting independent criminal acts in each state, is not protected by double jeopardy because the conduct offends both sovereigns equally.

The dual sovereignty doctrine was extended recently to embrace dual prosecution by the federal government and tribal courts on Indian reservations in United States v. Lara, 541 U.S. 193 (2004). Thus, although the Fifth Amendment protects against multiple prosecutions by the same sovereign—or subdivisions thereof—double jeopardy poses no bar to separate prosecutions by independent sovereigns.

Two of the more renowned instances of separate prosecutions by independent sovereigns include the Rodney King case defendants' subsequent federal trials following state acquittals and Terry Nichols's subsequent state capital trial following a federal trial resulting in a life sentence.

Finally, double jeopardy does not affect the ability of a private individual to sue civilly for conduct that may be prohibited by criminal and civil law. The paradigm example continues to be the O. J. Simpson case, in which Simpson was subsequently sued civilly for wrongful death following his acquittal for murder.

Multiple Prosecutions

In its most literal sense, the Double Jeopardy Clause protects against multiple prosecutions after an individual has been acquitted. Double jeopardy ensures that the prosecution will put forth its strongest case first and allow a jury, rightly or wrongly, to assess the defendant's guilt.

In the United States, jeopardy attaches once the jury is sworn or once the prosecution introduces evidence in a trial before the court. Once jeopardy attaches, courts and prosecutors are prevented from retrying an individual for the same offense unless: (1) the jury is unable to return a verdict, or (2) a mistrial is granted and there is a manifest necessity to retry the defendant in the interest of justice. This second category presumes the absence of prosecutorial or judicial misconduct in securing the mistrial.

Finally, although the ability of the government to appeal criminal convictions is extremely limited, a defendant's successful appeal will not bar his or her reprosecution on double jeopardy grounds as voluntary appeal operates as a waiver to reprosecution.

The double jeopardy limitation of the same offense does not preclude multiple counts emanating from a single criminal episode and does not prohibit multiple prosecutions for separate crimes against separate individuals, even when there was but a single criminal act, such as two murders during a single robbery. Rather, the "same offense" test as set forth in Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932), to "determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not." A good example of the Blockburger test in application is the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161 (1977), where the Court determined that an attempted second prosecution for stealing an automobile was barred by double jeopardy when the defendant had previously been convicted of operating the same vehicle without the owner's consent. Finding that the misdemeanor count of joyriding was a lesser-included offense of auto theft, the Court held that the defendant had been twice put in jeopardy for the same offense and reversed the subsequent prosecution.

As a reminder that double jeopardy operates as a limitation on courts and prosecutors, the Brown Court struck down the state court's interpretation of double jeopardy, stating that the "Double Jeopardy Clause is not such a fragile guarantee that prosecutors can avoid its limitations by the simple expedient of dividing a single crime into a series of temporal or spatial units."

Likewise, the Supreme Court found in Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, that the doctrine of collateral estoppel is embodied by the Double Jeopardy Clause. In Ashe, the defendant had been accused of participating in the robbery of six men at a poker game. Prosecutors decided to try the defendant for only one of the robberies first. At this trial, the main issue was identity and the jury returned a verdict of not guilty due to insufficient evidence. During the subsequent trial, defendant raised the defense of double jeopardy when the state presented a much stronger argument regarding identification. The Court had no difficulty finding this second attempted trial to be barred by double jeopardy through the application of collateral estoppel (the issue of identity having been resolved in the first trial), remarking that "for whatever else that constitutional guarantee may embrace, it surely protects a man who has been acquitted from having to 'run the gauntlet' a second time."

Multiple Punishments

A person may not be punished twice for the same offense. The difficulty often arises in defining punishment. For instance, individuals that appeal their criminal conviction may be reprosecuted and repunished and this does not violate double jeopardy. However, someone who has been convicted of a lesser included offense may not be retried or later punished for the greater crime, even following a successful appeal. This is because failure to convict on the greater offense retains the initial jeopardy and subsequent efforts to resurrect the previously faced, though defeated, charge are barred.

Similarly, once an individual has successfully avoided the death penalty in the initial proceeding, a successful appeal of the case will not permit retrial where the defendant is again subjected to possible capital punishment. Instead, an individual that was spared the death penalty is presumed to have had jurors find in his or her favor on the capital issues and can only be reprosecuted with a potential prison term. Other than death penalty cases, there is no limit on resentencing following a proper retrial.

Another important question under the multiple punishment doctrine is whether civil fines, forfeitures, and administrative proceedings qualify as "punishment." The general rule is that matters that are remedial in nature and not intended as punishment do not equate to punishment. Loss of driving license following a charge of driving while intoxicated is the prime example of an administrative sanction that is not considered as punishment for double jeopardy purposes.

The more controversial issue is whether a civil forfeiture of a home, car, or simply monetary funds qualifies as "punishment" under double jeopardy. The general answer following the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267 (1996), is that civil forfeitures do not constitute punishment under double jeopardy. Despite the fact that civil forfeitures may contain punitive elements, the Ursery Court found sufficient nonpunitive elements involved to permit application of civil forfeiture and criminal sanction in the same proceeding without violating double jeopardy. While civil forfeitures may be immune from claims of double jeopardy, such fines and forfeitures may nonetheless be subject to review under the Eighth Amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment.

MARY M. PENROSE

References and Further Reading

Sigler, Jay A. "A History of Double Jeopardy." American Journal of Legal History 7 (1963):285.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436
Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969)
Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932)
Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161 (1977)
Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82 (1985)
United States v. Lanza, 260 U.S. 377 (1922)
United States v. Lara, 541 U.S. 193 (2004)
United States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267 (1996)

DOUGLAS v. CALIFORNIA, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)

In Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963), decided the same day as Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1961), the Supreme Court held that the right to the assistance of counsel at state expense applied to defendants on a first level of appeal, extending Gideon to the first stage of appeal. In Douglas, two defendants were charged with thirteen felonies and both were represented by a single public defender. Both of the defendants were convicted after trial and both appealed. The defendants requested counsel be appointed for them on appeal and the court refused to grant their request, even though neither of them could afford to pay a lawyer.

Under California statutory law, a rule of criminal procedures requires state appellate courts upon the request for a lawyer to review the record independently to see whether counsel would be helpful. If the court concludes that counsel would be helpful, counsel should be appointed. The California appellate court stated it had gone through the record and reached the conclusion that "no good whatever could be served by the appointment of counsel." It then upheld the defendants' convictions and held that the court had properly refused to give them counsel at state expense.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the defendants' convictions. It disagreed with the California appellate court and found that the California procedure allowing the state court to decide whether counsel was necessary to be unconstitutional. The Court held that the procedure violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because "the type of an appeal a person is afforded . . . hinges upon whether or not he can pay for the assistance of counsel." If a defendant can pay, explained the Court, the appeals court will consider his appeal in full, which includes written briefs and oral argument by counsel. If he cannot, the court is allowed to prejudge the merits before it even decides whether a lawyer should be appointed. According to the Court, "the indigent, where the record is unclear or the errors are hidden, has only the right to a meaningless ritual, while the rich man has a meaningful appeal.”

In so holding the Court made clear that it was not deciding whether a lawyer would have to be appointed for a poor person at any higher level of appeal beyond the first-level appeal after a conviction in a criminal case.

Justice Clark dissented. He began by noting that “the overwhelming percentage of appeals by indigents are frivolous and that California has adopted a procedure that saves it the unnecessary expense of the ‘useless gesture’ of providing counsel in such cases.” The justice would have held that this procedure did not violate Due Process or Equal Protection. In support of his conclusion, Justice Clark pointed to the U.S. Supreme Court’s procedure for dealing with petitions for review by unrepresented poor people: in the prior term of the Court, it had decided over 1200 such applications without appointing any lawyers or requiring a full record. California, he noted, furnishes a complete record to every poor person and, if counsel is requested, (1) appoints counsel; or (2) makes an investigation of the record to determine whether counsel would be advantageous. As Justice Clark concluded, “People who live in glass houses had best not throw stones.”

Justice Harlan, joined by Justice Stewart, separately dissented. Justice Harlan did not believe that Equal Protection was relevant and would have held that due process did not require the appointment of a lawyer on a first appeal. First, Justice Harlan explained that the states are free to pass a statute “of general applicability that may affect the poor more harshly than it does the rich,” but that the Equal Protection clause does not require the states to “lift the handicaps flowing from differences in economic circumstances.” Second, as for due process, Justice Harlan was not willing to find that a defendant would be deprived of adequate appellate review without a lawyer. Justice Harlan did not believe that the state’s rule was “so arbitrary or unreasonable” to render it unconstitutional.

LISSA GRIFFIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)

See also Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942); Due Process; Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963); Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932); Right to Counsel; Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600 (1974)

DOUGLAS, WILLIAM ORVILLE (1898–1980)

William O. Douglas served longer on the U.S. Supreme Court than any other justice, and his thirty-six-year tenure spanned major transformations in mid-twentieth-century American society. After a brief stint as a lawyer in a large New York law firm, Douglas turned to teaching, first at Columbia and then at the Yale Law School, where he became one of the leaders of the legal realism school. During the New Deal he came to Washington first as a commissioner and then as chair of the Securities Exchange Commission. He also became a poker buddy of Franklin Roosevelt, who named him to the Court to succeed Louis D. Brandeis in February 1939.

Justice Douglas’s judicial opinions do not fit within any particular school of legal doctrine, although he is associated with the legal realists and considered an activist and a liberal jurist. In fact, he resisted the concept of legal doctrine and rejected any set of propositions from which resolutions of legal controversies could be deduced. Instead, he believed that his job as a justice was to make decisions about specific sets of facts in their particular social, economic, and political contexts. As situations changed, his decisions changed. Initially, he did not appear to be any sort of champion of civil liberties; by the time he retired, he was hailed as one of the staunchest defenders of individual liberties ever to sit on the Court.

Justice Douglas brought to the Court a distinctive approach to law and judging and insisted on an empirical approach to legal problems in the light of actual social, political, economic, and psychological realities. For the legal realists, concentration on doctrine and precedents masked the vital actuality of present circumstances. Although Justice Douglas sometimes referred approvingly to “sociological jurisprudence,” he avoided describing himself as a legal realist or as a functionalist. He was far too independently minded to associate with anything that sounded like orthodoxy.

Having rejected legal doctrine as a basis for judicial decision making, the justice gradually developed a distinctive judicial style. In simplest terms, he considered his job to decide cases. Justice Douglas believed he was responsible for making his own decision in each case that came before the Court and said that he agreed with Thomas Jefferson that each judge should give his individual opinion in every case. Explaining decisions was of secondary importance to deciding cases. Justice Douglas generally avoided established legal doctrine. He said he was opposed to stare decisis, the judicial practice of deciding cases based on precedent, because present controversies should be decided on their own terms, rather than by applying past cases. Particularly in constitutional cases, the justice thought stare decisis was an excuse for not making hard choices about how to apply constitutional values to new circumstances. He often said that he would rather create a precedent than find one.

The Douglas approach to judicial decision-making has been often criticized as result oriented: first deciding the result he wanted to reach and then building an argument for the correctness of that outcome. Critics also have disparaged some of his judicial opinions as careless, slapdash polemics. Justice Douglas was generally unperturbed by criticisms that he was result oriented or intellectually untidy. For him, life, including law, was just like that. Judicial opinions should provide solutions to real-life problems, not academic dissertations about legal doctrine. Sometimes he gave no reasons at all. Since deciding the case was the point of judging, and supporting reasons were far less important, it is not surprising that he did not often invest a lot of time developing the latter.

Justice Douglas had an uncanny ability to understand what was at issue in complicated cases and to envision new ways of looking at them. A typical Douglas opinion is filled with facts and may even have an appendix or two to provide even more background for his view of the case. He would first focus on the facts at issue and then find a key, pivotal issue at the heart of the legal controversy. In the latter part of his judicial career, he grasped cases especially quickly because he believed that legal controversies, like much of human behavior, fall into cyclical patterns, recurring every decade or so.

The justice's opinion for the Court in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), which recognized a penumbral right of privacy in the Constitution, provides a typical as well as famous example of his characteristic approach to judicial decision-making. In Griswold, the Court held unconstitutional a Connecticut criminal statute prohibiting the use and distribution of contraceptives. Justice Douglas saw the heart of the case as marital privacy: "Would we allow the police to search the sacred precincts of marital bedrooms for telltale signs of the use of contraceptives?" he asked, and then answered: "The very idea is repulsive to the notions of privacy surrounding the marriage relationship." The justice's opinion found that the penumbras of various constitutional guarantees establish a "right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights," which protects marriage as "a coming together for better or for worse, hopefully enduring, and intimate to the degree of being sacred." His insight into what was really at stake in Griswold retains remarkable vitality.

According to Justice Douglas, the Constitution not only established the Supreme Court's political role, but also provided a set of general principles that the Court was to apply. These constitutional principles provided a philosophy which must be interpreted and applied by judges in light of their lives and experiences. For the justice, such a dynamic approach to constitutional interpretation was not at all incompatible with strict construction. Justice Douglas considered himself a strict constructionist, like Hugo Black, because he believed strict construction meant not subtracting from or making exceptions to constitutional freedoms. He also considered himself a strict incorporationist because he believed that all of the rights contained in the Bill of Rights were incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment's due process guarantee against state and local action that deprives individuals of liberty.

Among the more interesting examples of Justice Douglas's adjustment of constitutional guarantees to contemporary circumstances was his 1946 opinion in United States v. Causby, 328 U.S. 256 (1946). The case was brought by a North Carolina chicken farmer whose property served as a glide path for military aircraft using an adjacent airport during World War II. The farmer sought compensation under the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment because the overflights made his property less valuable. Justice Douglas's opinion recognized two important realities. First, modern air transport requires use of the air space above private property as part of the public domain, where airplanes can fly without restriction by those who own the land below. At the same time, the farmer's particular circumstances involved frequent low-level takeoffs and landings. That particular pattern of overflights, so low that they frightened the farmer's chickens literally to death, was a government use of the farmer's land. Since this government use made the farmer's land less valuable, the farmer was entitled to recover just compensation for his loss.

For Justice Douglas, applying constitutional guarantees that the government will not take property without paying just compensation required focusing on what was really at stake: the devaluation of the chicken farmer's land by the government's overflights. In a sense, the decision is result oriented: big government should bear the financial loss rather than the small farmer. But the opinion's apt focus on the particular circumstances of the case also exemplifies the justice's characteristic ability to apply the Constitution to new circumstances and technologies.

Change was at once inevitable and beneficial in his view. Unconstrained by commitment to doctrinal consistency, Douglas was notably uninhibited about changing his mind. There are many instances of cases in which he simply admitted that an earlier decision or view was wrong. In the 1940s, the Supreme Court decided a series of cases that involved the constitutionality of compelling school children to salute the American flag. In Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), Justice Douglas first voted with the majority of the Court that Jehovah's Witnesses children could be compelled to salute the flag, even though doing so violated their religious beliefs. Three years later, in Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), he changed his mind and joined Justice Black in a concurring opinion that argued that forced expression contrary to an individual's religious principles violates the First Amendment.

In 1952, Justice Douglas forthrightly declared that he had changed his views with regard to the constitutionality of electronic surveillance. Dissenting in On Lee v. United States, a case involving a narcotics agent carrying a hidden microphone, he simply confessed that his earlier tolerance of electronic surveillance in Goldman v. United States (1942) had been mistaken. "I now more fully appreciate the vice of the practices spawned by . . . Goldman. Reflection on them has brought new insight to me. I now feel that I was wrong in the Goldman case" (in not voting to overrule Olmstead v. United States, 277 US 438, 1928, which had found wiretapping to be constitutional).

In addition to cases in which Justice Douglas changed his mind and said so, his flexible approach in deciding particular cases greatly annoyed some of his judicial colleagues, especially Felix Frankfurter. The Japanese exclusion cases and the Rosenberg espionage case are two prominent examples. In these cases, which involved highly charged political controversies, the justice did not see himself or his decisions as inconsistent. In his view, he simply responded to the particular circumstances of various aspects of the cases to help resolve difficult tensions among strongly held values and interests.

The three Japanese exclusion cases, Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943), Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), and Ex parte Endo (1944), contested the legality of military orders that imposed curfews, relocation, and detention of Japanese on the West Coast after the attack on Pearl Harbor. Justice Douglas filed a concurring opinion in Hirabayashi that upheld the legality of a curfew order against persons of Japanese ancestry. He voted with the majority in Korematsu, in which the Supreme Court upheld an order excluding persons of Japanese ancestry from military areas of the West Coast and providing for their relocation and detention. Although the justice opposed racial and ethnic discrimination and said so repeatedly in his opinions, he thought that the wartime circumstances presented by the Korematsu and Hirabayashi cases involved a genuine national emergency sufficiently grave to warrant interference with individual civil rights.

Justice Douglas's sense that the nation was in imminent danger was probably particularly acute because, during this time, he was a frequent visitor at the White House, where the fear of Japanese invasion of the West Coast must have been palpable. However, his opinion for the Court in Ex parte Endo focused on the conceded fact that Mitsuye Endo was a loyal American citizen who posed no danger to the war effort or national security. Justice Douglas's context-bound realist view saw that the government's exclusion of Endo was unjustified and therefore unconstitutional.

Much of William O. Douglas's judicial philosophy focused on the importance of individual freedom and equality. In his 1958 book, Right of the People, he declared, "Our Society is built upon the premise that it exists only to aid the fullest individual achievement of which each of its members is capable. Our starting point has always been the individual, not the state."

The justice's concerns about individual freedom were mostly focused on threatened government oppression, although he sometimes also expressed misgivings about domination of independent entrepreneurs by what he called the unelected "industrial oligarchy." Early in his judicial career he was sometimes willing to subordinate individual rights to broader government interests. For example, in the emergency circumstances of World War II, Justice Douglas thought it constitutionally acceptable to sacrifice the rights of individuals of Japanese ancestry in the interests of national security.

In the early 1950s, he became increasingly concerned about the dangers posed by government regimentation of individual freedom. He came to believe that one of the most important purposes of the Constitution was to restrain government. Dissenting in Laird v. Tatum (1972), he declared, "The Constitution was designed to keep government off the backs of the people. The Bill of Rights was added to keep the precincts of belief and expression, of the press, of political and social activities free from surveillance." In Justice Douglas's view, "The aim [of the Bill of Rights] was to allow men to be free and independent and to assert their rights against government."

Justice Douglas provided the most comprehensive discussion of his views regarding individual freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution in connection with the 1973 abortion cases, Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973), and Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 93 (1973), in which the Supreme Court invalidated Georgia and Texas abortion statutes on privacy grounds. In his concurring opinion in Bolton, he described what he called “a reasoning” about individual rights, which are guaranteed by the Bill of Rights and are included within the right to liberty protected against state government interference under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. Douglas suggested three concentric circles of individual rights:

“First is the autonomous control over the development and expression of one’s intellect, interests, tastes, and personality.” The justice saw these rights, including freedom of conscience and free exercise of religion, as aspects of freedom of thought and conscience that were absolutely protected under the First Amendment without any exceptions or qualifications. In this absolutely protected area, he also placed the right to remain silent under the Fifth Amendment.

“Second is freedom of choice in the basic decisions of one’s life respecting marriage, divorce, procreation, contraception, and the education and upbringing of children.” These fundamental rights, including the right of privacy involved in Griswold and the abortion cases, were outside the absolute protection of the First Amendment and were therefore subject to some reasonable control by the regulatory power of government. Nevertheless, any regulation had to be narrowly drawn and supported by a compelling state interest.

“Third is the freedom to care for one’s health and person, freedom from bodily restraint or compulsion, freedom to walk, stroll, or loaf.” These rights protected individuals as they interacted with others out in the world where the individual, although not exactly immune from government regulation, nevertheless retained certain rights to be let alone by the government, even in relatively public circumstances.”

The particular individual freedom with which Justice Douglas is most closely associated is the right of privacy. He derived many of his views about protecting individual privacy against government interference from his predecessor on the Court, Louis D. Brandeis. But he nearly always referred to a right “of” privacy, rather than Justice Brandeis’s right “to” privacy. Moreover, Justice Douglas’s right of privacy was solely focused on governmental threats to privacy. He rejected imposing damage liability for invasions of privacy by the news media, which Brandeis had suggested many years earlier. For example, dissenting in Public Utilities Commission v. Pollak (1952), the justice argued that when the government forced a “captive audience” of riders on the publicly licensed street cars in the District of Columbia to listen to radio broadcasts, such action infringed on the privacy rights of individuals to be let alone by the government.

After repeatedly calling for recognition of a constitutional right of privacy in a series of dissenting opinions, Justice Douglas eventually persuaded a majority of the Court to adopt his views about privacy in Griswold. In that case, he characterized the right of privacy as based on “several fundamental constitutional guarantees” of individual freedom, including the First Amendment right of association, the Third Amendment’s prohibition of quartering soldiers, the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures, and the Fifth Amendment’s prohibition of compelled self-incrimination. His opinion for the Court found the right of privacy in the penumbras of these constitutional guarantees. In Justice Douglas’s view, “Specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance. Various guarantees create zones of privacy.”

For Justice Douglas, the right of privacy was part of the meaning of the Constitution, even though the word “privacy” does not appear in the text. One had only to open one’s eyes and one’s mind to see it. He believed that the right of privacy is consistent with strict construction of the Constitution because it is part of what the Bill of Rights means. Since he also believed that all of the guarantees of individual freedom in the Bill of Rights are included as aspects of the liberty protected against state action under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, states such as Connecticut were constrained to respect the right of privacy along with the rest of the Bill of Rights. The justice did not believe that the right of privacy was the same thing as substantive due process, which he rejected as simply fastening extra-constitutional personal views and economic preferences of particular justices on the Constitution. The right of privacy was, for him, part and parcel of the Constitution.

Justice Douglas came to agree with Justice Black that First Amendment guarantees of freedom of expression and religion permit no governmental regulation of any kind with regard to speech, press, religion, conscience, or association. In the appeal of the conviction of the Communist Party leaders (Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 1951), Justice Douglas entered a short but extremely effective dissent that tore apart the weak reasoning of Chief Justice Vinson’s majority opinion upholding the convictions. He searched the record to find evidence—any evidence—that the defendants had done anything else than talk and could find no proof that that had committed a single act of any sort, even conspiracy to act. Although vilified at the time for his defense of free speech even for communists, Justice Douglas's dissent has become one of the great markers in free speech jurisprudence. Thomas Emerson noted an essential ingredient in his thought: a "remarkable ability to grasp the realities of the system of free expression." For Justice Douglas, free speech could only be understood in the larger context of facts. The power of his dissent lies in his reliance on the facts of the case.

Justice Douglas dissented in obscenity cases such as Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), in which he stated, "The First Amendment, its prohibition in terms absolute, was designed to preclude courts as well as legislatures from weighing the values of speech against silence. The First Amendment puts free speech in the preferred position." Even though the justice was a victim of obnoxious press accounts of his personal life, he believed that awarding damages for defamation or invasion of privacy was unconstitutional because it involved penalizing the media for disseminating information. For example, he concurred in rejecting the invasion of privacy action in Time v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1957), which involved a sensationalized magazine account of a family's experience as hostages of escaped criminals. He was concerned that the possibility of having to pay damages might discourage publication.

Because he believed in the intrinsic worth of each individual, Justice Douglas consistently favored equality of opportunity. A case involving a special admissions program for minority applicants to the University of Washington Law School (DeFunis v. Odegaard, 1974) presented a particularly difficult equal protection question. The majority found the case moot because the nonminority plaintiff was in his last semester of law school and would graduate no matter what the Court decided. Justice Douglas thought the Court should decide the case.

Repeatedly insisting on racial neutrality and decrying racial, religious, and ethnic quotas, the justice took a hard look at law school admissions practices. After carefully considering the circumstances, he concluded that the law school's special admissions process was constitutional because, in his view, it was designed to individualize and to equalize the treatment of applicants from minority backgrounds. "I think a separate classification of these applicants is warranted, lest race be a subtle force in eliminating minority members because of cultural differences," he wrote. At the same time, he also insisted that "there is no constitutional right for any race to be preferred." For Justice Douglas, equal protection, like many constitutional values, involved a complex balancing of the realities of the situation. Individualized treatment in this instance satisfied his understanding of the spirit of equal protection.

The justice's concerns about individual equality are also reflected in his application of equal protection guarantees to strictly scrutinize legislative classifications that affect fundamental rights. Among the most interesting examples of this approach to equal protection guarantees was his inventive 1942 opinion for the court in Skinner v. Oklahoma. His opinion describes Oklahoma's Habitual Criminal Sterilization Act at issue in the case as "legislation which involves one of the basic civil rights of man. Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race. There is no redemption for the individual whom the law touches He is forever deprived of a basic liberty."

Therefore, the opinion concludes, the Court should apply "strict scrutiny of the classification" that differentiated between those convicted of grand larceny and others convicted of such similar property crimes as embezzlement. Careful scrutiny was required "lest unwittingly, or otherwise, invidious discriminations are made against groups or types of individuals in violation of the constitutional guaranty of just and equal laws." Since Oklahoma provided no reasons why it needed to sterilize people who had been three times convicted of grand larceny, but not people who had been three times convicted of embezzlement, the statute was unconstitutional. "The equal protection clause would indeed be a formula of empty words if such conspicuously artificial lines could be drawn," when such fundamental individual rights as the right to have children is at stake. Justice Douglas later applied this strict scrutiny approach in invalidating Virginia's $1.50 annual poll tax as a condition for voting in state elections in Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections (1966). His idea that legislative classifications that affect fundamental individual rights must be strictly scrutinized by the courts has proved to be powerful as well as enduring.

William O. Douglas's judicial work was as eclectic as it was prolific. People tend to agree strongly or equally strongly to disagree with his independent-minded judicial philosophy, much as they intensely liked or disliked the blunt-spoken and impatient man. Some of his judicial opinions have a remarkable resonance and eloquence. Some are political tracts. Still others appear to have been carelessly thrown together. Through it all, Justice Douglas had an insight into the American spirit, an ability to articulate constitutional values, and a power to provoke thought and argument that few Supreme Court justices have equaled.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Ball, Howard, and Philip J. Cooper. Of Power and Right: Hugo Black, William O. Douglas and America's Constitutional Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Belknap, Michal R. Cold War Political Justice: The Smith Act, the Communist Party, and American Civil Liberties. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1977.
- Douglas, William O. Go East, Young Man: The Early Years. New York: Random House, 1974.
- . The Court Years: The Autobiography of William O. Douglas. New York: Random House, 1980.
- Emerson, Thomas. Mr. Justice Douglas' Contribution to the Law: The First Amendment, Columbia Law Review 74 (1974): 354.
- Murphy, Bruce Allen. Wild Bill: The Legend and Life of William O. Douglas. New York: Random House, 2003.
- Simon, James. Independent Journey. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.
- Urofsky, Melvin. William O. Douglas as a Common Law Judge, Duke Law Journal 41 (1991): 133.
- Wasby, Stephen L., ed., “He Shall Not Pass This Way Again.” The Legacy of Justice William O. Douglas. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1990.
- White, G. Edward. “The Anti-Judge: William O. Douglas and the Ambiguities of Individuality.” In The American Judicial Tradition, New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

DOUGLASS, FREDERICK (1818–1895)

Born Frederick Augustus Washington Bailey, Frederick Douglass liberated himself from his Baltimore owner's possession at the age of twenty. Beaten and exploited by a series of plantation owners, Douglass nonetheless taught himself to read and write. He found relative safety in New Bedford, Massachusetts, calling himself Douglass and securing work as a manual laborer. He subscribed to William Lloyd Garrison's The Liberator, an abolitionist paper, and within a few months he became a full-time lecturer for the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society. Traveling with Garrison and other abolitionists, Douglass developed a reputation as a powerful, passionate speaker, and his greatest asset was his ability to speak firsthand of the horrors of slavery.

As Douglass spoke about his enslavement, he was forced to be vague about his circumstance. As an escaped slave, Douglass could be recaptured and sent back to his master. He was encouraged to write his story and, by the summer of 1845, had published The Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass. The book was an immediate success, but Douglass had included enough information to identify his former master, so friends implored him to go to Europe. Douglass spent most of the next two years touring the British Isles, returning to find that supporters had raised enough money to purchase his freedom.

Returning home committed to continuing his abolitionist activity, Douglass decided to create his own paper. Advised by his friend William Lloyd Garrison that an abolitionist paper written by a black man would not succeed financially, Douglass nonetheless pressed forward. An argument over the issue ended the friendship between the two men, and Douglass moved to Rochester, New York, and began publishing the North Star. Unwilling to take direction from Garrison or any other white abolitionist and believing that blacks should be more prominent in abolitionist activities, Douglass began to believe that emancipation could be achieved through political means. To that end, much of the North Star's message was directed toward free blacks, calling for their self-improvement and cooperation.

Openly supportive of other reform movements, such as temperance and women's rights, Douglass also attracted attention from more militant reformers. John Brown tried to recruit him for his assault on Harper's Ferry, but Douglass refused.

After President Lincoln's assassination, Andrew Johnson offered the position of head of the Freedman's Bureau, which Douglass declined. Douglass supported Ulysses S. Grant in his run for the 1868 presidency, then turned his attention to other political matters. He worked for the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment, which guaranteed blacks the right to vote, then was appointed president of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company. Three years later Douglass received another political appointment, this time as the U.S. Marshal for Washington, D.C. He served in that and other political positions until his retirement.

Thousands of schoolchildren read Douglass's autobiography in English and history classes. Few other examples tell as profound a story as Douglass's writing. Born a slave, self-educated and self-liberated, Douglass had only just begun his real life's work when he wrote his autobiography. The real success came years later: political activist and ideological crusader, Douglass embraced not only the cause of abolitionism, but also feminism and temperance.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Douglass, Frederick. Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, An American Slave, Written by Himself. Boston: Bedford Books, 1993.
- Quarles, Benjamin. Frederick Douglass. New York: Da Capo Press, 1948.

DRAFT CARD BURNING

Several years before mass demonstrations protesting America's involvement in the Vietnam War became commonplace in the 1970s, David Paul O'Brien, along with three others, stood on the steps of the South Boston, Massachusetts, courthouse and, in front of a crowd of people, burned his selective service registration certificate, better known as a draft card. It was March 31, 1966, and O'Brien's protest provoked the crowd to attack him and his companions. Among the onlookers were several FBI agents; after ushering O'Brien inside the courthouse, they arrested him for violation of Title 50 of the United States Code, section 462(b), prohibiting the willful and knowing mutilation or destruction of a registration certificate. Throughout the course of the litigation, O'Brien claimed that his conviction was barred by the First Amendment. At trial, he admitted that he knowingly destroyed his draft card, but took the position that his conduct was intended to be public affirmation of his disapproval of the draft and the war, and the lawful exercise of free speech.

O'Brien was convicted in the District Court for the District of Massachusetts. On appeal, the First Circuit held that the statute criminalizing the mutilation of the draft card was an unconstitutional infringement on the defendant's rights of free speech. It did, however, affirm his conviction based upon a regulation that required persons to carry their registration cards with them at all times, a crime with which he had not been charged or convicted.

O'Brien and the United States appealed. The Supreme Court granted certiorari and, in what might be considered a landmark case, held that the question of whether "expressive conduct" or "symbolic speech"—that is, activity containing speech and nonspeech elements—is protected by the First Amendment will be governed by a four-prong test. The so-called "O'Brien test" is generally acknowledged to be less exacting than strict scrutiny and is sometimes referred to as "intermediate scrutiny":

[A] government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest (United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 377, 1968).

Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Earl Warren refused to concede that O'Brien's conduct was actually intended to send a message; however, he proceeded to apply the test to the facts of that case. After first acknowledging that Congress's power to raise and support armies and to make all laws necessary and proper to achieve that end is extremely broad, the Court proceeded to announce four purposes of the selective service registration card and the restrictions relating to prohibition against mutilation, none of which was aimed at expression.

First, the Court said, the certificate was proof that the holder has registered for the draft. In a time of national crisis, possession of the registration card (which, along with the certification card that also had to be kept on one's person, contained all relevant information concerning the holder's draft status) facilitated "immediate induction, no matter how distant in our mobile society [the registrant] may be from his local board." Second, the cards together facilitated communication with the local draft boards. Boards could respond to requests for information more easily if the person requesting the information had all this information on hand at all times. Third, carrying both cards was a reminder to the holder that he had to inform the local draft board of any changes in the information, such as his residential address. Finally, the prohibition against mutilation assisted the government in achieving the permissible purpose of prohibiting alteration of the cards for a deceptive reason.

The Court then disposed of O'Brien's argument that these interests were already furthered by the requirement that the cards be kept on one's person because the two statutes protect overlapping but different governmental interests. The Court noted that the antidestruction provisions would apply to a person's mutilating a third party's certificate, but the possession requirements applied only to the owner of the certificates. The Court dealt with the fourth prong—the narrowness of the regulation—merely by concluding that it could perceive no alternative that would more narrowly achieve the government interests at stake.

Finally, the Court addressed O'Brien's contention that the statute was passed with the intent of curtailing speech, an argument that had factual support. O'Brien relied on statements made by three congressmen that the statute was enacted to stop dissidents from burning the cards in protest of the war in Viet Nam. The majority summarily disposed of the arguments by reaffirming long-standing Supreme Court jurisprudence that legislative purpose is difficult to ascertain and is not a legitimate basis for declaring a facially constitutional statute unconstitutional. Besides, the Court said, hearings before the Senate and House Armed Services Committees spoke not only to the "defiant" destruction of the cards, but also to the necessity of maintaining them to ensure the smooth functioning of the selective service system, a goal unrelated to expression.

Justice Harlan issued a brief concurrence to make explicit his belief that the O'Brien test would not “foreclose consideration” under the First Amendment of claims based upon regulations at issue that passed that test, but had the effect of preventing entirely communication of the speaker’s views. O’Brien, he said, had other ways of making his position heard.

Justice Douglas dissented. Congress, he said, had no authority to conscript persons in the absence of a declaration of war; therefore, the statutes at issue were beyond Congress’s power. The justice would have addressed that issue, not raised by O’Brien, but raised apparently by a number of cases in which the Supreme Court had refused to grant certiorari.

The O'Brien case is frequently referred to as the “leading case” in First Amendment jurisprudence when courts are called upon to evaluate so-called “content-neutral” statutes—that is, statutes not aimed at the message being expressed. The Supreme Court has directly relied on O'Brien in deciding a number of First Amendment cases since 1968. Twice, the Supreme Court has applied the O’Brien test to ordinances regulating public nudity. In Barnes v. Glen Theaters, 501 U.S. 560 (1991), and City of Erie v. Pap’s A.M., 529 U.S. 57 (2000), first a plurality then a majority of the Court applied O'Brien and held that public nudity statutes (which prohibited nude dancing and required dancers to wear pasties and g-strings) were constitutional, even though they imposed an incidental burden on expression, because a government clearly has the authority to regulate societal order and morality and, in these cases, it did so in a manner unrelated to expression. The requirement that dancers wear pasties and a g-string was a “de minimus” interference with the dancers’ abilities to send the erotic message.

Two years earlier, the Court considered applying O'Brien to one of the numerous flag-burning statutes that have come before the Court. In Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989), the Court rejected applying the more lenient standard because Texas could not posit a purpose to the statute prohibiting mutilation of the flag that was unrelated to speech; therefore, the “more exacting” strict scrutiny standard applied. The Court did, however, reconfirm that not all conduct with a communicative element will be suitable for the O'Brien approach. Not only must the intent to communicate a message be present, but there must be a great likelihood that observers would understand the message sought to be communicated.

Although the genesis of the O'Brien test was a case involving what is called “symbolic speech” or “expressive conduct” (in which the effect on speech is only “incidental”), the standard has been applied to factual situations bearing little resemblance to those of the original case, though not without criticism. In Turner Broadcasting v. F.C.C., 520 U.S. 180 (1997), the Supreme Court held the “must carry” provisions of the FCC were content-neutral regulations that “advance[d] important governmental interests unrelated to the suppression of free speech and [did] not burden substantially more speech than necessary to further those interests,” citing O'Brien.

Following the lead of the Supreme Court, lower courts have frequently used O'Brien interchangeably with the “time place and manner” test generally applicable to any content-neutral statute or regulation, whether its effect on speech is incidental or not. O'Brien’s “balancing approach” has also been said to have spawned the standard currently used by the Supreme Court to evaluate laws and regulations that affect commercial speech, causing some confusion among courts and frequent disapproval from constitutional scholars.

CONSTANCE L. RUDNICK

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law Principles and Policies, 2nd ed. New York: Aspen, 2002, 1026–1032.
- Emerson, Thomas. The System of Freedom of Expression. New York: Vintage, 1970, 80–87.
- Hall, Kermit, ed. The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford Press, 1992, 597–599; 602.
- Mallamud, Jonathan. Judicial Intrusion Into Cable Television Regulation: The Misuse of O'Brien in Reviewing Compulsory Carriage Rules, Vill. L. Rev. 34 (August 1989): 467.
- Martin, Melanie Ann. 1992 Note Constitutional Law—Non-Traditional Forms of Expression Get No Protection: An Analysis of Nude Dancing Under Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 27 Wake Forest L. Rev. 1061 (Winter 1992).
- Seid, Richard A., A Requiem for O'Brien: On the Nature of Symbolic Speech, Cumb. L. Rev. 23 (1992/1993): 563.
- Werhan, Keith. The O'Briening of Free Speech Methodology, Ariz. St. L. J. 19 (Winter 1987): 635.
- Zick, Timothy. Cross Burning, Cockfighting, and Symbolic Meaning: Toward a First Amendment Ethnography, Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 45 (April 2004): 2261.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barnes v. Glen Theaters*, 501 U.S. 560 (1991)
- City of Erie v. Pap's A.M.*, 529 U.S. 57 (2000)
- Texas v. Johnson*, 491 U.S. 397 (1989)
- Turner Broadcasting v. F.C.C.*, 520 U.S. 180 (1997)
- United States v. O'Brien*, 391 U.S. 367, 377 (1968)

DRED SCOTT v. SANDFORD, 60 U.S. 393 (1857)

The Dred Scott v. Sandford case served as a catalyst for providing blacks civil rights and civil liberties under the U.S. Constitution. Specifically, the case helped put an end to slavery in the United States and granted blacks citizenship, due process rights, equality under the law, and voting rights. Ironically, though, this expansion of rights and liberties to blacks did not come about from the ruling in this case. Rather, the expansion of rights and liberties came about from the country's struggle to overturn the Supreme Court's ruling in Dred Scott v. Sandford.

Dred Scott was born in Virginia in 1799. He was a slave of the Peter Blow family. In 1830, the Blows moved to St. Louis, Missouri. Two years later, Peter Blow died, and Scott was sold to Dr. John Emerson, an army surgeon who traveled across the country. Scott accompanied Dr. Emerson on his travels, which included traveling to the free territories of Illinois, Wisconsin, and upper Louisiana from 1833 to 1843. While in the Wisconsin territory, Scott met and married Harriet Robinson, who also was a slave. As a result of the marriage, Harriet's ownership was transferred to Emerson. Dred and Harriet had two children. In 1843, Dr. Emerson died, and Emerson's widow, Eliza Sandford, then began hiring out the Scott family to work for others.

In 1846, Dred and Harriet Scott asked the courts to recognize them as free people, since they had traveled with their master, Dr. John Emerson, to the free territories of Illinois, Wisconsin, and upper Louisiana from 1833 to 1843. The Scotts believed that under the precedent to Rachel v. Walker, 4 Missouri Rep. 350 (1836), they should be granted their freedom, since this Missouri court ruling declared that slaves were entitled to freedom in a slave state if they at one time had residency in a free state. The Rachel v. Walker case, along with other Missouri precedents, established the legal principle in Missouri of "once free, always free." This was a straightforward case that should have led to the Scotts' freedom based on the Rachel precedent; however, problems of hearsay led to a mistrial in 1847. Dred Scott pursued his case for freedom once again in 1850 and his case encountered multiple appeals, all the way up to the U.S. Supreme Court.

By the time Dred Scott's case was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, Mrs. Emerson's brother, John Sandford, had assumed responsibility for Dr. Emerson's estate, and thus Scott's suit was filed against Sandford. Sandford questioned whether Scott had the right to sue in a federal court. Specifically, Sandford questioned whether blacks could be citizens of the United States. Likewise, Sandford's attorney challenged the constitutionality of the Missouri Compromise of 1820, asserting that Congress did not have the authority to ban slavery in the territories.

In a seven-to-two ruling, Chief Justice Roger Taney ruled that blacks were not citizens of the United States. To defend this position, Taney pointed out that this ruling was consistent with the intentions of the men who founded the United States. Taney argued that the language of the Declaration of Independence as well as the history of the times indicated that the country's founders did not intend for slaves or their descendants to be citizens of the United States. In fact, even if a former slave received his or her freedom, Taney explained that the founding fathers never intended for blacks to be considered citizens.

Moreover, Taney emphasized that this view against citizenship for blacks remained the predominant public opinion during the writing and ratification of the Constitution. This idea, he argued, could be witnessed in the Constitution. In Article I, section 9, the Constitution granted the states the right to import slaves until 1808. Additionally, Article IV, section 2 required the states to return escaped slaves to their owners. Chief Justice Taney argued that these two portions of the Constitution indicated that the framers of the document did not view members of the black race as citizens of the government.

In short, Taney ruled that blacks lacked civil rights and civil liberties. More specifically, the Supreme Court ruled that blacks, freedmen as well as slaves, were not "citizens" within the meaning of the Constitution. Thus, while it was possible for blacks to be citizens of an individual state, the Constitution precluded blacks from being citizens of the United States. As a result, this meant that Scott did not have the right to sue in federal courts, and that he and other blacks were considered "property" under the Constitution. Furthermore, Taney ruled that Scott was still a slave and was not a free man based on the fact that he traveled to free territories in the United States. Finally, Taney went on to declare the Missouri Compromise unconstitutional.

Although the Supreme Court's ruling did not grant Dred Scott his freedom, he and the rest of his family did receive their freedom later that year. Peter Blow's sons, who helped pay Scott's legal fees, had promised to purchase the Scott family and set them free if they lost their case in the U.S. Supreme Court. In 1857, Mrs. Emerson sold the Scotts back to the Blow family, who subsequently set Dred and Harriet free. Nine months after receiving his freedom, Dred Scott died of tuberculosis.

The Supreme Court ruling in this case exerted an impact on blacks beyond Dred Scott himself. Reaction to the Dred Scott ruling was mixed and did not settle the controversial slavery issue for the United States. Rather, the Court's decision only furthered the country's division over the slavery issue, which ultimately led to the Civil War. The other two branches of government eventually responded with attempts to overcome the issues surrounding slavery. In 1862, Congress passed the Act of June 19, 1862, which prohibited slavery and involuntary servitude in any of the territories of the United States. That same year, Congress also passed legislation prohibiting slavery in the District of Columbia and repealed the Fugitive Slave Act. Likewise, in 1863, President Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation, which announced that slaves who lived in rebellion states would be free once these states were under the control of the Union army.

Despite these efforts of the legislative and executive branches to eradicate the effects of the Dred Scott case, these efforts were inconsistent with the original Constitution. Consequently, the document had to be amended to overcome the problems of slavery and to promote the civil rights and civil liberties of blacks.

With the end of the Civil War, three Reconstruction amendments were written and ratified to overcome the Dred Scott ruling. Specifically, these amendments recognized and promoted civil rights and civil liberties for blacks. In 1865, slavery and involuntary servitude were abolished with the ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment. Likewise, in 1868, the Fourteenth Amendment recognized all persons born or naturalized in the United States as "citizens." This amendment specifically overturned Dred Scott's ruling that blacks were not U.S. citizens. Moreover, the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited the states from denying blacks, as well as all other citizens, "equal protection" of the laws and "due process of law." Finally, in 1870, the Fifteenth Amendment extended voting rights to black males. Thus, although the case of Dred Scott v. Sandford is notorious for its denial of rights and liberties to blacks, the three constitutional amendments that overturned this ruling have been instrumental in protecting civil rights and civil liberties of all American citizens.

FRANCENE M. ENGEL

References and Further Reading

- Ehrlich, Walter. They Have No Rights: Dred Scott's Struggle for Freedom. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1979.
- Fehrenbacher, Don Edward. Slavery, Law and Politics: The Dred Scott Case in Historical Perspective. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.

Finkelman, Paul. Dred Scott v. Sandford: A Brief History With Documents. Boston: Bedford Books, 1997.

Herda, D. J. The Dred Scott Case: Slavery and Citizenship. Hillside, NJ: Enslow Publishers, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Rachel v. Walker, 4 Missouri Rep. 350 (1836)

DRUG TESTING

President Reagan announced the War on Drugs in a televised speech in 1982. Shortly thereafter, federal agencies began to drug test their employees randomly, particularly those involved in law enforcement and those in safety-sensitive positions. The Supreme Court's first foray into defining the contours of the constitutionality of drug testing of federal government employees came in the companion cases Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989), and National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989).

Skinner involved the drug testing of federal railway employees who had been involved in serious train accidents. In upholding the drug testing regulations, the Court relied on the "special needs" exception to the Fourth Amendment as articulated in Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868 (1987). The Court also noted that the Federal Railway Administration had made a finding that there was a high rate of alcoholism and drug abuse among railway workers. Finally, the Court held that public safety was a concern that outweighed the privacy interests of the railway workers, focusing on the fact that trains were dangerous instruments when in the hands of inebriated workers.

Von Raab, decided on the same day, upheld the drug testing regulations of the Commission of Customs. The regulations provided for random, suspicionless drug testing of all customs officers because they carried weapons and many of them engaged in drug interdiction activities. The Court accepted the government's argument that there was a serious crisis brewing in law enforcement due to drug abuse and held that the government had a compelling interest in randomly testing its customs officers, emphasizing the "extraordinary" dangers of drug interdiction.

Following these two cases, the D.C. circuit adopted a "nexus" test in Harmon v. Thornburgh, 878 F.2d 484 (D.C. Cir. 1989), requiring the government to prove a direct nexus between the employee's position and the possible safety repercussions that could result from drug or alcohol abuse. This nexus test tends to invalidate most drug testing schemes of federal government workers unless the government can prove that a very serious safety issue exists. A few states, such as Alaska and Massachusetts, have declared all random, suspicionless drug testing to be in violation of state constitutions.

Later, the Supreme Court heard two cases relating to random, suspicionless testing of public high school students: Veronia School District 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995), and Board of Education of Independent School District of Pottawatomie County v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002). In Veronia, the Court upheld the random, suspicionless drug testing of high school athletes, holding the deterrence of student drug use to be at least as important as the schemes in Skinner and Von Raab, particularly since high school athletes faced potential physical injury during sports activities. The Court also noted that children entrusted to the care of public schools had lesser expectations of privacy than adults, a holding the Court relied on in Earls as well. There, the Court upheld the random, suspicionless drug testing of public high school students who participated in any extracurricular activity, even those that would pose no danger to the children, such as choir.

The Court's lone invalidation of a drug testing scheme occurred in Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305 (1997). There, the Court invalidated Georgia's requirement that all candidates for state office must submit to a drug test. Georgia made no showing of any concrete threat that would serve to show a special need for the test. Also, the Court noted that the test would not serve to deter illicit drug use because the test was not a secret and drug abusers could abstain for a sufficient time period before the test.

Public opinion about drug testing shifted dramatically after President Reagan's drug war declaration in 1982. Private employers and landlords began drug testing employees and tenants. State and federal public housing authorities began to require tenants to consent to drug tests as a condition of residence. Many state government and private employers require a pre-employment drug screen as a condition of employment. Federal and state agencies sometimes require organizations that receive grants to adopt drug testing policies. Finally, and perhaps most pervasively, individuals convicted of crimes and placed on probation or released on parole are usually subjected to random drug tests as a condition of their release from detention.

Scholars disagree as to the efficacy and constitutionality of drug testing. The magnitude of false positives and negatives detracts from the usefulness of drug testing as a deterrent to drug abuse. Anecdotal evidence suggests that, for example, marijuana users switched to cocaine when their employers began random drug testing because traces of cocaine use leave the body much more quickly. Moreover, an entire industry of manufacturing chemicals that disguise drug abuse has arisen. Recent scientific evidence suggests that expert testimony in criminal cases about the accuracy of drug tests is deeply flawed.

MATTHEW L. M. FLETCHER

References and Further Reading

- American Civil Liberties Union. "Drug Testing: A Bad Investment," <http://www.aclu.org/Files/Files.cfm?ID=9998&c=184> (1999).
- Charles, Guy-Uriel, Fourth Amendment Accommodations: (Un)Compelling Public Needs, Balancing Acts, and the Fiction of Consent, Michigan Journal of Race and Law 2 (1997): 1:461–512.
- Lang, David, Get Clean or Get Out: Landlords Drug-Testing Tenants, Washington University Journal of Law and Policy 2 (2000): 459–487.
- Zeese, Kevin B. Drug Testing Legal Manual and Practice Aids, 2nd ed. Deerfield, IL: Clark, Boardman, Callahan, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Anchorage Police Department Employees Association v. Municipality of Anchorage*, 24 P.3d 547 (Alaska 2001)
- Board of Education of Independent School District of Pottawatomie County v. Earls*, 536 U.S. 822 (2002)
- Chandler v. Miller*, 520 U.S. 305 (1997)
- Griffin v. Wisconsin*, 483 U.S. 868 (1987)
- Guiney v. Police Commission of Boston*, 582 N.E.2d 523 (Mass. 1991)
- Harmon v. Thornburgh*, 878 F.2d 484 (D.C. Cir. 1989)
- National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab*, 489 U.S. 656 (1989)
- Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association*, 489 U.S. 602 (1989)
- Veronia School District 47J v. Acton*, 515 U.S. 646 (1995)
- See also Chandler v. Miller*, 520 U.S. 305 (1997) (candidates); Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868 (1987); National Treasury Employee Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989); Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989); Veronia School District 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995); War on Drugs

DRUGS, RELIGION, AND LAW

Law on many levels regulates access to drugs, complicating any incorporation of an interdicted substance within religious ceremonies. Arguments to obtain that liberty implicate issues on at least three levels. Drug restrictions exist on federal and state levels, and thus the religiously motivated drug users must confront the impediments at both levels.

Previously, an obvious source of support would have been the free exercise clause of the Constitution's First Amendment. As explained later, after the ruling in Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (II), 494 U.S. 872 (1990), that line of reasoning today offers little solace. The best option remains explicit legislative exemptions for the religious use of drugs, specifically (for example, the American Indian Religious Freedom Act) or through the judicial interpretation of more general statutes that command respect for religious practices.

Free Exercise Protections of Religious Practices

Religious liberty in the United States has never been absolute, despite its place as a preferred liberty in law and in the national imagination. The limited scope of the protection of religion was driven home during the anti-Mormon hysteria of the late nineteenth century and the line of polygamy cases that began with Reynolds v. U.S., 98 U.S. 145 (1878). Reynolds announced a belief/action dichotomy, holding that the former was absolutely protected, but the latter was not. The government remained "free to reach" actions "in violation of social duties or subversive of good order," regardless of any religious command.

Thereafter, it would become a matter of dispute about which religious practices the state needed to allow, by refraining from passing some laws altogether or by granting exemptions from general laws that would otherwise conflict with religious beliefs and practices. Cases would address whether the state's justification for any imposed burden need be only rational, or compelling, for interfering with this First Amendment right.

On no topic has this context been more enduring than the use of drugs within religious ritual. Although the conflict could arise, at least in theory, over any controlled substance, sustained litigation has primarily targeted peyote and marijuana.

The Peyote Cases

Peyote use is regulated by federal and state governments, requiring the religiously motivated person wishing to ingest peyote to seek exemption from both. One such group that occasionally incorporates peyote use into its ritual practices is the Native American Church (NAC). Although peyote is a controlled substance under federal law, since 1971 the Church has been granted an exemption (21 C.F.R. 1307.31). Lingering issues concern peyote use by persons who are not members of the NAC and peyote use that is illegal under state laws that do not grant an exemption similar to the federal regulations. For example, in Peyote Way Church of God, Inc., v. Thornburgh, 922 F.2d 1210 (5th Cir., 1991), it was unsuccessfully argued that limiting the peyote exemption to only one religion violated the Establishment Clause. Courts have also been unwilling to allow peyote use by NAC members who are not Native Americans (U.S. v. Warner, 595 F.Supp. 595, D.C.N.D., 1984).

Although some states had offered religious exemptions for peyote use—most notably in People v. Woody, 394 P.2d 813 (Cal. 1964)—many did not. The illegality of religious peyote in Oregon occasioned the litigation of Employment Div. v. Smith (II), which held that the free exercise clause alone does not require exemption from a generally applicable law, including those proscribing a certain class of drugs. As part of the reaction against this drastic curtailment of religious freedom, Congress enacted Public Law 103-344 (108 Stat. 3125, October 6, 1994), which amended the American Indian Religious Freedom Act to grant a religious exemption for peyote at state and federal levels. Significantly, this new exemption is not limited only to the Native American Church, but extends to peyote use "by an Indian for bona fide traditional ceremonial purposes in connection with the practice of a traditional Indian religion."

Nonpeyote Cases

On the surface, marijuana might appear to offer many of the same features as peyote: traditional use of a proscribed substance by an identifiable religious and ethnic minority, Rastafarians. Thus far that analogy has not succeeded. State v. McBride, 955 P.2d 133 (Kan. 1998), ruled that Rastafarians are not "similarly situated" to Native Americans because: "(1) Peyote is consumed by the NAC members only at specific and infrequent religious ceremonies, whereas Rastafarians may consume marijuana in any quantity at any time; (2) peyote generally is not abused at the same rate as marijuana; and (3) the Kansas and federal NAC exemptions were passed under the ambit of the federal trust responsibility, which seeks to preserve the cultural and political integrity of Native American tribes."

The third prong particularly, should it continue to be relevant, would permanently prevent the peyote exemption from serving as a precedent for the creation of a religious exemption of any other controlled substances. Other religious groups less favorably situated have also failed in their claims for religious marijuana use, including Hindus (Leary v. U.S., 383 F.2d 851, 5th Cir., 1967), Black Muslims (U.S. v. Spears, 443 F.2d 895, 5th Cir., 1971), and members of the Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church (Olsen v. Drug Enforcement Admin., 878 F.2d 1458, D.C.C., 1989).

As an alternative to explaining why drug-ingestion rituals fall outside the protections of the Free Exercise Clause, courts have occasionally attempted to circumvent the religious liberty claim altogether by denying that the practice at issue qualifies as “religious” in the constitutional context. For example, in U.S. v. Koch, 288 F.Supp. 439 (D.C.D.C. 1968), the federal district court denied the use of LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide) by the Neo-American Church in part because the organization failed to satisfy the judges that it was a genuine religion. Yet, even when that hurdle is surmounted, if it can be shown that other adherents freely practice the religion without resort to the illegal drug, the ritual may fail to qualify as “intrinsic” to the faith, minimizing the burden imposed by a ban on its use.

Conclusions

The lessons from this thick body of jurisprudence are fairly straightforward. At the federal level, the likelihood of winning a free exercise claim to use a controlled substance in religious rituals is minute. This tactic rarely succeeded in the best-case scenario—peyote use by Native Americans—and was categorically rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court. While the special relationship between Native Americans and the federal government secured for them a legislative exemption, no other group can count on similar largesse.

In contexts in which a balancing test will still be applied, the state’s interest in controlling access to mind-altering substances can be expected to continue to be deemed compelling. This interest will trump any burden on the religious practice inflicted by an inability to perform its sacred rituals.

Nonetheless, this area of the law continually evolves, as religious organizations initiate further suits in hopes of securing a right to worship in their chosen manner. Most recently, the Supreme Court has agreed to hear Gonzales v. Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao do Vegetal, 389 F.3d 973 (10th Cir. 2004), cert. granted Apr. 18, 2005, to decide whether the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 should allow the church access to hoasca, an hallucinogenic tea. As one line of argument is closed, new ones may be asserted, such as Renteln’s (2004) argument that criminalizing substances unfamiliar to our culture under an unproven presumption that they are necessarily harmful can violate the right to culture recognized in international law. These efforts represent an ongoing effort to forge a balance between the well-intentioned secular needs of society and the religious spirit of its multicultural citizens.

JAMES M. DONOVAN

References and Further Reading

- Epps, Garrett. To an Unknown God: Religious Freedom on Trial. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 2001.
 Long, Carolyn N. Religious Freedom and Indian Rights. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.
 Renteln, Alison Dundes. The Cultural Defense. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (II)*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Gonzales v. Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao do Vegetal, 389 F.3d 973 (10th Cir. 2004)
Leary v. U.S., 383 F.2d 851 (5th Cir. 1967)
Olsen v. Drug Enforcement Admin., 878 F.2d 1458 (D.C.C. 1989)
People v. Woody, 394 P.2d 813 (Cal. 1964)
Peyote Way Church of God, Inc., v. Thornburgh, 922 F.2d 1210 (5th Cir. 1991)
Reynolds v. U.S., 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
State v. McBride, 955 P.2d 133 (Kan. 1998)
U.S. v. Spears, 443 F.2d 895 (5th Cir. 1971)
U.S. v. Warner, 595 F.Supp. 595 (D.C.N.D. 1984)
American Indian Religious Freedom Act, P.L. 95-341 (92 Stat. 469, Aug. 11, 1978)
American Indian Religious Freedom Act Amendments of 1994, P.L. 103-344 (108 Stat. 3125, Oct. 6, 1994)
Religious Freedom Restoration Act, P.L. 103-141 (107 Stat. 1488, Nov. 16, 1993)
Special Exempt Persons: Native American Church, 21 C.F.R. 1307.31

See also Accommodation of Religion; Exemptions for Religion Contained in Regulatory Statutes; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background Framing; Native Americans and Religious Liberty; War on Drugs

DUAL CITIZENSHIP

Long disfavored though never formally unlawful, dual citizenship is now completely tolerated under U.S. law and practice. Many nineteenth-century immigrants to the United States technically held the status of dual nationals because their countries of origin refused to recognize the transfer of allegiance to their new homeland. However, active dual citizenship was policed by expatriation measures providing for the termination of U.S. citizenship upon undertaking certain activities as a national of another state, including voting in foreign elections, serving in foreign armed forces, or holding office in a foreign state. Mere residence in a foreign country of alternate nationality or the use of a foreign passport could result in the termination of U.S. citizenship.

Dual citizenship was also the target of harsh moral condemnation. It was often compared to bigamy; Theodore Roosevelt described it as a “self-evident absurdity.” In the early and middle twentieth century, the incidence of dual nationality declined as countries of origin came more commonly to terminate original citizenship upon naturalization in the United States.

The Supreme Court’s 1968 decision in Afroyim v. Rusk found the termination of citizenship unconstitutional when it was not intended by the individual. Although Afroyim and subsequent cases do not protect the status of dual citizenship as such, current practice allows the retention of U.S. citizenship upon naturalization in another country in all cases. At the same time, the laws of other countries are more liberally permitting the retention of citizenship upon naturalization in the United States; many naturalizing Americans today (including those from Mexico) are routinely retaining their citizenship of origin. In the face of greater global mobility, more individuals are born with multiple citizenship to parents of different nationality. As evidenced by the 1997 European Convention on Nationality and its increasing tolerance in the practice of nation-states, there is evidence that dual citizenship may come to be conceived of as an associational human right under international law.

PETER J. SPIRO

References and Further Reading

- Hansen, Randall, and Patrick, Weil, eds. Dual Nationality, Social Rights and Federal Citizenship in the U.S. and Europe. New York: Berghahn Books, 2002.
- Martin, David A., and Kay Hailbronner, eds. Rights and Duties of Dual Nationals: Evolution and Prospects. The Hague: Kluwer Law International, 2003.
- Schuck, Peter H. “Plural Citizenships.” In Immigration and Citizenship in the 21st Century, Noah M. J. Pickus, ed. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, 1998, 149–192.
- Spiro, Peter J., Dual Nationality and the Meaning of Citizenship, Emory Law Journal 46 (1997): 1412.

See also Citizenship

DUE PROCESS

The term “due process” appears in the U.S. Constitution in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, but it is not defined there. It is one of those fundamental legal concepts that arises from Anglo–American legal tradition, and we need to look to history for the meaning. The key word is “due,” meaning fair or that to which one has a right, as in the phrase, “Give him his due.” But historical precedent does not leave the definition of fairness entirely to some natural sense of justice or allow us to be satisfied that process is “due” if it is merely uniform and equally applied. Implicit in the concept is a minimum standard of protection of rights that might be achieved by different procedures, but is unlikely to be protected unless certain procedures are strictly enforced to some minimum degree.

In the amendments, the phrase is qualified by the phrase “of law,” and legal scholars and judges have equated “due process of law” with the phrase “by the law of the land,” suggesting that it could be defined by positive law, such as a statute, or by natural law, common law, or traditional judgments of equity. The phrase “by the law of the land” was first established in 1215 in Magna Carta: “No freemen shall be taken or imprisoned or disseised or exiled or in any way destroyed, nor will we go upon him nor send upon him, except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.”

This was rendered into statute in 1354: “No man of what state or condition he be, shall be put out of his lands or tenements nor taken, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without he be brought to answer by due process of law.” This was further affirmed in 1628 in the Petition of Right: “. . . no freeman may be taken or imprisoned or be disseized of his freehold or liberties, or his free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.”

The equivalence of the phrases “due process of law” and “law of the land” was asserted by Coke in his Second Institutes, in which he specified that “law” meant “the common law” or “by the indictment or presentment of good and lawful men . . . or by writ original of the Common Law.”

The phrase appears again in 1647 in the Heads of the Proposals Offered by the Army:

That the right and liberty of the Commons of England may be cleared and vindicated as to a due exemption from any judgment, trial or other proceeding against them by the House of Peers, without the concurring judgment of the House of Commons: as also from any other judgment, sentence or proceeding against them, other than by their equals, or according to the law of the land.

The phrase later appeared in 1776 in the Virginia Declaration of Rights: “. . . that no man be deprived of his liberty, except by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers.”

These usages suggest that “law of the land” is distinguished from jury verdicts. However, in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments it is apparent that “law of the land” and “judgment of his peers” have been combined in the phrase “due process.” Thus, we can conclude that jury verdicts and, for that matter, the indictments or presentments of grand juries are subsumed in the broader concept of “due process.”

Due process can be legislative or administrative, as well as judicial, because legislative and executive branch officials may conduct proceedings that have a judicial aspect, which may ultimately affect individual rights, but the focus here will be on judicial proceedings, since most dispositions of individual rights eventually involve the judiciary.

In general, due process is bounded to a finite period of time, with a beginning and an end, and may be classified into types and divided into phases. The two most common types are the inquisitorial, to acquire information and reach a finding, and the dispositive, to decide the assignment and operation of rights, powers, and duties. Inquisitorial proceedings, sometimes called “ex parte,” generally involve only one side of an issue, whereas dispositive proceedings are generally adversarial, allowing contenders to argue their side of the case. Original parties may be joined by intervenors, who enter the case as additional parties, or by amici curiae, who offer commentary and perhaps evidence not offered by the parties, but in the public interest.

A hearing on a petition for a search, seizure, arrest, or execution of judgment is inquisitorial, as is a grand jury proceeding, a legislative issuance of a declaration of war or letters of marque and reprisal, or investigatory hearings of legislative committees. It is a violation of due process to conduct only an inquisitorial proceeding when a dispositive proceeding is required or to proceed with a dispositive proceeding if an inquisitorial proceeding is required to precede and authorize it.

Most of judicial due process is centered on one or more courts, which are a specialized form of deliberative assembly with specific powers to make certain kinds of decisions in certain ways. A court proceeding may be called a hearing or a trial. It is composed of various officers with specialized duties. Presiding over the proceedings is the bench, which may consist of one or more officials, often called “judges” in Anglo American courts and “presidents” or other titles in the courts of some other countries. Other officers of the court include the bar, consisting of the attorneys for the parties, and witnesses, jurors, bailiffs, recorders, clerks, and perhaps others. Even the audience may be officers if sworn to perform certain duties during the proceedings, such as witnessing them.

A trial jury is a specialized form of subassembly within the larger court, with its officer, the foreman, and procedures for reaching a verdict. A grand jury, however, is an inquisitorial assembly with the power to subpoena witnesses, interrogate them under oath, and report their findings. They also have the special power to authorize a criminal prosecution and appoint or ratify the appointment of the prosecutor, who will usually appear before it as a complainant and present his evidence.

Dispositive due process generally begins with some kind of due notice, usually called a petition or complaint, served on the defendant or respondent. It may enter an inquisitorial phase (sometimes called discovery), proceed through a series of fair hearings leading to a finding (often called a verdict), and then to an order of the court, called a sentence in a criminal proceeding. This order may consist of a disablement, or restriction, of the exercise of a right of a party called the defendant or respondent, a deprivation of a right disabled, and a warrant to some agent to execute the deprivation. That or another court may exercise continuing oversight on the execution until it is completed, which terminates the due process.

Due process proceedings may be criminal, leading to a punitive deprivation of life, liberty, or property, or civil, leading to a nonpunitive deprivation of any of those rights. The level of protection of defendants or respondents is higher in criminal than in civil proceedings. Beginning with the opinion in Dred Scott, courts began to make the distinction between procedural and substantive due process. While courts have not consistently defined the distinction, the notion of substantive due process generally speaks to the question of how much protection, as distinct from how to provide that protection.

Although not usually discussed in such terms, the distinction can be seen by examining the requirements for jury verdicts to authorize the court to grant the petition of the plaintiff or prosecutor. It is procedural that the verdict be rendered by a jury and not the bench, but substantive that the jury be of a certain size (twelve in criminal cases) and that its verdict be a supermajority of the jurors, in civil cases, or unanimous, in criminal cases. It also enters as rules of evidence, “preponderance” in civil cases and “beyond a reasonable doubt” in criminal cases, or “probable cause” to authorize a search warrant.

Contrary to the Declaration of Independence that “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness” are “unalienable” rights, the exercise of all rights, except due process rights, may be disabled and deprived by some kind of due process, even if the rights are not removed. Therefore, the right to due process is the most fundamental for the exercise of rights. The problem remains, then, of determining the minimum levels of substantive protection and how much variation of procedural due process is consistent with maintaining that substantive level. This is not defined with sufficient specificity in constitutions, and while court precedents may define it in many ways, those precedents may collide with statutes that represent the findings of the legislative branch or the constitutions of states, provisions of which may be challenged in federal courts.

The question sometimes arises whether a person has a positive right to petition and get a fair hearing (called “oyer” in old English usage) and a just decision (called “terminer” in old English usage). The answer is that the right to petition is only the right not to be punished for petitioning and, while there is a right to terminer if a court of competent jurisdiction accepts a petition and grants oyer, there is no right to oyer, except for prerogative writs (see the following). This does not affect whether one has a justiciable right, only whether he or she will get the support of the court in enforcing his right. A court is a public service and the expenditure of a scarce resource, to which no one can have a justiciable or constitutional right to a sufficient allocation. All one can have is a right to a fair opportunity for oyer and terminer under the principle of equal protection, lacking which a person must enforce his or her rights by extrajudicial means.

The main purpose of public courts is not to protect everyone’s rights, but rather to avoid the conflict, and perhaps violence, that can arise from extrajudicial enforcement. The public policy of almost every country is to demand that everyone defer extrajudicial enforcement of their rights if that can lead to conflict and seek the support of a court, if the courts are open, whose judgments can then inform the public which side of a dispute to join in supporting. When the court and public join in helping people enforce their rights, it is less likely that the party judged to be in the wrong will resist. It should always be kept in mind, however, that, ultimately, courts have no power to command that is not based on public consent and support from one judgment to the next. They do not have armies, and if officials and civilians ignored their orders, the rule of law would collapse.

This leads to an important element of due process called “presumption,” to which the parties to various kinds of disputes have certain rights. The most fundamental of these is the right to a presumption of non-authority, which is most clearly represented in the Ninth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. It is the basis for the presumption in favor of the defendant, putting the burden of proof on the plaintiff or prosecutor. It is also the basis for the right of private prosecution of a public right and to have oyer and terminer on petitions for the common-law prerogative writs, such as quo warranto, habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibito, procedendo, and certiorari. The court has a duty to hear cases concerning these writs before other cases, and the public has a duty to consider issuing by default if the respondent and court, having been duly noticed, fail to respond or to hold oyer and terminer, respectively.

The key element of notice can take many forms. A filing with a court is a notice to the court and, while some courts have arrogated a power to refuse to accept certain filings, this is no more proper than it would be for a witness to refuse to accept a subpoena or for a citizen to refuse to accept a summons to appear for jury duty; he is considered noticed when it is presented to him, whether he accepts it or not. The defendant in a case is deemed noticed by a summons to appear and answer the petition of the plaintiff or prosecutor, and if he ignores it, he is subject to penalties or a default judgment. A criminal arrest is a kind of notice to appear for arraignment and may or may not be custodial—that is, be combined with detention. On a petition for a prerogative writ, notice is to a public or private official to prove his authority to perform or not perform certain acts or, as with a quo warranto, to act or continue holding an office.

A public notice is one posted at one or more public places or in a publication of record. It is used for such purposes as to call for a public assembly or election or for a militia muster; to announce a public sale, perhaps on a foreclosure or to satisfy a judgment; or as a way to reach a public or private party whose identity or whereabouts are unknown, such as the owner of unclaimed property or property on which taxes are overdue.

The substantive component of notice is that the respondent must have sufficient time to respond and prepare to respond. For example, the traditional and usually statutory periods for responding to a petition for a prerogative writ were three to twenty days, depending on the distance of the respondent from the court, and usually twenty days for public notices. If the respondent needs more time to prepare a response, he or she may petition the court for additional time, called a continuance, but granting a continuance is generally at the discretion of the court.

There are a number of open issues involving due process. For example, during the period just before and after the founding of the United States, the standard of due process was to argue all issues of law in the presence of the jury, especially in criminal cases.

It was understood that although the primary role of the jury was to bring a verdict on the facts, in bringing a general verdict of guilty or not guilty, they necessarily had to review the decisions of the bench and could only do so if they heard all the legal argument that led to such decisions. However, beginning in the second third of the nineteenth century, first in England and then in the United States, courts began to demand that legal argument be made in written pleadings, mostly presented to the bench prior to convening the jury, and decided in chambers or out of the hearing of the jury.

This process has been called “Mansfieldization” by some, after Lord Mansfield, an English jurist of the late eighteenth century, who led the courts toward this practice. He was opposed by Lord Camden, whose views on the role of the jury in reviewing the legal argument were more popular with English Whigs and with the founders of the United States. Today, the bench will hold a party or his attorney in contempt or initiate disbarment of a lawyer if he mentions the law in the presence of the jury, other than perhaps in the course of raising an objection. The evidence of history strongly supports the position that this practice is a violation of the due process rights of defendants.

Another controversy concerns the practice of holding persons as material witnesses or for contempt of court at the sole discretion of a judge, for long periods of time, without access to counsel. If they were charged with a crime, these individuals would have to be released for lack of access to counsel, lack of speedy trial, lack of compulsion of witnesses, or other due process violations. There is no express provision of the U.S. Constitution that authorizes criminal prosecution for contempt of court. The power is asserted by judges as an inherent power of courts. They also assert the power to make their own rules of judicial procedure, even contrary to legislative statutes, and to control who may be admitted to the practice of law in their courts by a customary practice of admitting lawyers to the bar and disbarring them or prosecuting laypersons for the unauthorized practice of law.

An ongoing controversy concerns the traditional doctrine or practice of stare decisis, which means “let the decision stand.” There is an ancient doctrine of law to decide like cases alike, sometimes called the First Law, and the constitutional requirements for equal protection and due process would seem to incorporate it. Certainly, court precedents that preceded the adoption of the written U.S. Constitution and were well known to the founders are historical evidence of what the founders meant when they used similar language in the Constitution. The requirement for finality of due process also supports the related doctrine of res judicata that things decided in a case do not have to be decided again, unless error or abuse can be shown. It is also reasonable to use court decisions in exemplary cases to clarify ambiguities in written constitutions or statutes and sharpen the boundaries of interpretation.

The problem arises when past decisions or opinions involving similar issues are treated as binding rather than as merely persuasive in deciding other cases. Court decisions and opinions can progressively depart from original understanding until decisions that rely more on precedents than on original text, structure, or historical evidence can depart from the meaning of the enactments in important ways. A judicial process that never returns to original text, structure, and history to re-examine precedent and correct departures or does so only at the top level of the U.S. Supreme Court (which has recently been accepting only about eighty of the eight thousand cases submitted to it each year) cannot be considered constitutional due process. Lower courts can try to distinguish issues in their cases from past precedents to return to original understanding, but this is too often an exercise in legal sophistry that builds a body of precedents that can support almost any decision at all. It leaves too much to the discretion of the bench, thereby subverting the rule of law.

The Fourteenth Amendment expanded the field of controversy over due process. In extending the jurisdiction of federal courts of general jurisdiction to cases between a citizen and his state over infringement of rights recognized for citizens of the United States, it presented the problem that such rights, or “immunities,” could not be defined merely as the complement of delegated powers. The essential idea of the Ninth and Tenth Amendments is that public action that Congress is not authorized to disable or restrict is a right and any declaration of a right is a restriction on delegated powers. Thus, deciding immunity when there is only one sovereign is logically straightforward, in principle.

But states are also sovereigns with their own constitutions that delegate other powers not delegated to U.S. officials by the U.S. Constitution. Powers not delegated to state officials by state constitutions define immunities under the state constitution or statutes, but that still leaves a zone of potential contention where powers are delegated by a state constitution that intrudes into the immunities defined by nondelegation of powers by the U.S. Constitution. Most of this zone of contention arises from the “police powers” provisions of state constitutions to authorize legislation of the health, safety, order, or morals of the public. There is no such broad provision in the U.S. Constitution. The vagueness of state police powers could be interpreted to authorize infringement of almost any federal immunity. This has left the federal courts to adopt standards of review and rational basis tests and a distinction between “fundamental” and “nonfundamental” rights. Only the first of these is protected from state action. This has led the U.S. Supreme Court to authorize state departures from the standards of federal due process in what is called “selective incorporation” of federal immunities.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- Coke, Sir Edward. Institutes of the Laws of England, Part II. London: 1641. <http://www.constitution.org/coke/coke2nd.htm>.
- Haines, Charles Grove. The Revival of Natural Law Concepts. London: Oxford University Press, 1930, Chaps. 5, 6. http://www.constitution.org/haines/haines_005.htm.
- Magna Carta, Art. 39. See also Art. 55. <http://www.constitution.org/eng/magnacar.htm>.
- Matthews v. Eldridge*, 424 U.S. 319 (1976). Often cited as defining sufficient condition of a due process claim, it is sometimes mistakenly taken as a necessary condition to limit standing to those who have suffered actual injury, contrary to the historic right to prosecute public rights privately. <http://laws.findlaw.com/us/424/319.html>.
- Petition of Right, 1628. Art. 3. <http://www.constitution.org/eng/petright.htm>.
- Roland, Jon. “Presumption of Nonauthority and Unenumerated Rights,” <http://www.constitution.org/9ll/schol/pnur.htm>.
- Winter, Steven L., The Metaphor of Standing and the Problem of Self-Governance. 40 Stan. L. Rev. 1371 (July 1988). http://www.constitution.org/duopr/standing/winter_standing.htm.
- Wood, Horace G. A Treatise on the Legal Remedies of Mandamus and Prohibition, Habeas Corpus, Certiorari, and Quo Warranto. Albany: Little, 1896, section on quo warranto. <http://www.constitution.org/cmt/woodhg/wood-hc.htm>.

See also Incorporation Doctrine

DUE PROCESS IN IMMIGRATION

“Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned” (United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 544, 1950). On the other hand, all “persons within the United States,” citizens and noncitizens alike, are entitled to the procedural protections of the Due Process Clauses of the Constitution (Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 693, 2001). To determine the due process rights of noncitizens, it is therefore critical to determine who is “within the United States.” To understand the due process rights of noncitizens more completely, it is also important to distinguish briefly between the substantive constitutional rights of aliens (or the lack thereof) and their procedural rights.

Procedural versus Substantive Rights

From the earliest days of federal regulation of immigration beginning in the latter half of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court has deferred to Congress’s substantive policy choices. Pursuant to the Court created “plenary power” doctrine, Congress can fashion substantive immigration law and policy virtually free from what we might call domestic constitutional norms. For instance, Congress has used race and ideology as criteria for who can enter and remain in the United States (for example, Chae Chan Ping v. United States [The Chinese Exclusion Case], 130 U.S. 581, 1889; Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 1972).

In contrast, the Court has been less deferential to the political branches’ procedural treatment of noncitizens in the United States. Neither the federal nor the state governments can criminally punish a noncitizen without affording the noncitizen the same trial rights due a citizen (Wong Wing v. United States, 162 U.S. 228, 1896). Noncitizens are also entitled to due process protections before they can be deported. In Yamataya v. Fisher (The Japanese Immigrant Case), 189 U.S. 86, 101 (1903), the Court established that a noncitizen was entitled “all opportunity to be heard upon questions involving his right to be and remain in the United States. No such arbitrary power can exist where the principles involved in due process of law are recognized.” Noncitizens considered not within the United States, however, receive no constitutional due process protection.

Who Is “Within the United States”?

Only noncitizens who are within the United States are entitled to the Constitution’s guarantee of due process. This presents no problems for the hundreds of millions of persons with no connection or desire to interact with the United States. But, the lack of procedural guarantees can create a myriad of problems for those wishing to come to the United States and those physically within the borders but not considered “within the United States.”

Noncitizens who apply for visas and/or who present themselves at the border seeking entry are entitled only to those procedural protections provided by Congress or the executive branch. For those whose ties to the United States are attenuated, the lack of due process guarantees results, at most, in inconvenience. As the ties grow stronger, the lack of protection can be devastating. For example, United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537 (1950), involved a “war bride” attempting to come to the United States to live with her U.S. citizen husband. She was excluded from the United States as an alleged threat to national security. The Supreme Court upheld the decision not to give her a hearing, deferring to the attorney general’s conclusion that giving her a hearing would compromise national security.

Significant ties to the United States and inability to travel to another country can exacerbate the harshness of the rule that only noncitizens “within” the United States are entitled to the Constitution’s due-process protections. The plight of Ignatz Mezei amply illustrates the stakes. Mezei had lived a life of “unrelieved insignificance” with his family in Buffalo, New York, for a quarter of a century when he left on an extended journey to visit his ailing mother behind what was then emerging as the Iron Curtain. Upon his attempted return to the United States, he was excluded in the interest of national security and, like Ellen Knauff, he was denied a hearing and a chance to confront his accusers. Since no other country would take him, he was confined indefinitely on Ellis Island. Since he had not been admitted into the United States, he was entitled to none of the Constitution’s procedural protections (see Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S., 206, 1953).

Noncitizens, like Mezei, who are at the border (including those arriving to interior airports), although physically present on U.S. soil, have not passed through an immigration checkpoint and therefore have not been admitted to the United States and are not entitled to due process. For humanitarian reasons, the United States may allow an otherwise excludable alien to visit the United States. Instead of admitting the alien into the country, the United States grants the alien “parole,” which allows the government to maintain the legal fiction that the noncitizen is not within the United States and therefore is not entitled to due-process protections.

To ameliorate the harshness of a strict territorial demarcation, the Court, in Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21 (1982), concluded that a permanent resident alien returning to the United States after a brief sojourn abroad had not cut her ties to the United States so severely as to be entitled to no due-process protection.

The Process Due

For those noncitizens entitled to the Constitution’s due-process protection, the further question is what process is due. To determine whether the government’s action comports with constitutional minima, the Court balances the individual’s interest at stake against the interest of the government in using its current procedures. The risk that the government’s current procedures could wrongfully deprive the individual of that interest coupled with the anticipated value of different or additional procedures provides the fulcrum upon which these competing interests are balanced (Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 219, 334-335, 1976).

MICHAEL A. SCAPERLANDA

References and Further Reading

- Aleinikoff, Alex, Due Process and “Community Ties”: A Response to Martin, University of Pittsburgh Law Review 44 (1983): 237-260.
- Chin, Gabriel, Victor Romero, and Michael Scaperlanda, eds. Immigration and the Constitution, vol. 3, Shark Infested Waters: Procedural Due Process in Constitutional Immigration Law. New York: Garland, 2000.
- Cole, David, In Aid of Removal: Due Process Limits on Immigration Detention, Emory Law Journal 51 (2002): 1003-1039.
- Martin, David, Due Process and Membership in the National Political Community: Political Asylum and Beyond, University of Pittsburgh Law Review 44 (1983): 165-235.
- Motomura, Hiroshi, The Curious Evolution of Immigration Law: Procedural Surrogates for Substantive Constitutional Rights, Columbia Law Review 92 (1992): 1625-1704.
- Nafziger, Review of Visa Denials by Consular Officials, Washington University Law Review 66 (1991): 1-105.
- Saito, Natsu, The Enduring Effect of the Chinese Exclusion Cases: The “Plenary Power” Justification for On-Going Abuses of Human Rights, Asian Law Journal 10 (2003): 13-36.
- Scaperlanda, Michael, Polishing the Tarnished Golden Door, Wisconsin Law Review 1993 (1993): 965-1032.
- , Are We That Far Gone? Due Process and Secret Deportation Proceedings, Stanford Law and Policy Review 7 (1996): 23-30.
- , Partial Membership: Aliens and the Constitutional Community, Iowa Law Review 81 (1996): 707-773.
- Weisselberg, Charles, The Exclusion and Detention of Aliens: Lessons From the Lives of Ellen Knauff and Ignatz Mezei, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 143 (1995): 933-1034.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Chae Chan Ping v. United States (The Chinese Exclusion Case)*, 130 U.S. 581 (1889)
- Demore v. Kim*, 123 S.Ct. 1708 (2003)

DUE PROCESS IN IMMIGRATION

Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753 (1972)
Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21 (1982)
Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 219 (1976)
Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206 (1953)
United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537 (1950)
Wong Wing v. United States, 162 U.S. 228 (1896)
Yamataya v. Fisher (The Japanese Immigrant Case), 189 U.S. 86 (1903)
Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001)

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889) and Chinese Exclusion Act; Citizenship; Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Criminal Law/Civil Liberties and Noncitizens in the United States; Due Process; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Indefinite Detention; Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753 (1972); 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Noncitizens, Civil Liberties; Plenary Power Doctrine

DUE PROCESS OF LAW (FIFTH AND FOURTEENTH)

The Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution contains a clause that prohibits the national government from depriving a person of “life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.” The Fourteenth Amendment has a similarly worded clause that applies to state governments. Other than applying to different levels of government, the two clauses have the same basic meaning.

In its most general sense, due process of law is another term for rule of law, the principle that government cannot act against persons unless it has a legal basis for doing so. This principle does not preclude most government takings of life, liberty, and property, but only those that are arbitrary or capricious in nature. More specifically, due process of law requires that in order to deprive a person of life, liberty, or property, the government must notify the person that it wants to do just that and then must, in a fair hearing, convince an impartial judge or court that the person has violated some previously enacted, but valid, law.

In this general sense, due process of law has an ancient lineage. As early as 1215, it was guaranteed by the Magna Carta, one of several documents that now make up the English Constitution. Therein, the king of England promised that “[n]o freeman shall be arrested, or imprisoned, or disseized, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any way molested; nor will we proceed against him, unless by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.” The principle of due process of law was reaffirmed in the Petition of Right (1628), for it said that English freemen could “be imprisoned or detained only by the law of the land, or by due process of law, and not by the king’s special command without any charge.” It was also at the heart of John Locke’s Second Treatise of Government (1690), which significantly influenced the thinking of those who established the American political system. Before the Constitution was ratified, most state constitutions had a due process clause.

Although the general meaning of the two due-process clauses is clear, exactly what kinds of government actions violate the clauses is not clear. In its first case interpreting the due-process clause of the Fifth Amendment, the Supreme Court said, “The Constitution contains no description of those processes which it was intended to allow or forbid. It does not even declare what principles are to be applied to ascertain whether it be due process” (Murray’s Lessee v. Hoboken Land and Improvement Company, 18 How., 59 U.S., 272, 1856). Consequently, the Court has had to spell out exactly what due process of law means, and in doing so, it has significantly expanded its power of judicial review and generated considerable controversy.

The Court’s decisions interpreting the clauses fall into two categories: (1) those dealing with procedural due process (whether the application or enforcement of a law violated due process) and (2) those dealing with substantive due process (whether a law itself violated due process).

Procedural Due Process

Issues involving procedural due process usually arise in criminal cases in which the Court must decide whether a person’s conviction of a crime resulted from a fair judicial proceeding. As for what counts as a fair proceeding, until approximately the 1960s, the Court’s answer depended on which of the two due-process clauses it was interpreting. The Court has said relatively little about the procedural due process guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment, mainly because there are other provisions in the Bill of Rights that guarantee, as against the federal government, specific aspects of procedural due process. Quite different has been the Court’s interpretation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Because it was the only constitutional provision the Court could use to guarantee procedural due process in state criminal proceedings, the Court has written much about its meaning.

At first, however, the Court interpreted that clause rather narrowly. For example, it said that the clause does not require states to use a grand jury as the way to indict persons of capital crimes (Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516, 1884) or prohibit them from requiring persons accused of crimes to answer questions at their trials (Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78, 1908). In the latter case, however, the Court said:

It is possible that some of the personal rights safeguarded by the first eight Amendments against national action may also be safeguarded against state action, . . . If this is so, it is not because those rights are enumerated in the first eight Amendments, but because they are of such a nature that they are included in the conception of due process of law.

By the 1920s, the Court began using the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to overturn convictions that it felt had not been fairly obtained. For example, in Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86 (1923), it overturned the convictions of five black men for murder because their trial was so influenced by a racially prejudiced mob that the Court held that it was a travesty. Most importantly, in Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936), the Court unanimously held that states could not use coerced confessions to convict persons of crimes.

Decisions like these, however, were usually the result of the Court's examining fully and carefully the record of what occurred before and during a trial. Even in the famous case of Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), in which the Court overturned the convictions of nine black teenagers for raping two white girls (on the grounds that they were denied aid of counsel), it did not hold that in all criminal or even felony trials the Due Process Clause requires that the accused be afforded effective counsel. Rather, the Court justified its decision on the basis of the circumstances of the case and the characteristics of the defendants. Not surprisingly, five years later, in Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937), the Court refused to hold that a right against double jeopardy is part of procedural due process guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. It did so on the grounds that specific procedural rights mentioned in the Bill of Rights, like the right against double jeopardy, are not "fundamental" rights "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty."

In the mid-twentieth century, however, the Court changed its mind on this issue. It decided that most of the rights of the accused guaranteed in the Bill of Rights were included within the procedural due process guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. It held in 1949 that unreasonable searches and seizures like those prohibited by the Fourth Amendment cannot be conducted by state officials without violating due process of law (Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 1949) and, in 1961, that evidence obtained through such unconstitutional searches and seizures cannot be used in state courts against persons accused of a crime (Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 1961).

After that, the Court held that due process of law means that persons accused of serious crimes not only have a right to counsel, but also must be provided with a lawyer by the state if they do not have the means to pay for one (Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 1963); that persons tried in state courts cannot be forced to answer questions or testify in their defense (Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 1964); and that defendants in state courts must be given the opportunity to confront and cross-examine witnesses against them (Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 1965). Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213 (1967), required states to provide speedy trials to persons accused of crimes; Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968), said that persons accused of serious crimes have a right to be tried by juries in state courts; and Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969), held that states cannot try persons more than once for the same crime.

Since the 1960s, although the Supreme Court has elaborated on the meaning of the specific rights mentioned in the preceding paragraph, it has not created any additional procedural due-process rights. It could still do this, however. Moreover, the Court can always declare any deprivation of life, liberty, and property to be a violation of procedural due process if it believes that all the facts in a case show that the deprivation was the product of an unfair procedure.

Finally, the Court has held that procedural due process (a fair hearing of some sort) must also be afforded in various kinds of noncriminal (for example, civil, administrative, juvenile) proceedings that could lead to the loss of a person's liberty or property. What exactly is required in such proceedings? The Court has said that a variety of processes and hearings, depending on the situation, can work to ensure due process of law and legislatures have a role to play in determining what is required (Bell v. Burson, 402 U.S. 535, 1971), but that "the hearing must provide a real test" (Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67, 1972).

Substantive Due Process

The constitutional law of substantive due process is quite different from and more controversial than that of procedural due process. Here the basic issue is whether a law, as distinguished from its application or enforcement, is inconsistent with due process of law. When the Supreme Court first addressed the meaning of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, it said, “The article is a restraint on the legislative as well as on the executive and judicial powers of the government . . .” (Murray’s Lessee v. Hoboken Land and Improvement Company, 1856). Later, the Court said, “It is not every act, legislative in form, that is law. Law is something more than mere will exerted as an act of power” (Hurtado v. California, 1884).

Laws can violate the principle of due process of law in four ways. First, they can do so if they require judges or law enforcement officials to use a procedure inconsistent with procedural due process. The Court has thus said, “It is manifest that it was not left to the legislative power to enact any process which might be devised” (Murray’s Lessee v. Hoboken Land and Improvement Company, 1856). An example of a law that authorized a procedure inconsistent with due process of law was the one struck down in Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Ry. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U.S. 118 (1890), which gave a regulatory commission the power to set the rates for railroads without holding hearings and allowing the railroads to present evidence.

Second, a law violates due process if it is arbitrary or inherently unfair. The emphasis here is not on a law’s effect—the liberty or property that it takes, prohibits, or regulates—but on its nature as law. Even if the liberty or property it takes is very minor, a law can still violate due process if it does not possess the requisite character of law. On this point, the Court has said, “It [a law] must be not a special rule for a particular person or a particular case,” but a “general law” . . . Arbitrary power . . . is not law, whether manifested as the decree of a personal monarch or of an impersonal multitude” (Hurtado v. California, 1884).

How might a law, regardless of its effects on liberty or property, be unfair or arbitrary? Two examples of such a law are bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, both of which are explicitly prohibited in Article One, sections 9 and 10, of the Constitution. Bills of attainder are unfair because they inflict punishment on specified persons even though a court of law has not found them guilty of violating any existing laws, and ex post facto laws are equally unfair because they apply retroactively and thereby punish persons for doing something that was not illegal when they did it. Very similar to these kinds of laws are “acts of confiscation,” “acts directly transferring one man’s estate to another,” and legislative acts deciding specific cases that should have been decided by courts or reversing decisions already made by courts (Hurtado v. California, 1884).

Another kind of law that the Supreme Court considers to be arbitrary, regardless of what it regulates or prohibits, is one that has no “rational basis”—that is, that serves no public purpose or interest. When a law deprives persons of their life, liberty, or property for no apparent reason relating to the common good, the Court is likely to assume that it is the result of a legislature’s incompetence or animosity toward those harmed by the law.

Third, a law violates due process if it is “so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application . . .” (Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 1926). On the other hand, because of the inherent imprecision of language and the need for government to do its business without having to be perfect, the Court has also said that “no more than a reasonable degree of certainty can be demanded” (Boyce Motor Lines Inc. v. United States, 342 U.S. 337, 1952).

Fourth, even if a law is not inherently arbitrary, unfair, or unclear, it may still violate due process of law if it deprives persons of an especially important private interest (liberty or property). As early as 1875, the Court used the term “fundamental rights” to refer to the especially important private interests protected by the due process clauses (United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 1875). What rights are fundamental? The Court’s answer to this question has evolved over time. Traditionally, the “liberty” that could not be taken without due process of law was that of freedom from physical restraint or imprisonment, but now the word refers to a range of behaviors that the Court believes deserve special protection from legislation.

Whatever these fundamental rights are, however, they are not absolute; they can be abridged by the government if it can make a strong enough case for doing so. This means that in cases involving government regulation of fundamental rights, the Court must utilize some kind of criterion or “test” to determine whether the government’s reasons for the regulation are strong enough to justify the regulation. There are, moreover, different tests for different kinds of fundamental rights and they, like the rights, have changed over time. This fourth component of substantive due process has been, by far, the most significant part of the Court’s interpretation of the two due process clauses, and its development has been long, complicated, and very controversial.

The idea of substantive due process seems to have arisen first in 1856 in the Court of Appeals of New York, which in Wynehamer v. People, 13 N.Y. 378 (1856), declared a New York law prohibiting the possession of liquor to be in violation of that state’s due-process clause. One year later, in the infamous case of Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. (60 U.S.) 393 (1857), the U.S. Supreme Court used the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to strike down the portion of the Missouri Compromise that excluded slavery from certain U.S. territories. It held that “[a]n act of Congress which deprives a citizen of the United States of his liberty or property, merely because he came himself or brought his property into a particular Territory of the United States, and who had committed no offense against the laws, could hardly be dignified with the name of due process of law.” Then, in Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wallace 608 (1870), the Court implied that a federal law that authorized the national government to issue paper money that was not redeemable in hard currency but was legal tender for payment of all debts deprived creditors of their property without due process of law guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment. In record time, however, the Court reversed itself and upheld the law in Second Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wallace 457 (1871).

In the meantime, in 1868, the Fourteenth Amendment was added to the Constitution. In addition to prohibiting states from abridging “the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States” and denying “to any person . . . the equal protection of the laws,” it prohibited them from depriving “any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of the laws.”

In the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. (83 U.S.) 36 (1873), the Court was asked to hold that all three of these provisions were violated by a Louisiana law that, for public health reasons, gave one company a monopoly on the slaughtering of animals in the New Orleans area. The plaintiffs who challenged the law were the slaughterers who had been put out of business. Their attorney argued that they had a natural right to practice their trade and that the three provisions were intended to protect that right as well as individual freedom and free enterprise in general. He also argued that the due process clause guaranteed more than procedural due process. Although the Court upheld the law, the idea of substantive due process was given credibility, not only by the plaintiffs’ attorney but also by one of the four dissenters, Justice Joseph Bradley, who wrote, “[A] law which prohibits a large class of citizens from adopting a lawful employment, or from following a lawful employment previously adopted, does deprive them of liberty as well as property, without due process of law.”

Not surprisingly, therefore, in spite of the Slaughterhouse Cases decision, attorneys for businesses, corporations, and others whose property rights were threatened by legislation continued to press the Supreme Court to interpret both due process clauses as guaranteeing substantive, and not merely procedural, due process.

Although during the 1870s and 1880s, the Court resisted using the due process clause to strike down laws, its dicta in several cases and a growing number of dissenting opinions indicated that it was becoming more sympathetic to the idea of substantive due process. Noteworthy is what the Court said in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623 (1887): “The courts are not bound by mere forms. They are at liberty—indeed are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things, whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the legislature has transcended the limits of its authority.”

The breakthrough came in the 1890s. First, the Court struck down rates established for railroads by different state regulatory commissions as “unreasonable” and thus as deprivations of property without due process of law. Then, in Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U.S. 578 (1897), which nullified a Louisiana law that banned businesses in that state from buying insurance from companies not licensed to do business in that state, the Court enunciated freedom of contract as a fundamental right protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In essence, this right meant that individuals and businesses could enter into contracts without the state’s dictating the parties to or terms of the contracts.

After Allgeyer, the Court used the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and the doctrine of liberty of contract to overturn state laws that limited the number of hours that bakers could work (Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 1905); outlawed yellow-dog contracts (promises by workers not to join labor unions) (Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1, 1915); forbade courts to issue injunctions against picketing (Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U.S. 312, 1921); created a special court to handle labor disputes (Wolf Packing Co. v. Court of Industrial Relations, 262 U.S. 522, 1923); and set minimum wages for employees (Morehead v. Tipaldo, 298 U.S. 587, 1936). The Court also used the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to nullify federal laws that banned yellow-dog contracts (Adair v. United States, 208 U.S. 161, 1908) and set minimum wages for female employees in the District of Columbia (Adkins v. Children’s Hospital, 261 U.S. 525, 1923).

During this same period, the Court actually upheld many more laws challenged as violations of due process of law than it overturned. What was the difference between the laws upheld and those not upheld? According to the Court, the laws that were nullified were “unreasonable”—in purpose, in the means for achieving that purpose, or in the degree of restraint imposed upon liberty or property. Sometimes the Court contended that a law was “arbitrary,” by which it usually meant that the restrictions it imposed were more severe than its benefits to the public. Both tests were very vague, and their use allowed the Court to make decisions of the sort traditionally reserved to legislatures, thereby greatly enhancing its power of judicial review.

When the Court first began using substantive due process to nullify laws, the rights that it protected were primarily property rights, such as freedom to choose and practice an occupation and freedom of contract. However, it soon occurred to some justices and lawyers that if the due process clauses could be used to protect property rights, they could and should also be used to protect other “fundamental rights.” For example, in dissenting opinions, Justices Harlan and Marshall contended that the rights to free speech and press, the “right to enjoy one’s religious belief, unmolested by any human power,” and the “right to impart and receive instruction” were protected by the due process of law (Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454, 1907; Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U.S. 548, 1908). Other justices made similar statements.

Not surprisingly, therefore, in Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), which nullified a Nebraska law forbidding the teaching in schools of any language other than English, the Court said that the liberty protected by the due process clause includes not only “freedom from bodily restraint” and economic rights, but also the right “to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men.” Two years later, on the grounds that the right of parents to direct the education of their children was a fundamental right protected by due process of law, it overturned an Oregon law that made private schools illegal (Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 1925). Then, just one week later, in New York v. Gitlow, 268 U.S. 652 (1925), the Court said that “freedom of speech and of the press . . . are among the fundamental personal rights and ‘liberties’ protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment . . .”

Other substantive rights guaranteed in the First Amendment were gradually added to the list of rights protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment—freedom of assembly in 1937, De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353 (1937), free exercise of religion in 1940 (Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 1940) and in 1947 the ban on laws respecting an establishment of religion (Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, 1947).

Some scholars and Supreme Court justices use the phrase “selective incorporation of the Bill of Rights into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment” to describe the process whereby First Amendment rights and certain procedural rights (discussed in “Procedural Due Process” in this entry) guaranteed in the Bill of Rights were included within the meaning of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and thus protected from state laws and actions. The “incorporation” is said to be “selective” because it happened gradually and because the Court has never held that due process of law includes all the rights guaranteed in the Bill of Rights. (For example, the right to be indicted by a grand jury has never been incorporated.)

Ironically, not long after the Court decided that certain nonproperty rights were among the fundamental rights protected from legislation by due process of law, it changed its mind about the importance of property or economic rights. In several decisions in the 1930s, the Court upheld state and federal laws that had been passed to deal with the economic problems caused by the Great Depression but had been challenged on the grounds that they violated liberty of contract and related property rights. The Court upheld the laws and, in United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938), explicitly stated that economic regulations would be upheld in the face of due process challenges provided they had a “rational basis”—a test that most laws could easily pass. In contrast, it said that laws that abridge other fundamental rights, especially those specifically mentioned in the Bill of Rights, and that are challenged as violations of due process of law would be subjected to a much higher level of scrutiny. This difference in treatment of economic and noneconomic rights is often referred to as the “double standard.”

Once the Court decided to use substantive due process to protect noneconomic rights, it did not stop with those explicitly mentioned in the Constitution. In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), it held that a right to privacy was a fundamental right protected by due process of law, which, it later held, included within it the right of a pregnant woman to abort a fetus prior to its viability (Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 93, 1973). The Court has said that substantive due process also protects the right of extended family members to live together (Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 1977); the right of a competent person to refuse unwanted medical treatment (Cruzan v. Missouri, 497 U.S. 261, 1990); and the right of parents alone (and not others) to rear their children (Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 2000). In Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), the Court held that the liberty protected by due process includes the liberty of consenting adults, including those of the same sex, to engage in whatever private sexual conduct they choose.

Many of these decisions were justified on the basis of the Ninth Amendment, which says, "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." During the period in which it decided to protect the previously mentioned rights, however, the Court also declined to use substantive due process to protect a range of other behaviors or "rights" because it did not feel they were fundamental.

Perhaps the Court's most extreme expansion of substantive due process occurred in 1954, the year it used the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to nullify state laws requiring that public schools be racially segregated. Because there is no equal protection clause that applies to the federal government, in Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954), it used the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to prohibit segregated public schools in the District of Columbia. The Court thereby essentially equated the equal protection and due process clauses of the Constitution, and it now uses the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to nullify any congressional law that, if passed by a state, would violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In summary, the scope of the due process of law guaranteed by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments is quite large and expanding. It prohibits laws from being enforced or applied in a way that violates the specific rights of the accused listed in the Bill of Rights or that violates the general principle of fairness. It also prohibits laws that are unfair, unclear, or restrictive of First Amendment freedoms and other substantive rights that the Court has deemed or may yet deem to be fundamental. Although the Court has been fairly restrained about increasing the rights it considers fundamental, in the future that could change.

ELLIS M. WEST

References and Further Reading

- Barnett, Randy, ed. The Rights Retained by the People: The History and Meaning of the Ninth Amendment. Fairfax, VA: George Mason University Press, 1989.
- Bodenhamer, David. Fair Trial: Rights of the Accused in American History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Cortner, Richard C. The Supreme Court and the Second Bill of Rights: The Fourteenth Amendment and the Nationalization of Civil Liberties. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981.
- Ely, James W. The Guardian of Every Other Right: A Constitutional History of Property Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Garrow, David J. Liberty & Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade. New York: MacMillan, 1994.

- Hamilton, Walton H. "The Path of Due Process of Law." Ethics 48 (April 1938):269–296.
- Keynes, Edward. Liberty, Property, and Privacy: Toward a Jurisprudence of Substantive Due Process. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.
- Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Fifth Amendment. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Orth, John V. Due Process of Law: A Brief History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.
- Paul, Ellen F., and Howard Dickman. Liberty, Property, and the Future of Constitutional Development. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.
- Seigan, Bernard. Economic Liberties and the Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.
- Warren, Charles. The New "Liberty" Under the Fourteenth Amendment, Harvard Law Review 39 (1926): 431–465.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adair v. United States*, 208 U.S. 161 (1908)
- Adkins v. Children's Hospital*, 261 U.S. 525 (1923)
- Allgeyer v. Louisiana*, 165 U.S. 578 (1897)
- Bell v. Burson*, 402 U.S. 535 (1971)
- Benton v. Maryland*, 395 U.S. 784 (1969)
- Berea College v. Kentucky*, 211 U.S. 548 (1908)
- Bolling v. Sharpe*, 347 U.S. 497 (1954)
- Boyce Motor Lines Inc. v. United States*, 342 U.S. 337 (1952)
- Brown v. Mississippi*, 297 U.S. 278 (1936)
- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
- Chicago Milwaukee and St. Paul Ry. Co. v. Minnesota*, 134 U.S. 118 (1890)
- Connally v. General Construction Co.*, 269 U.S. 385 (1926)
- Coppage v. Kansas*, 236 U.S. 1 (1915)
- Cruzan v. Missouri Department of Health*, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)
- De Jonge v. Oregon*, 299 U.S. 353 (1937)
- Dred Scott v. Sandford*, 19 How. (60 U.S.) 393 (1857)
- Duncan v. Louisiana*, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- Fuentes v. Shevin*, 407 U.S. 67 (1972)
- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1961)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Hepburn v. Griswold*, 8 Wallace 608 (1870)
- Hurtado v. California*, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)
- Klopper v. North Carolina*, 386 U.S. 213 (1967)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
- Lochner v. New York*, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
- Malloy v. Hogan*, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
- Mapp v. Ohio*, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
- Meyer v. Nebraska*, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
- Moore v. City of East Cleveland*, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)
- Moore v. Dempsey*, 261 U.S. 86 (1923)
- Morehead v. Tipaldo*, 298 U.S. 587 (1936)
- Mugler v. Kansas*, 123 U.S. 623 (1887)
- Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land and Improvement Company*, 18 How. (59 U.S.) 272 (1856)
- New York v. Gillogh*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- Palko v. Connecticut*, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)
- Patterson v. Colorado*, 205 U.S. 454 (1907)
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
- Pointer v. Texas*, 380 U.S. 400 (1965)
- Powell v. Alabama*, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 93 (1973)
- Second Legal Tender Cases*, 12 Wallace 457 (1871)
- Slaughterhouse Cases*, 16 Wall. (83 U.S.) 36 (1873)

Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000)
Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U.S. 312 (1921)
Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78 (1908)
United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1875)
Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949)
Wolf Packing Co. v. Court of Industrial Relations, 262 U.S. 522 (1923)
Wynehamer v. People, 13 N.Y. 378 (1856)

See also Application of First Amendment to States; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Due Process in Immigration; Economic Rights in the Constitution; Incorporation Doctrine; Incorporation Doctrine and Free Speech; Privileges and Immunities (XIV); Retained Rights (Ninth Amendment); Vagueness and Overbreadth in Criminal Statutes; Vagueness Doctrine

DUNCAN v. LOUISIANA, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)

Duncan v. Louisiana was argued January 17, 1968, and decided May 20, 1968, by a vote of seven to two. Justice White delivered the opinion for the Court, with Justices Harlan and Stewart dissenting. The Court held that the defendant, accused under Louisiana law of simple battery, a misdemeanor punishable by a maximum of two years' imprisonment and a $300 fine, was entitled under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to a jury trial, even though Duncan was sentenced to sixty days in jail and a $150 fine. The decision reaffirmed the right to a jury trial in criminal cases as a fundamental right even if the offense is petty.

In the lower courts, Duncan was tried and convicted of simple battery. The State of Louisiana argued, successfully, that a jury trial was only required in cases in which capital punishment and hard labor may be imposed. Justice White reversed the Louisiana Supreme Court by arguing that fundamental issues of liberty were at stake and cited Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932) for his rationale.

In Duncan, Justice White summarized the history and importance of trial by jury, dating back to the Magna Carta. Fearful of possible judicial bias in cases, the justice explained why trial by jury remains an important fixture in the U.S. legal system:

The guarantees of jury trial in the Federal and State Constitutions reflect a profound judgment about the way in which law should be enforced and justice administered. A right to jury trial is granted to criminal defendants in order to prevent oppression by the Government . . . If the defendant preferred the common-sense judgment of a jury to the more tutored but perhaps less sympathetic reaction of the single judge, he was to have it (pp. 155–156).

Justice Harlan, whom Justice Stewart joined, dissented. His dissent centered around the notion of states' rights. Justice Harlan argued that a state has historically held the responsibility for "operating the machinery of criminal justice within its borders."

AARON R. S. LORENZ

DUSKY v. U.S., 362 U.S. 402 (1960)

To satisfy any theory of punishment, a criminal defendant must be competent to stand trial. In making this determination, the trial court in Dusky tested whether the defendant was oriented to time and place and had some recollection of the events. On appeal, defense counsel argued that Dusky was not competent to stand trial under 18 U.S.C. § 4244 because he was not able to assist properly in his defense.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the trial court's holding and redefined the test for competency to stand trial. According to Dusky, trial courts must determine whether the defendant has a present rational and factual understanding of the proceedings against him and whether he has the present ability to assist counsel with a reasonable degree of rational understanding. The Court remanded the case for another determination of the defendant's present competency to stand trial in accordance with the articulated standard.

In recent years, the Court has continued to assess the standard for competency to stand trial. As explained in Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 398 (1993), the Dusky standard represents the constitutional minimum for testing a defendant's competency to stand trial, enter a guilty plea, or waive his right to counsel. In Ford v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 399 (1986), the Court addressed a similar question and held that a capital defendant must be competent for execution and must understand that he is being executed and why. To maintain integrity in the criminal justice system, courts must assess a defendant's competency at all critical stages of the proceedings.

J. AMY DILLARD

References and Further Reading

Bonnie, Richard J., The Competency of Criminal Defendants: Beyond Dusky and Drope, U. Miami Law Review 47 (1993): 539–601.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Dusky v. U.S., 362 U.S. 402 (1960)
Ford v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 399 (1986)
Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 398 (1993)

See also Insanity Defense; Mentally Ill

DUTY TO OBEY COURT ORDERS

Relatively unyielding is the rule that a party must do what is required of him by the court order that resolves his case. (For example, an injunction might require a defendant never to take specified action.) In this, the rule differs from the much more complex and malleable rules (stare decisis and collateral estoppel) concerning the consequences for later cases of an earlier court decision's fact finding and legal reasoning.

Compliance with court orders is essential to our conception of the "rule of law." President Nixon's grudging acquiescence to the Watergate subpoenas makes clear that the rule of compliance binds the government as well as ordinary persons. Basic order depends on government and citizens alike abiding by official adjudications until they are dislodged by a higher court. Consequently, as the Supreme Court made clear in United States v. United Mine Workers, 330 U.S. 258, 293-94 (1947), courts usually require compliance even with erroneous court orders until they are overturned on appeal. Even if the order is invalidated, the appellate court will regard it, in effect, as valid for the period before it was overturned.

In Walker v. Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307, 318-20 (1967), the Supreme Court suggests in dicta that an erroneous court order enjoining constitutionally protected activity might be disobeyed if it is determined on appeal that (1) the order was legally wrong; (2) prompt attempts had been made to appeal; and (3) rights would have been lost by obeying the order pending relief on appeal. For example, if someone is ordered not to speak concerning politics until after the next election and no appeal is available very soon, then it is a reasonable gamble that he may disobey the order until the appeal can be decided. However, he takes the risk, among others, that the appellate courts will find (1) that the original order complied with the constitution or (2) that he had avenues of meaningfully swifter review. If either is found and he has disobeyed the order, then he is likely to be in contempt. It is also possible that an order resulting from certain court proceedings regarded as shams or as completely lawless need not be followed.

Action against those not complying with a court order takes a variety of forms including (1) contempt proceedings, resulting in fines or terms of confinement or (2) executive seizure of property necessary to satisfy the order. A court order also exerts great force outside the issuing court. The federal constitutional text, federal statutes, and related federal common law require that state and federal courts honor and enforce each other's judgments.

GORDON G. YOUNG

References and Further Reading

Palmer, J., Note: Collateral Bar and Contempt: Challenging a Court Order After Disobeying It, Cornell L. Rev. 88 (2002): 215.

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States v. United Mine Workers, 330 U.S. 258, 293-94 (1947)
Walker v. Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307, 318-20 (1967)

DWI

State laws forbid driving while intoxicated, or DWI. The offense is also referred to in some jurisdictions as DUI (driving under the influence), OWI (operating while intoxicated), or OUI (operating under the influence). The enforcement of these laws involves searches and seizures subject to the Fourth Amendment.

The two types of DWI offenses are driving while impaired and driving while alcohol or drugs are present in the body. Driving while impaired requires proof that drugs or alcohol affected the operator's physical or mental functions. Although no particular level of alcohol or drugs is proscribed, test results showing alcohol content in the body are evidence of impairment.

In contrast, driving while drugs or alcohol are in the body does not require proof of impairment. Instead, these laws require only that a forbidden level of alcohol be found in the body, as measured by breath, blood, or urine. Statutes often presume driving under the influence from 0.08 percent alcohol content in the blood. The 0.08 standard is a reduction from the formerly prevailing standard of 0.10. The lower standard exemplifies increasingly strict DWI statutes, which also have imposed greater punishments as social tolerance of drunk driving has decreased.

Fourth Amendment issues arise in DWI enforcement at two phases of DUI investigation: (1) the initial police-citizen encounter and (2) the detection of alcohol content in the suspect's body.

The police-citizen encounter typically begins with a stop of a vehicle. Such a stop is a "seizure" under the Fourth Amendment. The Fourth Amendment permits police to stop a vehicle to detect drunk driving under three circumstances. First, police can stop the vehicle to investigate for drunk driving if they have reasonable suspicion to believe that the offense is being committed, as the U.S. Supreme Court held in Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983). This is the same legal basis used in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), to permit stopping a pedestrian.

Second, as the Supreme Court held in Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996), police can stop a vehicle for a traffic violation. Police can use the time spent in citing the motorist to look for indications of other crimes, including drunk driving. If reasonable suspicion of DWI arises, the officer may detain the driver further to investigate.

Third, police can establish checkpoints to find drunk drivers. Checkpoints are allowed but must be fixed—roving patrols are not allowed—and must be of limited duration and nondiscriminatory in determining which motorists are stopped.

The Fourth Amendment also protects citizens from searches in the form of compulsory drug or alcohol tests, as the Court held in Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966). Schmerber said that although police generally must obtain warrants, they can obtain blood without a warrant if they have probable cause, their method of obtaining the sample is reasonable, and a warrant cannot be secured before the alcohol in the body will dissipate.

The driver is required by most state laws to consent to these tests and provide samples of breath or blood. The theory of “implied consent” is that the state driving laws can condition the privilege of driving upon consent to such a test. In some states, the driver’s license of a motorist who refuses the test is subject to suspension or revocation. A more recent trend, adopted earlier in countries such as Canada and Australia, is to make refusal to submit to the test a crime.

JEFFERSON L. LANKFORD

Cases and Statutes Cited

Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983)
Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)
Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996)

See also Checkpoints (roadblocks); Drug Testing; Exemplars; Probable Cause; Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives, Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989); Stop and Frisk

DWORKIN, ANDREA (1946–2005)

With the 1979 publication of her book, Pornography: Men Possessing Women, Andrea Dworkin established herself as a feminist poised on the procensorship camp of the pornography debates, alongside theorists such as Catharine MacKinnon. In Pornography, Dworkin argued that the major theme of pornography as a genre is male power. She postulated that pornography does not fall under the protection of the First Amendment’s Free Speech Clause because that amendment only protects those who can exercise the rights it protects. She argued that pornography trades in a class of people who have been systematically denied the rights protected by the First Amendment, so pornography should not receive First Amendment protection.

Along with Catharine MacKinnon, Dworkin coauthored an antipornography ordinance first introduced in Minneapolis in 1983. Dworkin and MacKinnon based the ordinance on their definition of pornography as a discriminatory practice based on sex. They included speech and action under their ordinance, arguing that speech and action work together to form a discriminatory system of sexual exploitation based upon sex-based powerlessness, which generates sex-based abuse. They also argued that photographic porn should be indisputably classified as action since they believed it only receives classification as speech because the women in pornographic photography have been depicted as objects or as commodities by the pornography. Thus, the speech belongs to those people who control the consumption of the images—the pornographers—and not the women featured in the pictures.

In the ordinance, Dworkin and MacKinnon constructed pornography as a human rights violation against women; they posited that men learn to sexually abuse women through pornography because pornography creates, in their words, a physiologically real conviction in men that women want to be abused. They argued that their antipornography ordinance articulated, for the first time, how pornography uses and affects women by recognizing an “energetic” agent of male domination over women. The First Amendment, they argued, cannot protect pornography because it would then be protecting exploitation since, by their definition, pornography functions as sexual exploitation that produces sexual abuse and discrimination. Through the Indianapolis ordinance (which was ultimately declared unconstitutional), Dworkin and MacKinnon postulated that porn in any form constituted an act inescapably linked to the general disempowerment of women. Pornography thus shows the “truth” of women’s enslavement to men.

In a 1985 case, American Booksellers Association, Inc., et al v. William H. Hudnut II, 84-3147 (1985), a unanimous federal appeals court upheld the district court finding that the ordinance functioned too broadly and violated the First Amendment.

Dworkin wrote several other books, including Intercourse (published in 1987), in which she maintained that, according to men, the inferiority of women originates in sex, where women are inherently unequal; since men have the “right” to exploit women in sex, then they have the right to possess women in other realms as well. Marriage, according to Dworkin, perpetuated an institution of inequality because of what women must do to attract husbands. She continued to work, write, and lecture on topics concerning women’s rights and sexuality until her death in 2005.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

- Dworkin, Andrea. Pornography: Men Possessing Women. New York: Perigee, 1979.
 ———. Intercourse. New York: The Free Press, 1987.
 ———. Letters from a War Zone: Writings, 1976–1989. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1989.

- . Heartbreak: The Political Memoir of a Feminist Militant. New York: Basic Books, 2002.
 Dworkin, Andrea, and Catharine MacKinnon. Pornography and Civil Rights: A New Day for Women’s Equality. Minneapolis, MN: Organizing Against Pornography, 1988.
 ———, eds. In Harm’s Way: The Pornography Civil Rights Hearings. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997.
 Soble, Alan. Pornography, Sex, and Feminism. Amherst, NY: Prometheus, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- American Booksellers Association, Inc., et al v. William H. Hudnut II*, 84-3147 (1985)
 See also MacKinnon, Catharine; Strossen, Nadine

E

ECONOMIC REGULATION

The Framers of the Constitution who met in Philadelphia in 1787 were all or nearly all well-off property owners. One of their major concerns was the need to protect property owners in the unprecedented experiment in democracy that they were proposing. A major defect of democracy, they feared, was that debtors, always greatly outnumbering creditors, would be able to pass laws relieving themselves of their debt obligations. Probably the most important of the very few restrictions placed on the states in the original Constitution, therefore, was a provision prohibiting the states from passing any law “impairing the Obligation of Contracts,” the principal purpose of which was to prevent debtor relief legislation. Further, James Madison, the principal author of the Constitution, in preparing a first draft of a bill of rights from suggestions made by many of the ratifying states, decided on his own to add a provision that private property may not be “taken for public use without just compensation.”

In the last third of the nineteenth century following the Civil War, the nation experienced, in the near-total absence of government regulation, the greatest growth of industrial development and wealth in history. Alleged abuses of economic power by railroads and other large business entities led to demands for national economic regulation. The Interstate Commerce Commission was created in 1887 to regulate the railroads, and the Sherman Antitrust Act was adopted in 1890 to protect free market competition from business combines. Similar developments took place at the state level with the adoption of various price and wage controls and other economic and business regulations.

Attorneys for railroads, grain elevators, and other businesses subjected to economic regulation repeatedly besieged the Supreme Court to hold such regulations unconstitutional under the Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, applicable to the states, and the Fifth Amendment, applicable to the federal government. The clauses, providing that no person shall be deprived of “life, liberty, or property without due process of law,” were understood to impose only a requirement of fair legal procedures. The attorneys argued that the Court should interpret the clauses as also placing a restriction on the substance of law, permitting the justices to declare unconstitutional any law they considered “unreasonable.” After first dismissing this argument as based on “some strange misconception of the scope” of the Due Process Clause, the Court finally succumbed at the end of the nineteenth century, creating the oxymoronic doctrine of “substantive due process.”

The Court thereafter and through the first third of the twentieth century invalidated more than 180 business or economic regulations as violating the “liberty of contract” that the Court read into the Due Process Clause or as simply “unreasonable” (most challenged regulations, however, were upheld). This period in the Court’s history became known as the Lochner era, epitomized by the Court’s 1905 decision in Lochner v. New York, holding unconstitutional a New York law that limited the working hours of bakers to sixty hours a week. The Court held that this restriction on liberty of contract between bakers and employers was not necessary to protect the health of bakers, and that it was not a legitimate use of state power to seek to improve the condition of the working class.

During the same period, the Court invalidated two federal anti-child labor laws as beyond the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce and to tax. It then stopped the carrying out of President Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal during his first term (1933–1936) by invalidating a series of attempts to regulate the national economy as beyond Congress's commerce power and as a violation of substantive due process.

Two important five-to-four decisions in 1934, however, pointed in a different direction. In Nebbia v. New York, the Court upheld price controls on the dairy industry, making clear that such controls were no longer generally impermissible. Even more remarkably, in Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, the Court upheld a Minnesota mortgage moratorium law that prevented unpaid creditors from foreclosing on property, precisely the type of debtor relief measure that the Contracts Clause was meant to prohibit. The effect of the decision was virtually to read the clause out of the Constitution as a limitation on state economic regulation. The clause enjoyed a surprising partial revival in the late 1970s when two state laws were found to be in violation, but later decisions indicate that the revival is over.

The era of judicial concern with economic regulation came to a sudden and apparently complete end in 1937, often referred to as the year of the "constitutional revolution." Overwhelmingly reelected in 1936, President Roosevelt undertook to keep the Court from continuing to frustrate his New Deal by proposing what became known, derisively, as his "Court-packing" plan. If justices over seventy years of age failed to retire, the plan would have permitted the appointment of additional justices up to a total of fifteen. While the plan, which aroused intense opposition, was pending in Congress, the Court, almost entirely due to a change in the position of a single justice, Owen Roberts, handed down two opinions that seemed to reverse the position it had taken on federal and state economic regulation just the year before.

In NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. (1937), the Court upheld application of the National Labor Relations Act, prohibiting the firing of union organizers, to a steel mill as a valid exercise of Congress's power to regulate interstate commerce. In West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish (1937), the Court upheld a state minimum wage law after invalidating a similar law the year before. Whether or not the pending plan was the cause, the Court made what was called "the switch in time that saved nine." The plan was then defeated, but President Roosevelt was able to claim that although he lost the battle, he had won the war. Jones & Laughlin and companion cases initiated the Court's withdrawal from attempts to limit Congress's regulation of economic and business affairs by means of the commerce power, and West Coast Hotel signaled the end of the Court's invalidation of state regulations of business or economic affairs on the basis of substantive due process.

The Fifth Amendment's prohibition of the taking of private property for public use without just compensation, originally applicable only to the national government, was held in the late 1900s to be, in effect, applicable to the states as well through the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court has read the "public use" requirement very broadly so as to impose no real limit on the taking of property by eminent domain. It is clear that just compensation is required when government takes possession of or asserts title to property. In Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (1922), the Court held that compensation may also be required when a regulation of the use of property reduces its value even when the government does not take possession.

The Court has not, however, been able to state a rule as to what constitutes such a "regulatory taking," and none was again found until several regulatory taking claims were upheld in a series of five-to-four decisions beginning in 1987. The five more conservative justices attempted to breathe new life into the Taking Clause by holding that even a temporary restriction on the use of property could constitute a taking requiring compensation, that a regulation that deprives property of "all economically beneficial or productive use" constitutes a taking per se (automatically), and that a property owner could base a taking claim even on restrictions that were on the property before he bought it. Finally, the Court held that when government requires a permit for a certain use of property (for example, to build a house), any conditions attached to a grant of the permit must be related to the reason for requiring a permit.

Much of the increased protection apparently given property owners by these decisions was undone, however, by the Court's decision in Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency (2002) denying a regulatory taking claim. The Court very much limited, if it did not effectively overrule, both its earlier temporary regulatory taking decision, and its per se rule by holding that a regulation that prohibited all productive use of property for (at least) thirty-two months did not constitute a taking per se because the property retained value because productive use will be possible when and if the restriction is removed.

In sum, Congress's virtually unlimited power to regulate economic and business affairs under the Commerce Clause, the demise of the doctrine of economic substantive due process, the virtual elimination of the Contract Clause, and the very limited application of the Taking Clause mean that there are now very few constitutional restrictions on either national or state regulation of economic and business affairs.

LINO GRAGLIA

References and Further Reading

- Ackerman, Bruce. Private Property and the Constitution. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1977.
- Alsop, Joseph, and Turner Catledge. 168 Days. New York: Doubleday Doran, 1938.
- Corwin, Edward. Liberty Against Government. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1948.
- Epstein, Richard. Takings: Private Property and Eminent Domain. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Rossiter, C., ed. The Federalist Papers, No. 10 (Madison). New York: Penguin Books, 1961.
- McClosky, Robert. The American Supreme Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960.
- Novak, John, and Ronald O. Rotunda. Constitutional Law. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2004.
- Twiss, Benjamin. Lawyers and the Constitution: How Laissez-Faire Came to the Supreme Court. New Haven, CT: Princeton University Press, 1942.
- Wright, Benjamin F. The Growth of American Constitutional Law. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1942.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell*, 290 U.S. 398 (1934)
- Lochner v. New York*, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
- Nebbia v. New York*, 291 N.Y. 502 (1934)
- NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin*, 301 U.S. 57 (1937)
- Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon*, 260 U.S. 393 (1922)
- Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency*, 535 U.S. 302 (2002)
- West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish*, 300 U.S. 379 (1937)
- U.S. Const. art. I, sec. 10; Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments

ECONOMIC RIGHTS IN THE CONSTITUTION

Protection of the rights of property owners has long been a vital function of the Anglo-American legal system. In particular, the English constitutional tradition stressed individual property rights as an important bulwark of freedom from arbitrary government. The Magna Carta (1215) contained a number of provisions that safeguarded property ownership.

Foremost among these was the provision that “no freeman shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised . . . except by the lawful judgment of his peers and by the law of the land.” With this language, the Magna Carta sought to secure owners against deprivation of their liberty or property without due process of law.

The property-conscious tenets of English constitutionalism were powerfully reinforced by the political theorist John Locke. He maintained in his famous Second Treatise on Government (1689) that private property existed under natural law before the creation of political authority, and that one of the principal functions of government was to protect property. Locke rejected the view that property could be created only by government. In Locke's thought, property ownership was closely connected with the preservation of liberty. Property was seen as giving people basic security and was therefore a necessary predicate to the enjoyment of other individual liberties. William Blackstone, in his influential Commentaries on the Laws of England (1765–1769), also attached great significance to the protection of property. He classed the free use and disposal of property as an “absolute right, inherent in every Englishman.” Blackstone stressed the high regard of law for private property and the exclusive dominion of owners, but he noted that the use of property was subject to control by law. In particular, he insisted that English common law mandated the payment of compensation to persons whose property was taken for public use.

Revolutionary Era

By the time of the American Revolution the right to property was central to legal and political thought. Property was viewed as the linchpin upon which other rights rested. Indeed, the American colonists repeatedly invoked safeguards of property rights in their struggle with England. Economic issues, such as taxation without representation and restrictions on colonial trade, were crucial in shaping the drive for independence. The colonists therefore manifested a deep concern for property rights as part of their effort to devise constitutional restraints on governmental power.

Not surprisingly, the initial state constitutions contained a number of provisions to protect the rights of property owners. Several state constitutions asserted that the right to acquire and possess property was a natural right. Some states sought to promote free trade and the incentive to accumulate property by prohibiting grants of monopoly. Echoing the Magna Carta, a number of constitutions also declared that no person could be “deprived of his life, liberty, or property but by the law of the land.” In addition, several states incorporated into their constitutions the common law principle that compensation should be paid when private property was taken for public use. Similarly, the Northwest Ordinance of 1787 included language protective of property ownership and contractual arrangements. Besides law of the land and Takings Clauses, the ordinance stated that no law should “interfere with or affect private contracts.” These property guarantees were forerunners of provisions in the federal Constitution and Bill of Rights.

Notwithstanding the professed devotion to the security of property, the actual behavior of Americans during the Revolutionary era resulted in widespread despoliation of property rights. State legislators enacted bills of attainder declaring named Loyalists to be guilty of treason and confiscating their property without a judicial trial. Similarly, states, most notably Virginia, placed legal obstacles to the recovery of private debts owed to British merchants. Moreover, in the aftermath of the break with England, state lawmakers frequently interfered in debtor–creditor relations with a variety of measures designed to assist debtors. A particular sticking point was the issuance of depreciated paper currency, a move seen by merchants and creditors as amounting to confiscation of their economic interests. The seizure of Loyalist property and the repudiation of debts did not bode well for the security of economic rights in the new republic. As a result, many political leaders became convinced that the states could not adequately protect property ownership.

Constitution and Bill of Rights

Heirs to the English constitutional tradition linking tradition and liberty, the Framers of the Constitution in 1787 were anxious to secure property rights and halt the abuses that characterized the Revolutionary era. They also understood the advantages of private property as the basis for a strong national economy. Envisioning a unified commercial nation, the Framers recognized that uncertain ownership and contractual rights discouraged investment and inhibited economic growth. Many provisions of the Constitution therefore relate to economic interests. The Contract Clause bars states from enacting any law “impairing the obligation of contracts.” Moreover, the states were prohibited from enacting bills of attainder and from making anything other than gold or silver coin legal tender for the payment of debts. The Constitution curtailed the power of Congress to levy “direct” taxes by requiring that such levies be apportioned among the states according to population. Congress was authorized to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, thus encouraging the growth of a national market for goods. Mindful of the emerging importance of intellectual property, the framers gave Congress the power to award copyrights and patents to authors and inventors. It should further be noted that several provisions in the Constitution were concerned with the protection of property in slaves.

The high priority assigned by the Framers to property rights was further evidenced in the Federalist Papers. In Federalist 54, for instance, James Madison asserted that “government is instituted no less for the protection of the property, than of the persons of individuals.” In addition to the specific provisions relating to economic interests, the Framers anticipated that the structural arrangements of the new federal government, with its system of checks and balances between branches of government, would foster a political climate in which property rights would be secure.

The Constitution as originally drafted did not include a Bill of Rights to guarantee individual liberty. The Framers felt that a Bill of Rights was unnecessary because they proposed to create a national government of limited powers. The absence of a Bill of Rights, however, proved to be one of the major obstacles in winning ratification of the new Constitution by the states. Accordingly, the proponents of the Constitution informally agreed to adopt a bill of rights in order to secure ratification. James Madison took the lead in drafting this bill of rights. For the most part he drew upon traditional guarantees already recognized in state bills of rights or English common law. Madison had long been an advocate for private property rights, and he included important protections for property ownership in the proposed bill of rights. The Fifth Amendment provides in part that no person shall be “deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall a private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.” It is revealing that Madison placed this language in the same amendment with procedural safeguards governing criminal trials. This step emphasized the close association of property rights with personal liberty in his mind.

Madison amplified his thinking about property rights in a 1792 essay published shortly after ratification of the Bill of Rights. Madison broadly defined property as including more than physical objects. Madison treated important individual liberties, such as freedom of expression and religious conscience, as forms of property. He cautioned against either direct or indirect violations of property rights by governmental action. Indeed, Madison may well have been seeking to buttress support for civil liberties by associating them with the strong protections afforded private property. The essay suggests that Madison himself would lean toward a muscular reading of the property clauses in the Constitution.

The inclusion of specific constitutional guarantees of property in the federal Constitution led to similar moves by the states. Many states adopted clauses from the Constitution and Bill of Rights when they fashioned their own fundamental laws. State constitutions generally included a Contract Clause, protected persons against deprivation of property without due process, and required that just compensation be paid when property was taken by the state for public use. These state developments reinforced the high standing of property and contractual rights in the constitutional culture. Moreover, it bears emphasis that the Bill of Rights was initially understood as restraining just the federal government. Only the Contract Clause applied to the states and provided a basis for federal court oversight of state legislation interfering with economic rights. It followed that property owners looked primarily to state constitutions as safeguards of their rights. Even where state constitutions did not contain specific property guarantees, state courts tended to treat the rights set forth in the federal Bill of Rights as articulating fundamental constitutional principles. In Gardner v. Village of Newburgh (1816), for instance, the distinguished jurist James Kent ruled that, even in the absence of an express state constitutional provision, owners of land were entitled as a matter of natural equity to compensation when their property was taken for public use.

From the outset of the new republic, federal courts made clear their willingness to curtail state infringement of property and contractual rights. In the important case of Vanhorne's Lessee v. Dorrance (1795), Justice William Patterson, who had been an active member of the Constitutional Convention, characterized the pivotal role of private property in Lockean terms. Declaring that "the right of acquiring and possessing property, and having it protected, is one of the natural, inherent and inalienable rights of man," he added, "the preservation of property . . . is a primary object of the social compact." As this suggests, the right to acquire and use property was seen by the framers as a bedrock principle of social order, a right that was crucial for the enjoyment of individual liberty and economic growth.

Nineteenth Century

The interdependence of economic rights and political freedom was a major principle of American constitutionalism throughout the nineteenth century. In Wilkinson v. Leland (1829), for instance, Justice Joseph Story expressed this view in striking language: "That government can scarcely be deemed to be free, where the rights of property are left solely dependent upon the will of a legislative body, without any restraint. The fundamental maxims of a free government seem to require, that the rights of personal liberty and private property should be held sacred."

To vindicate this vision of the importance of economic rights, the Supreme Court under Chief Justice John Marshall developed a broad reading of the Contract Clause. In essence, the Court concluded that the Contract Clause covered both private bargains and agreements to which states were parties, such as land sales and grants of corporate charters. In revealing language, Marshall in Fletcher v. Peck (1810) characterized the various constitutional restraints on state legislative power, including the Contract Clause, as a "bill of rights for the people of each state." In the Dartmouth College Case (1819), the Contract Clause was invoked to guarantee the contractual nature of state-granted charters of incorporation from abridgement. Although the Contract Clause decisions of the Marshall Court upset local interests and states rights theorists, there was little criticism directed against the Court's defense of private property and contractual arrangements. In fact, the Marshall Court was expressing a widely shared constitutional norm. Not only did Marshall and his colleagues give vitality to the property-conscious value to the framers, but they did much to set the parameters of American constitutionalism for more than a century.

Marshall's successor as chief justice, Roger B. Taney, was more inclined to uphold state regulatory authority, but he also did much to protect property rights and facilitate economic growth. In cases such as Bronson v. Kinzie (1843), the Court under Taney applied the Contract Clause to uphold private credit arrangements against state legislative interference. This line of decisions reflected the high standing of contracts in the legal culture of the nineteenth century as a vehicle by which individuals participated in the expanding market economy.

At the state level courts began to treat the due process norm as protecting economic rights. In the landmark case of Wynehamer v. People (1856), for example, the New York Court of Appeals ruled that a prohibition statute constituted a deprivation of property without due process when applied to liquor already owned when the measure took effect. By the eve of the Civil War a number of state courts had fashioned substantive guarantees of property from the due process concept. This principle found expression in the maxim that laws which took property from

A and transferred it to B amounted to a deprivation of property without due process.

The centrality of property to the constitutional order did not rule out any role for public controls. States possessed a general legislative authority, known as the police power, to enact laws protecting public health, safety, and morals. Yet such regulations restricted the rights of owners to utilize their property. Moreover, both the federal and state governments could exercise the power of eminent domain to take private property for public use. State governments aggressively employed eminent domain to acquire property to promote transportation projects, and delegated the power to canal and railroad companies. Of course, property owners were entitled to just compensation when their property was taken.

The bedrock status of property rights in the constitutional order was dramatically illustrated during the Civil War. Although property in slaves was destroyed by the Thirteenth Amendment, Congress refused to adopt a sweeping confiscation policy calculated to seize all the property of persons supporting the Confederacy. Reluctant to disturb the property rights of individuals, even those in rebellion, Congress in 1862 passed a weak measure that authorized confiscation only after condemnation proceedings before a court. The presidential administration of Abraham Lincoln showed no enthusiasm for confiscation and did little to enforce the act. In marked contrast to the experience of the Revolutionary era, the Civil War debates over confiscation served to underscore the sanctity of private property, and to stigmatize confiscation as an illegitimate exercise of governmental power.

Property rights and private economic ordering continued to occupy a key position in constitutional doctrine throughout the late nineteenth century. For example, the Civil Rights Act of 1866 enumerated the right to make contracts and acquire property as among the liberties guaranteed to freed persons. Moreover, the Supreme Court invoked the Contract Clause in numerous cases to prevent municipalities from repudiating their bonded debt, thus protecting investment capital.

Supporters of economic rights, however, increasingly shifted their focus to the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. A central constitutional question was the extent to which this amendment, ratified in 1868, imposed new limits on state authority. Thomas M. Cooley, an influential treatise writer, asserted that the Due Process Clause was a substantive as well as a procedural restraint on state legislative power. He paved the way for a muscular interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Initially, however, the Supreme Court was reluctant to see the Fourteenth Amendment as establishing a basis for federal court review of state law. In the Slaughterhouse Cases (1873), the justices adopted a narrow reading of that amendment. Similarly, the Supreme Court in Munn v. Illinois (1877) affirmed state regulatory power, rejecting a due process challenge to state laws that regulated the prices charged by railroads and allied industries.

Yet by the 1880s the Court was increasingly receptive to arguments that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protected fundamental individual rights, such as the ownership and use of private property, from unwarranted encroachment by state government. In essence, federal judges did not accept legislative exercises of the police power at face value. Rather, they assessed legislative controls on economic activity against a reasonableness standard, invalidating those deemed arbitrary or beyond the legitimate scope of government. It bears emphasis that most state laws, and especially those protecting health and safety or fostering public morals, passed constitutional muster.

Still, the due process norm afforded considerable protection for economic rights. In Allgeyer v. Louisiana (1897), the Supreme Court held that the Due Process Clause guaranteed the liberty to make contracts. Freedom to enter contracts was treated as the constitutional baseline. States had to justify laws that limited contractual freedom, a requirement that set the stage for conflict between individual economic freedom and social legislation. Further, the Court ruled in Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad v. Chicago (1897) that the just compensation principle concerning taking of property was applicable to the states as an element of due process in the Fourteenth Amendment. In effect, the just compensation rule became the first provision of the Bill of Rights to be “incorporated” into the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause. In a closely related development, the Court determined that the governmental taking of property from one person for the private use of another constituted a deprivation of property in violation of due process.

The Supreme Court looked with particular skepticism on laws that appeared to redistribute property to achieve greater economic equality. To compel the redistribution of private property was viewed as threatening the very individual autonomy that respect for property promised to safeguard from governmental encroachment. This rejection of redistributive claims found expression in a series of cases which held that regulated industries, such as railroads, were constitutionally entitled to a reasonable return upon their investment. In other words, states could not impose confiscatory rates that would impair the value of property. Even more dramatic were the decisions in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company (1895), invalidating the 1894 income tax as an unconstitutional direct tax. This levy, which affected only a small number of upper-income taxpayers, breached the widely accepted norm enjoining equality of rights and duties. Pollock represented the culmination of long-standing constitutional principles that restricted the power of government to redistribute wealth.

Twentieth Century

The traditional place of property rights in American constitutionalism was challenged in the early twentieth century. Concerned about a variety of problems arising from urbanization and industrialization, the Progressive movement urged a more active role for federal and state governments in redressing the economic and social imbalances associated with the new industrial society. Progressives called for the imposition of workplace safety standards, minimum wage laws, and limits on the hours of work, measures that curtailed contractual freedom. They also successfully pushed for adoption in 1913 of the Sixteenth Amendment, which authorized Congress to tax incomes, effectively overturning the Pollock decisions and opening the door to redistributionist use of the taxing power. At the same time, theorists began to reconceptualize property ownership as a set of social relationships rather than as dominion over an object. Property was analyzed in terms of being a cluster or bundle of rights, an approach that emphasized the contingent and changing nature of ownership. By suggesting that property did not imply any fixed set of rights, this theory sought to undermine the constitutional position of property and make room for greater governmental regulation of economic behavior.

The response of the Supreme Court to these novel political and intellectual currents was mixed. The majority of the justices remained suspicious of laws that altered free-market ordering or infringed on property rights. In the landmark case of Lochner v. New York (1905), for example, the Court struck down a statute limiting the hours of work in bakeries as violative of the liberty of contract protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. Similarly, the Court invoked the Due Process Clause to invalidate minimum wage laws for women. Judicial solicitude for the rights of property owners resulted in a significant victory for civil rights. In Buchanan v. Warley (1917), the Supreme Court voided a city ordinance mandating racial segregation in residential areas as a deprivation of property without due process. More commonly, the Court relied on due process review to eliminate entry barriers that impeded competing enterprise. Thus, in New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann (1932), the Court declared unconstitutional a state licensing law that had the practical effect of fostering a monopoly in established ice companies by excluding competitors. Suggesting the link between economic liberty and other rights, the Court equated the right of free speech with entrepreneurial freedom.

In addition to relying on the Due Process Clause, the Supreme Court strengthened the protection afforded property owners under the Fifth Amendment Takings Clause. Speaking for the Court, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (1922) ruled that a regulation of the use of property could be so severe as to amount to a taking of property which required compensation. Although agreeing that property could be controlled to some extent, he cautioned that "if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking."

Yet the Court was prepared to accommodate much of the economic regulation associated with the Progressive movement. The justices sustained in Muller v. Oregon (1908) a state law restricting the working hours for women in factories and laundries. They likewise approved workers' compensation laws that mandated payment to employees injured in industrial accidents without regard to fault. Moreover, the Court in Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Company (1926) upheld the validity of comprehensive zoning laws to control land use patterns against due process objections.

The Great Depression and the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt as president in 1932 were watershed events in American history. Roosevelt's New Deal program was premised on the belief that government should intervene in the economy and actively promote social welfare. This political philosophy was sharply at odds with traditional constitutional doctrines stressing a limited role for government and a high regard for private property. Not surprisingly, the Supreme Court was initially hostile to much of the New Deal's regulatory program. Following a lacerating struggle, however, the Court in 1937 began to uphold New Deal legislation and largely abandoned its longstanding commitment to economic rights. Freedom of contract was stripped of its constitutional base. A major component of New Deal constitutionalism was a dichotomy between property rights and other personal liberties. In United States v. Carolene Products Co. (1938), the Court indicated that in due process cases it would afford a higher level of judicial scrutiny for a preferred category of personal rights, such as free speech and religious freedom, than for property rights. Such a distinction was contrary to the belief of the Framers that protection of property was essential for political liberty, but this constitutional double standard soon became the reigning paradigm. For decades thereafter economic rights were of scant concern to judges or scholars, and they downplayed the historical importance of property as a bulwark of individual autonomy.

Obituaries for property rights, however, proved to be premature. Starting in the 1980s, jurists and scholars rediscovered the constitutional dimensions of property rights. A series of Supreme Court decisions have revitalized the regulatory doctrine and helped to restore property rights to the forefront of academic debate. Wealth redistribution, which has rarely aroused sustained interest, was replaced by tax-cutting initiatives. International developments also contributed to the resurgence of interest in economic rights. With the collapse of communist regimes throughout the world, new governments have looked to the restoration of private property as a route to economic growth and political freedom.

The historic link between economic rights and the preservation of individual liberty retains considerable vitality even in an age with far-reaching economic regulations. Private property tends to diffuse power and resources throughout society, and thus shield all personal liberties by limiting a concentration of power in governmental hands. Other important rights, such as free speech and voting, would be unlikely to check governmental abuses without secure property rights to encourage political independence. With citizens under the economic thumb of the government, the exercise of personal and political freedom is illusory. Indeed it is difficult to find examples of free societies that do not respect private property.

JAMES W. ELY, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Gregory S. Commodity & Propriety: Competing Visions of Property in American Legal Thought, 1776–1970. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Benedict, Michael Les. Laissez-Faire and Liberty: A Re-Evaluation of the Meaning and Origins of Laissez-Faire Constitutionalism. Law and History Review 3 (1985): 243–331.
- Bruchey, Stuart. The Impact of Concern for the Security of Property Rights on the Legal System of the Early American Republic. Wisconsin Law Review (1980): 1135–58.
- Ely, James W., Jr. The Guardian of Every Other Right: A Constitutional History of Property Rights. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- . The Marshall Court and Property Rights: A Reappraisal. John Marshall Law Review 33 (2000): 1023–61.
- Horwitz, Morton J. The Transformation of American Law, 1870–1960. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Nedelsky, Jennifer. Private Property and the Limits of American Constitutionalism: The Madisonian Framework and Its Legacy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- Pipes, Richard. Property and Freedom. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1999.
- Rose, Carol M., Property as the Keystone Right? Notre Dame Law Review 71 (1996): 329–66.
- Scheiber, Harry N., ed. The State and Freedom of Contract. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Allgeyer v. Louisiana*, 165 U.S. 578 (1897)
- Bronson v. Kinzie*, 42 U.S. 311 (1843)
- Buchanan v. Warley*, 245 U.S. 60 (1917)
- Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad v. Chicago*, 166 U.S. 226 (1897)
- Fletcher v. Peck*, 10 U.S. 87 (1810)
- Gardner v. Village of Newburgh*, 12 Johns. Ch. 162 (N.Y. 1816)
- Lochner v. New York*, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
- Muller v. Oregon*, 208 U.S. 412 (1908)
- Munn v. Illinois*, 94 U.S. 113 (1877)
- New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann*, 285 U.S. 262 (1932)
- Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon*, 260 U.S. 393 (1922)
- Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company*, 157 U.S. 429 (1895), 158 U.S. 601 (1895)
- Slaughterhouse Cases*, 83 U.S. 36 (1873)
- Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward*, 17 U.S. 518 (1819)
- United States v. Carolene Products Co.*, 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
- Vanhorne's Lessee v. Dorrance*, 2 Dallas 304 (1795)
- Village of Euclid v. Amber Realty Company*, 272 U.S. 365 (1926)
- Wilkinson v. Leland*, 27 U.S. 627 (1829)
- Wynehamer v. People*, 13 N.Y. 378 (1856)

EDWARDS v. AGUILLARD, 482 U.S. 578 (1987)

This case is part of the ongoing cultural struggle over teaching evolution in public schools that began with the 1925 Scopes trial. The issue previously had come before the U.S. Supreme Court in Epperson v. Arkansas (1968), and continues to be a point of controversy in American life.

In Edwards v. Aguillard, the Court dealt with a 1981 Louisiana statute that prohibited “the teaching of the theory of evolution in public schools unless accompanied by instruction in ‘creation science.’” Although no school was obligated to teach creation science or evolution, if one was taught, the other had to be taught as well. In a seven-to-two decision, the Court held that the statute violated the Establishment Clause.

The Court assessed the statute under the first prong of the three-prong test Lemon test: “[T]he statute must have a secular legislative purpose.” It evaluated several secular purposes claimed by Louisiana, concluding that none were convincing. It is rare that a court finds a statute in violation of Lemon’s first prong. For virtually all statutes that have failed the second prong, a statute's "principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion."

The Court first evaluated the state's claim that the statute was intended to protect academic freedom. After agreeing with the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals that "the Act was not designed to further" academic freedom, the Court rejected the state's claim in oral argument that the legislature intended to protect academic freedom by requiring a fair and balanced and more comprehensive science curriculum even though it "may not [have] use[d] the terms 'academic freedom' in the correct legal sense." But even if that were true, the Court argued, the statute's construction was not tailored to accomplish this goal, since the statute in fact limited the curriculum and a teacher's academic freedom by forbidding instruction in evolution unless creation science was offered. Citing the statute's legislative history, including public comments by the statute's sponsor that he would have preferred that neither creationism nor evolution be taught, the Court concluded that the secular purpose claimed by the state was a sham.

The Court, agreeing with the Fifth Circuit, held that the statute's requirements—including the production of curriculum guides only for creationism, prohibition of discrimination only against creationists, and acquiring of resources and advice only from creation scientists—had the "purpose of discrediting 'evolution by counterbalancing its teaching at every turn with the teaching of creationism . . .'" Thus, the statute did not advance fairness, as the state argued.

The Court also held that the statute's purpose was to advance a particular religious viewpoint, the Genesis account of creation. The Court looked at the "historic and contemporaneous link between the teachings of certain religious denominations and the teaching of evolution." According to the Court, the legislative history "reveals that the term 'creation science,' as contemplated by the legislature that adopted this Act, embodies the religious belief that a supernatural creator was responsible for the creation of humankind." Also, the statute and its sponsor targeted one theory, evolution, which some citizens, including the statute's sponsor, believe is hostile to their religious faith. But the Constitution "forbids alike the preference of a religious doctrine or the prohibition of a theory which is deemed antagonistic to a particular dogma."

Edwards is an important case because it contains a standard that courts may use to assess a statute that requires a public school science curriculum on the topic of origins: (1) the statute's historical continuity with the creation/evolution battles throughout the twentieth century; (2) how closely the curricular content required by the statute parallels the creation story in Genesis, and/or whether the curricular content prohibited or regulated by the statute is treated as such because it is inconsistent with the creation story in Genesis; (3) the motives of those who support the statute in the legislature; and (4) whether the statute is a legitimate means to achieve appropriate state ends.

The only dissenting opinion was penned by Justice Antonin Scalia (joined by Chief Justice William Rehnquist). Among Scalia's many comments is his criticism of the Court's "religious motive test" to determine a statute's purpose. He argues that legislative motive, even if it is religious, is not the same as the actual purpose of the statute, which may be secular. Scalia also points out that legislators may support the same legislation for a variety of motives, and that "political activism by the religiously motivated is part of our heritage," which includes feeding the hungry and sheltering the homeless.

Because the Court stated that its opinion did "not imply that the legislature could never require that scientific critiques of prevailing scientific theories be taught," Edwards does not exclude the teaching of scientific views that are critical of evolution but that are not based exclusively on the authority of religious writings.

FRANCIS J. BECKWITH

References and Further Reading

- Beckwith, Francis J. Law, Darwinism & Public Education: The Establishment Clause and the Challenge of Intelligent Design. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2003.
- Campbell, John A., and Stephen C. Meyer, eds. Darwinism, Design, and Public Education. East Lansing, MI: Michigan State University Press, 2003.
- Carter, Stephen L., Evolutionism, Creationism, and Teaching Religion as a Hobby, Duke Law Journal 1987 (1987): 977.
- Darwin, Charles. On the Origin of Species. Facsimile of the 1st edition (1859), with introd. by Ernst Mayr. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1964.
- Dembski, William A., and Michael Ruse, eds. Debating Design: From Darwin to DNA. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Greenawalt, Kent, Establishing Religious Ideas: Evolution, Creationism, and Intelligent Design, Notre Dame Journal of Law, Ethics & Public Policy 17 (2003): 2:321–97.
- Johnson, Phillip E. Darwin on Trial. Chicago: Regnery Gateway, 1991.
- Miller, Kenneth R. Finding Darwin's God: A Scientist's Search for Common Ground Between God and Evolution. New York: Cliff Street Books, 1999.
- Numbers, Ronald. Darwinism in America. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Pennock, Robert T., ed. Intelligent Design Creationism and Its Critics: Philosophical, Theological, and Scientific Perspectives. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2001.
- Ruse, Michael. The Evolution Wars: A Guide to the Debates. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Balanced Treatment for Creation-Science and Evolution-Science in Public School Instruction. La. Rev. Stat. Ann. sec. 17:286.1–17:286.7 (West 1982)
Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 613 (1971)

See also Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968); Lemon Test; Scopes Trial; Teaching “Creation Science” in Public Schools; Teaching Evolution in Public Schools

EDWARDS v. ARIZONA, 451 U.S. 477 (1981)

In Edwards, the police arrested and questioned the defendant after advising him of his Miranda rights. He initially consented to questioning but later asked for an attorney. Questioning stopped at that time. The next day, police questioned him against his will, without counsel present. He answered freely and later confessed after the police played him the taped statement of an alleged accomplice. At trial, he challenged the confession, but the judge admitted it because it was voluntarily given.

In a nine-to-zero reversal, the Supreme Court analyzed its Miranda v. Arizona (1966) and Schneekloth v. Bustamonte (1973) holdings, and determined that the Constitution affords special protection to the right to counsel that cannot be protected by a merely voluntary waiver. It held that a confession can only be admitted when the suspect both voluntarily and knowingly relinquishes his Fifth Amendment right to counsel. The Court went further to protect the right, holding that once it has been invoked, a valid waiver must contain more than responses to police-initiated questioning. However, the Court noted that if the defendant initiates a subsequent conversation, he could be deemed to have waived his right.

Chief Justice Burger concurred in the judgment but voiced concern over the majority’s expansive holding. A second concurrence faulted the majority’s reliance on “initiation” as part of the waiver analysis. Subsequent cases interpreted Edwards broadly, leading the Court, in Minnick v. Mississippi (1990), to announce a bright-line rule that once a suspect invokes the right to counsel, he cannot be reinterviewed without counsel present.

SARA E. LINDENBAUM

References and Further Reading

Shapiro, Eugene L., Thinking the Unthinkable: Recasting the Presumption of Edwards v. Arizona, Oklahoma Law Review 53 (2000): 1:11–34.

Tomkovicz, James J., Standards for Invocation and Waiver of Counsel in Confession Contexts, Iowa Law Review 71 (1986): 4:975–1061.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146 (1990)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
Schneekloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973)

See also Miranda Warning; Rights of the Accused; Right to Counsel

EDWARDS v. CALIFORNIA, 314 U.S. 160 (1941)

When Californian Fred Edwards drove his destitute brother-in-law from Texas into California in 1939, Edwards violated a California statute criminalizing transportation of indigents into California. State and local governments had long restricted the movement of the poor because poverty had historically been considered a “moral pestilence.” During the Great Depression many poor citizens fled the South and Southwest for more prosperous states such as California, only to be greeted with hostile poor laws and with California’s claim that exclusion was a valid use of its police powers.

In Edwards v. California, the Supreme Court unanimously struck down the California statute as unconstitutional, clearly establishing a right to travel across state borders. A majority of the Court argued that California’s attempt to isolate itself from the national problems of poverty and labor migration violated the Commerce Clause, which prohibited states from restricting the movement of people and property across state lines. The Court also expressed its support for New Deal antipoverty programs and its rejection of the idea that poverty automatically presumed immorality.

Four justices concurred in the result but argued that by using the Commerce Clause, the Court in effect equated poor citizens with cattle and fruit. These justices instead relied on the constitutional clauses protecting the privileges and immunities of citizenship. However, the Court had just two years earlier rejected the use of the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to limit federal legislative powers, and the majority in Edwards did not want to revisit that issue.

JAMES W. FOX, JR.

References and Further Reading

Katz, Michael B., In the Shadow of the Poorhouse: A Social History of Welfare in America. New York: Basic Books, 1986.

Patterson, James T. America's Struggle Against Poverty in the Twentieth Century. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988.

See also Right to Travel

EDWARDS v. SOUTH CAROLINA, 372 U.S. 229 (1963)

This case was decided by the Supreme Court in 1963. It was one of numerous cases involving civil rights demonstrations to come before the Court. Edwards decided several important issues that facilitated the ability of groups to make these protests. It involved a demonstration by 187 black high school and college students. They marched to the South Carolina State House grounds in groups of about fifteen, then walked single file or two abreast in an orderly way on the sidewalks around the grounds, carrying signs protesting segregation. As the demonstration continued, about 355 onlookers, mostly hostile to the demonstrators, congregated on the grounds. These spectators impeded the traffic flow around the State House. The response of law enforcement officials was to order the student demonstrators to disperse. When they failed to do so, they were arrested, charged, and convicted for a breach of the peace.

The Court held that state government ground such as the State House grounds were quintessential public fora where First Amendment activities were entitled to the greatest protection. The Court also held that these rights were to be protected against a hostile audience. This ensured the “heckler’s veto” could not justify stifling the demonstrators. That holding established a wide range of protection for nonviolent protests. The Court said “the Fourteenth Amendment does not permit a State to make criminal the peaceful expression of unpopular views.” The Court found that state and local governments could not use their breach of the peace statutes to arrest or imprison peaceful demonstrators.

PATRICK FLYNN

References and Further Reading

Weaver, Russell L., and Arthur D. Hellman The First Amendment: Cases, Materials and Problems. Charlottesville, Va.: LexisNexis, 2002.

Friedman, Leon, and Richard Mark Gergel. “Matthew J. Perry’s Contribution to the Development of Constitutional Law.” In Matthew J. Perry: The Man, His Times, and His Legacy, edited by W. Lewis Burke and Belinda Gergel, 105–10. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004.

EISENSTADT v. BAIRD, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)

Appellee Baird delivered a lecture on contraception to a group of college students in which he displayed contraceptive materials and then gave one of the students a package of contraceptive foam in violation of a Massachusetts law. The law at issue criminalized the distribution of contraceptives. Yet, the statute provided, in part, that a “registered physician may administer to or prescribe for any married person drugs or articles intended for the prevention of pregnancy or conception” (Eisenstadt v. Baird [1972]). Appellee, having been charged with violation of the Massachusetts law, challenged its constitutionality in a writ of habeas corpus upon his conviction.

The question presented was whether there was some ground of difference between married and unmarried persons that rationally explained their different treatment under the law. The Supreme Court invalidated the statute on equal protection grounds. It held that the statute, viewed as a prohibition on contraception, per se, violated the rights of single persons under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. As the Court indicated, the legislative intent of the statute, as explained by the state courts, was unclear. One state court found that the prohibition was directly related to the state’s goal of “preventing the distribution of articles designed to prevent conception which may have undesirable, if not dangerous, physical consequences” (Commonwealth v. Baird [1969]). Another Massachusetts court, however, found that “a second and more compelling ground for upholding the statute” was to protect morals through “regulating the sexual lives of single persons” (Sturges v. Attorney General [1970]). The state further argued to the Supreme Court that the purpose of the statute was to promote marital fidelity.

The Supreme Court rejected all of these purported goals of the statute at issue. As written, in making contraceptives available to married persons without regard to their intended use, the statute did nothing to prohibit the illicit sexual activities of married persons. With regard to the purported goal of discouraging premarital sexual intercourse, the effect of the statute would be to make the birth of an unwanted child the punishment for fornication. Clearly, such an outcome would be at odds with the proffered objective. Finally, with regard to the purported goal of protecting individuals from dangerous consequences, the statute forbade physicians from distributing contraceptives even when needed to protect the patient’s health.

Writing for four members of the Court, Brennan explained that although the Court has recognized that the Fourteenth Amendment does not prohibit states from treating different classes of persons in different ways, the Equal Protection Clause does prohibit the state from doing so arbitrarily. A classification must be reasonable and must rest on some grounds having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation. Similarly situated persons must be treated alike. As discussed above, in this case, the evils that the statute purported to address applied equally to both married and unmarried persons. Therefore, the discrimination against unmarried persons was found to be invidious. Although Griswold v. Connecticut found a right to privacy only in the marital relationship, a married couple is an association of two people each with a separate intellectual and emotional make-up (striking down a law that forbade the use of contraceptives by married persons). The right to privacy, thus, is a right of the individual “to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child” (Eisenstadt).

Although decided on equal protection grounds, the Court’s language was consistent with the noneconomic substantive due process cases of 1920s and 1960s. Eisenstadt continues to be cited in most cases addressing abortion and an individual’s right to privacy. Indeed, the right to privacy found in Griswold and Eisenstadt paved the way for Roe v. Wade (1973); City of Akron v. Akron Ctr. for Reproductive Health (1983) (relying in part on Eisenstadt in invalidating ordinance requiring all second trimester abortions to be done in a hospital). Most recently, the Supreme Court relied on Eisenstadt in striking down a state law criminalizing sodomy, stating, “the right to make certain decisions regarding sexual conduct extends beyond the marital relationship” (Lawrence v. Texas S.Ct. [2003]).

EMILY R. FROMSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Akron v. Akron Ctr. for Reproductive Health*, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)
Commonwealth v. Baird, 355 Mass. 746, 247 N.E.2d 574 (1969)
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Lawrence v. Texas, 123 S.Ct. 2472, 2477 (2003)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Sturges v. Attorney General, 358 Mass. 37, 260 N.E.2d 687 (1970)

ELDRED v. ASHCROFT, 537 U.S. 186 (2001)

The U.S. Constitution has a special provision allowing Congress to enact copyright and patent statutes. Article one, section eight, clause eight reads: “The Congress shall have the power . . . [t]o promote the Progress of Science and the useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries” (Copyright Clause). According to the Supreme Court, the Copyright Clause grants Congress a limited power; the clause provides an incentive for creative persons, but its main purpose is to benefit the public (Feist Publications, Inc. v. Rural Telephone Service Co., Inc. [1991]).

Copyright protection has changed greatly during the history of the United States. The first Congress passed the first Copyright Act in 1790. That statute allowed fourteen years of protection with the option of renewing protection for another fourteen years. The act only protected books, charts, and maps from persons producing close copies. Over time Congress has expanded copyright protection in many ways, including by covering many different types of works (such as songs and movies), protecting them from more types of competition (such as translations, sequels, and public performances), giving authors the entire term without needing to request renewal, and extending the length of protection. In 1998, Congress passed the Copyright Term Extension Act (CTEA), which changed the copyright term for most works from fifty years after the author died to seventy years after the author died. The extension covered not only works created after the CTEA, but those already in existence (referred to as “retrospective extension”). The CTEA was nicknamed the “Mickey Mouse Act” because it prevented Walt Disney’s famous cartoon from losing copyright protection. Like Disney, many of the other businesses that lobbied Congress to pass the CTEA had already successful works about to lose copyright protection.

Many businesses and nonprofit organizations specialize in distributing works that are no longer under copyright protection. Several of them sued, claiming that retrospective extension is beyond Congress’s power under the Copyright Clause and violates the First Amendment. In Eldred, the Supreme Court rejected both of these claims.

Discussing the Copyright Clause, the Supreme Court declared that “a page of history is worth a volume of logic.” The CTEA is constitutional because earlier statutes had included retrospective extensions.

Second, the Court rejected arguments about the purpose of the Copyright Clause. Economists had demonstrated that the change in term length had no appreciable value to an author deciding whether to write a new work or to a publisher deciding whether to print a new work. Opponents of the act argued that the Copyright Clause’s sole purpose was to provide an incentive for the creation of new works; the act failed to provide such an incentive, and therefore, was beyond Congress's power. Additionally, during the long period when copyright protection had included an optional renewal term, most authors had not filed for renewal. The dearth of renewals demonstrates that most works quickly stop producing money for their authors and publishers. However, many works are "orphans," that is, their authors and publishers are not exploiting them, but members of the public cannot use them either, because they cannot locate these authors and publishers to obtain copyright permission. Extending the copyright term increases the number of orphan works and the number of years that these orphan works are used by no one. In sum, opponents of the CTEA argued that it placed much too high a burden on public use of works in comparison to the incentives provided to authors and publishers.

The Supreme Court refused to conduct its own balance of the CTEA's burdens and benefits. Instead, the Court deferred to Congress's judgment about needed incentives; it also approved Congress's decision to base policy on all of the creation of new works, incentives for distributing old works, and international harmonization of copyright law.

Regarding the First Amendment challenge, the Court called copyright "the engine of free expression." Additionally, the Court felt that works under copyright protection did not present First Amendment problems for two reasons. First, certain publicly beneficial uses (such as criticism and parody) are allowed without authors' permission (called "fair use"). Second, copyright only protects expression (the way the author explains his point); it does not prevent others from reusing facts or ideas.

Eldred demonstrates Supreme Court deference to Congress. However, the limit of the Court's deference is not clear because the suit only involved retrospective extension.

MALLA POLLACK

References and Further Reading

- Yu, Peter K., ed. Extending Mickey's Life: Eldred v. Ashcroft and the Copyright Term Extension Debate. Cambridge, Mass.: Kluwer Law International, 2005.
- Lessig, Lawrence. Free Culture: How Big Media Uses Technology and the Law to Lock Down Culture and Control Creativity. New York: Penguin Press, 2004.
- Loyola of Los Angeles Law Review. "Eldred v. Ashcroft: Intellectual Property, Congressional Power and the Constitution." Loyola of Los Angeles Law Review 36, no. 1 (2002). Symposium issue. <http://llr.lls.edu/volumes/v36-issue1/>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Feist Publications, Inc. v. Rural Telephone Service Co., Inc.*, 499 U.S. 340 (1991)

See also Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Fair Use Doctrine and First Amendment; Intellectual Property and the First Amendment; Satire and Parody and the First Amendment

ELECTRIC CHAIR AS CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT

On August 6, 1890, William Kemmler became the first person to be executed via electric chair. He was also the first person to argue that this method of execution was a violation of the Eighth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution (In re Kemmler [1890]).

Kemmler's execution, like several other executions by electric chair, has been described as a gruesome event. In most electrocutions, the prisoner is strapped into a chair with leather belts across the chest, thighs, legs, and arms. Two copper electrodes are then attached—one to the leg and the other to a helmet. A leather mask or black cloth is placed over the prisoner's face. The executioner then presses a button to deliver the first shock of between 1,700 and 2,400 volts. This lasts somewhere between thirty seconds and one minute. Smoke usually comes out of the prisoner's leg and head. A doctor then examines the individual, who if not dead is given another jolt of electricity. A third and fourth are given if necessary. In at least one instance, the death of Ethel Rosenberg, five jolts of electricity were needed. In some instances, the process can last between six and nineteen minutes.

After electrocution the body temperature rises to about 138°F. The fluids inside the body "boil" the internal organs. Justice William Brennan of the U.S. Supreme Court stated in his dissent to the denial of certiorari in Glass v. Louisiana (1985), that during an electric chair death the prisoner's eyeballs sometimes pop out and rest on his cheeks. He often defecates, urinates, and vomits blood and drool. The body turns bright red as its temperature rises, and the prisoner's flesh swells and his skin stretches to the point of breaking. Sometimes the prisoner catches on fire, particularly if he perspires excessively. Witnesses hear a loud and sustained sound like bacon frying, and the sickly sweet smell of burning flesh permeates the [death] chamber.

Despite the fact that this description of death by electric chair sounds cruel, the U.S. Supreme Court has never determined that this method of execution is "cruel and unusual" in violation of the Eighth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

In order for a punishment to violate the Eighth Amendment, it must be both cruel and unusual. According to the U.S. Supreme Court, punishment that involves torture or unnecessary pain is cruel. However, the fact that a punishment is cruel alone does not make it unconstitutional. It must also be "unusual," which has been defined by the Court in terms of consistency. This means that a punishment is unconstitutional only if it is not applied consistently to all like crimes. The underlying notion is that individuals will not be subjected to arbitrary, humiliating, or whimsical punishment outside the normal course of the law.

Lower courts have also examined the issue of whether the electric chair constitutes a form of cruel and unusual punishment under state constitutions. In these cases, the analysis is dominated by the length of time that it takes for the prisoner to die and the pain involved in the execution. For example, the Supreme Court of Florida accepted evidence of "instantaneous unconsciousness" and therefore no "unnecessary and wanton pain" when it upheld electrocution as a method of execution (Provenzano v. Moore [1999]). On the other hand, Georgia's highest court held that use of the electric chair was cruel and unusual punishment because electrocution "inflicts purposeless physical violence and needless mutilation that makes no measurable contribution to accepted goals of punishment." The Court also held "that death by electrocution, with its specter of excruciating pain and its certainty of cooked brains and blistered bodies, violates the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment" (Dawson v. State [Ga. 2001]).

At one time in history, electrocution was used in twenty-six states as the preferred form of execution. Since 1924, however, there has been a clear movement away from this method of execution.

In 2005, death by electrocution is mandatory in only one state—Nebraska. However, in Palmer v. Clarke (2003), Judge Bataillon questioned the legitimacy of this form of execution by noting in dicta that the Court would find, in accordance with "evolving standards of decency," that execution by electrocution is both cruel and unusual particularly since there is no evidence that electrocution is either quick or painless.

In addition to Nebraska, nine other states explicitly authorize electrocution as a form of execution—Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Illinois, Kentucky, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia.

From 1890 until 2005, more than 4,460 people have been sentenced to death by electrocution in the United States. We remain the only nation in the world that continues to allow this form of execution.

JUDITH A. M. SCULLY

References and Further Reading

- Banner, Stuart. Death Penalty: An American History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Capital Defense Weekly. The Shocking Truth About Death in the Electric Chair. N.d. <http://members.aol.com/karlkeys/chair.htm>.
- Harding, Roberta M., The Gallows to the Gurney: Analyzing the (Un)constitutionality of the Methods of Execution, Boston University Public Interest Law Journal 6 (1996): 153.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Dawson v. State*, 554 S.E.2d 137 (Ga. 2001)
- Glass v. Louisiana*, 471 U.S. 1080 (1985)
- In re Kemmler*, 136 U.S. 436 (1890)
- Palmer v. Clarke*, 293 F.Supp. 2d 1011 (D. Nebraska 2003)
- Provenzano v. Moore*, 744 So.2d 413 (1999)

ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE, TECHNOLOGY MONITORING, AND DOG SNIFFS

The fundamental question for examining any possible civil liberties violations for electronic surveillance, technology monitoring, and dog sniffs is whether a prohibited search occurred under the Fourth Amendment. A prohibited search occurs when a person has a subjective expectation of privacy that society will objectively recognize and that expectation of privacy is violated. The analysis is on the person because as the U.S. Supreme Court stated in United States v. Katz, "the Fourth Amendment protects people not places." The first part of the analysis is whether the person has exhibited a subjective expectation of privacy by looking at the location and what acts were taken to protect privacy. The analysis concludes with whether society will recognize that expectation as objectively reasonable. Accordingly, the use of electronic surveillance, technology monitoring, and dog sniffs hinges on whether there was an expectation of privacy for the person, object, or place being searched and that search violated an expectation of privacy. This civil liberty interest against unreasonable searches is protected by the exclusionary rule, which prohibits the use of evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment. However, if the government obtains a valid probable cause warrant, then the searches would not fall under the Fourth Amendment prohibition.

Electronic Surveillance

Electronic surveillance by the government is regulated by the Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA) and the Fourth Amendment. The ECPA is a broad statute that regulates government regarding the interception and attempted interception of wire, oral, or electronic communications, access to electronic communication service, and remote computing services, and pen register surveillance. The Fourth Amendment restrictions are whether the person has a subjective expectation of privacy that society is objectively willing to recognize. However, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) has exceptions to the surveillance requirements under the ECPA for national security matters.

The ECPA has three main sections that cover what the government can and cannot do with regard to obtaining electronic communications, information stored on computers, and pen register surveillance. The ECPA also covers actions by individuals and nongovernmental entities and has civil and criminal penalties for unlawful access. However, for civil liberties purposes, only government restrictions are covered below.

The first section covering the interception of wire, oral, and electronic communication sets forth the rules that the government must abide by making the application for an interception and the restrictions on the use of the information that is obtained. This section was originally introduced as Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (also known as Title III). This section covers the actual content of wire and electronic communication, and the ECPA sets forth the metes and bounds of when and how the interception can occur. The ECPA restricts the use of the information intercepted when the interception does not comply with requirements of the ECPA.

The second section covers the processes for the government to obtain access to electronic communication services and remote computing services and the information contained by the services. Because different types of information are deemed to have varying privacy interests, the ECPA has five mechanisms from which the government can obtain information from the services. These five mechanisms include subpoenas, subpoenas with notice, court order, court order with notice, and a search warrant, which are tailored in light of the privacy interests of the information being requested. Even if the information regulated under this section is obtained without complying with the requirements of the ECPA, the ECPA does not explicitly restrict the use of this information as evidence. However, the information could be restricted under the exclusionary rule if it is obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment.

The third section covers processes for the government to conduct pen register surveillance and the information obtained therein (also known as the “pen/trap statute”). This section covers the address and other noncontent information for wire and electronic communication. Information obtained outside of the requirements of the ECPA is not explicitly disallowed as evidence unless the method of obtaining the information violates the Fourth Amendment and is thus excluded under the exclusionary rule.

The first question for electronic surveillance that does not fall under the ECPA is whether the surveillance is a search. If the surveillance is not a search, then there cannot be a Fourth Amendment violation for the surveillance. The surveillance is a search under the Fourth Amendment when the person has a subjective expectation of privacy that society will objectively recognize and that privacy is violated by the search. Generally any information that a person puts out into public view falls outside of the purview of the expectation of privacy that society will objectively recognize.

For example, the use of a pen register to record phone numbers dialed from a telephone is not a search. Even if a person thinks that the phone numbers dialed are private, that expectation is not reasonable because the telephone company routinely monitors and records the numbers dialed for troubleshooting and billing purposes. Accordingly, since a reasonable person knows that the numbers dialed are turned over to the telephone company, then there is no reasonable expectation of privacy for the dialed numbers and therefore no search has occurred when the government obtains those numbers. This lack of privacy would most likely be extended to other address types of information such as email addresses and website addresses in which the traffic has been exposed to third parties but not necessarily the content of the traffic. However, as noted above pen register surveillance is now regulated by the ECPA but a person still has a lowered expectation of privacy when information is turned over to a third party.

The lack of privacy for the information turned over to third parties extends to most types of information that are obtained by electronic surveillance that third parties would have or which do not fall under the ECPA. There is a lowered expectation of privacy when the communication is knowingly exposed to a third party. For example, when an undercover agent or informant has a microphone from which a conversation is recorded, there is no reasonable expectation of privacy because the conversation has been exposed to the third party. In these situations, no search has occurred because the people have exposed their conversations to the person who has the microphone.

Other situations where the objective expectation of privacy is too minimal to be considered a search under the Fourth Amendment include ham radio communication and citizen's band radio. However, a person having a conversation over a cordless phone would in general have a reasonable expectation of privacy that society would recognize because although it is conceivable that the conversation could be overheard, it is reasonable for a person to expect that the conversation is private. This expectation of privacy extends to a person having a conversation in a phone booth, a hotel room, and other locations when the person has taken the steps to exclude others from the conversation, and society recognizes those exclusionary steps as objectively reasonable. Accordingly, the key factor in the determination is not simply whether the communication can be intercepted but whether it is reasonable for the communication to be intercepted by another.

Thus, if the electronic surveillance falls under the ECPA, then the government has to abide by the restrictions in the ECPA. However, even if the government does not abide by the restrictions in the ECPA, it does not necessarily violate the person's Fourth Amendment rights. Generally, electronic surveillance is not a search under the Fourth Amendment unless the person has a subjective expectation of privacy that society is objectively willing to recognize and that expectation of privacy is violated. However, when the government has a warrant issued with probable cause, then the government can in general conduct the search by the means specified in the warrant.

Technology Monitoring

The issue of whether technology monitoring by the government is a search hinges on whether the monitoring invades on a person's subjective expectation of privacy that society objectively recognizes. If there is no invasion of privacy, then no search under the Fourth Amendment has occurred. However, technology that provides information about a physically protected area that could not be searched without a warrant constitutes an unreasonable search when the technology is not in general public use. Where the government is using technology that is not in general public use such as thermal imaging devices, then the government must obtain a search warrant to utilize the technology.

In general, when a person knowingly exposes his or her activity to the public or third parties, then that activity can be monitored by the government through public or third party means. For example, the government can use global positioning system (GPS) or radio beacons attached to the exterior of a car to track the location of packages or containers that a person receives from a third party or common carrier. The tracking beacon is simply a way for the government to monitor the location of the package that the government could otherwise do by visual tracking methods. The tracking beacon is just an extension of the allowable methods by which a person can be tracked.

Technology monitoring also includes closed caption television monitoring (CCTV), audio monitoring, and infrared monitoring. CCTV monitoring is widespread in various countries throughout the world in airports, trains, subways, on public streets, police stations, and other public places. Generally, these types of surveillance that occur in public places are not searches because people are knowingly exposing their activities to the public view. However, technology monitoring using CCTV, audio monitoring, and infrared monitoring that occur outside of public view such as in a person's private home without a valid search warrant would violate a person's reasonable expectation of privacy. However, if the person invites a third party into the home, then the monitoring that the third party brings into the home is reasonable because the person invited the third party into the home and exposed the internal workings of the home to the third party. Accordingly, CCTV, audio, and infrared monitoring have to work within the same confines as other types of technology monitoring in that they violate a person's Fourth Amendment rights when the person has a reasonable expectation of privacy that society objectively recognizes.

The government can also monitor an employee's activity with the employer's consent when the employee has no reasonable expectation of privacy regarding whether the employer can monitor work activities. However, to dispel any expectation of privacy, the employer should disclose to the employee that the employer can and will monitor the employee's activities. This monitoring can also extend to government employees as long as the employees are aware that their expectation of privacy is lowered because the government is monitoring. The issue of whether the monitoring is a search hinges on whether the employee is aware of the monitoring and thus has a lowered expectation of privacy in regards to the activity or location being monitored.

Accordingly, the issue of whether technology monitoring is a search under the Fourth Amendment hinges on whether the person being monitored has a subjective expectation of privacy that society objectively recognizes. In general, people in a public place have a limited expectation of privacy unless they have taken the steps necessary to shield their activities from public view. In addition, the monitoring must not intrude into places that are protected places such as the interior of a person's home without a search warrant that was issued with probable cause. Thus, the government can use different methods of technology monitoring without a warrant as long as the means do not intrude on a person's reasonable expectation of privacy that society objectively recognizes and as long as the technology means does not intrude on a protected area with technology that is not commonly available by the public.

Dog Sniff

Dog or canine sniffs do not in general compromise any legitimate expectation of privacy as long as the dog and the officer are legally allowed to be where the sniff occurs. The key issue for any Fourth Amendment violations involving a dog sniff is whether the dog is in a place that it can legally be since a dog sniff itself does not intrude on areas that are hidden from public view. A person does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in an odor radiating from an object because the odor has been put into the public view by its release from the object. Additionally, dog sniffs do not show the interior of protected areas but simply indicate the presence or absence of contraband items. Accordingly, as long as the dog is in a location that it can legally be then the sniff is not a search under the Fourth Amendment. However, if the dog and the handler are not in a location where they legally can be, then the dog sniff is a search under the Fourth Amendment because the presence of the dog and its handler is itself a search.

Even if the dog sniff is not a search, the seizure that leads to the dog sniff may become unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment if the person or items have been unlawfully detained by the police. The seizure of an automobile at a checkpoint does not turn the subsequent sniff by the dog into a search as long as the stop is lawful in nature and is not extended beyond what is reasonable. The reasonableness question for detaining people or items hinges on whether under the Fourth Amendment the government has reasonable suspicion for detaining the people or items for the dog sniff and has specific and articulable facts for the suspicion. In addition, the government must work diligently to obtain a trained dog for the sniff when people or items are seized under reasonable suspicion. However, when the people have placed themselves or items into the public view and the odor is radiating to the public place, then no reasonable suspicion is needed because the dog sniff of the radiating smell is not a search and the person or items have not been seized. The government can utilize a dog sniff for checked luggage on planes, trains, and busses, shipped packages, storage lockers, trailers, and cars, as long as the items have not been seized or the seizure of those items is reasonable.

In general, a dog sniff on items in public view is not a search. However, the sniff can become an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment if the person or items to be sniffed are detained beyond a reasonable time or without reasonable suspicion. Accordingly, a dog sniff is not a search under the Fourth Amendment because the privacy interest of odor radiating from a person or item is not a reasonable privacy interest protected by the Fourth Amendment.

LINDA F. HARRISON

References and Further Reading

- Ball, Kirstie, and Frank Webster, eds. Intensification of Surveillance: Crime, Terrorism and Warfare in the Information Age. London: Pluto Press, 2003.
- Bloom, Robert M. Searches, Seizures, and Warrants: A Reference Guide to the United States Constitution. Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, 2003.
- City of Indianapolis v. Edmond*, 531 U.S. 32 (2000).
- Hall, John Wesley. Search and Seizure. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law Publishing, 2000.
- LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2004.
- Newburn, Tim, and Stephanie Hayman. Policing, Surveillance and Social Control: CCTV and Police Monitoring of Suspects. Devon, UK: Willan Publishing, 2001.
- Schneier, Bruce, and David Banisar, eds. The Electronic Privacy Papers: Documents on the Battle for Privacy in the Age of Surveillance. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1997.
- Sharpe, Sybil. Search and Surveillance. Aldershot, England: Ashgate Publishing, 2000.
- USA Patriot Act of 2001, 115 Stat. 272.
- U.S. Department of Justice, Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section. "Searching and Seizing Computer and Obtaining Electronic Evidence in Criminal Investigations." July 2002. <http://www.usdoj.gov/criminal/cybercrime/s&smanual2002.pdf>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA) of 1986, 100 Stat. 1848
- Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) of 1978, 92 Stat. 1783
- Illinois v. Caballes*, 125 S.Ct. 834 (2005)
- Katz v. United States*, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
- Kyllo v. United States*, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)

Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709 (1987)
Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505 (1961)
Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979)
United States v. Byrd, 31 F.3d 1329 (5th Cir. 1994)
United States v. Dixon, 51 F.3d 1376 (8th Cir. 1995)
United States v. Gonzalez, 328 F.3d 543 (9th Cir. 2003)
United States v. Hernandez, 313 F.3d 1206 (9th Cir. 2002)
United States v. Johnson, 990 F.2d 1129 (9th Cir. 1993)
United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705 (1984)
United States v. Knotts, 460 U.S. 276 (1983)
United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164 (1974)
United States v. McIver, 186 F.3d 1119 (9th Cir. 1999)
United States v. Michael, 645 F.2d 252 (5th Cir. 1981)
United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696 (1983)
United States v. Rose, 669 F.2d 23 (1st Cir. 1982)
United States v. Shovea, 580 F.2d 1382 (10th Cir. 1978)
United States v. Simons, 206 F.3d 392 (4th Cir. 2000)
United States v. Sukiz-Grado, 22 F.3d 1006 (10th Cir. 1994)
United States v. Smith, 978 F.2d 171 (5th Cir. 1992)
United States v. Sundby, 186 F.3d 873 (8th Cir. 1999)
United States v. Ward, 144 F.3d 1024 (7th Cir. 1998)
United States v. White, 42 F.3d 457 (8th Cir. 1994)
 U.S. Constitution, Fourth Amendment

See also Administrative Searches and Seizures; Airport Searches; Anonymity in Online Communication; Automobile Searches; Checkpoints (roadblocks); Invasion of Privacy and Free Speech; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Plain View; War on Drugs; Warrantless Searches; Wiretapping Laws

ELK GROVE UNIFIED SCHOOL DISTRICT v. NEWDOW, 542 U.S. 1 (2004)

In Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow, the Supreme Court declined to resolve the constitutionality of the inclusion of the words “under God” in the Pledge of Allegiance when recited in public schools. Instead, the Court found that the plaintiff in the case lacked standing to sue and thereby reversed a controversial decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit that had found the “under God” language in the Pledge when recited by public schoolchildren violative of the Establishment Clause.

A California school district required each elementary school class in the district to recite the Pledge of Allegiance every day. The father of a schoolchild objected, claiming that the inclusion of the words “under God” in the Pledge constituted religious indoctrination in violation of the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment (even though his daughter was not compelled to participate in the recitation). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit found that the recitation violated the Establishment Clause. This decision sparked a national controversy, and the U.S. Congress promptly passed a resolution—unanimously in the Senate and with only five nay votes in the House—condemning that decision.

The Supreme Court accepted review and held that the father, who was a noncustodial parent of the schoolchild, lacked standing to bring the action. The Court emphasized that the father’s standing derived entirely from his relationship with his daughter, and that their interests were not parallel and were potentially in conflict. Since the father lacked standing, the Court dismissed the case, thereby reversing the decision of the Ninth Circuit.

Three justices, however, dissented from the majority’s discussion of standing. These justices, all of whom wrote separate opinions, would have reached the merits of the case and found that the school recitation of the Pledge with the “under God” language did not offend the Establishment Clause. (A fourth justice, Antonin Scalia, recused himself from consideration of the case because of prior public comments critical of the Ninth Circuit’s ruling.)

In his separate opinion, Chief Justice William Rehnquist concluded that the recitation of the Pledge did not violate the Establishment Clause:

I do not believe that the phrase ‘under God’ in the Pledge converts its recital into a ‘religious exercise’ Instead, it is a declaration of belief in allegiance and loyalty to the United States flag and the Republic that it represents. The phrase ‘under God’ is in no sense a prayer, nor an endorsement of any religion Reciting the Pledge, or listening to others recite it, is a patriotic exercise, not a religious one; participants promise fidelity to our flag and our Nation, not to any particular God, faith, or church.

Justice Sandra Day O’Connor, in her opinion, argued that the recitation of the Pledge did not violate the “endorsement test.” For Justice O’Connor, quoting her earlier concurring opinion in Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), endorsement “sends a message to nonadherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community, and an accompanying message to adherents that they are insiders, favored members of the political community.” Justice O’Connor concluded that recitation of the Pledge sent no such message. Justice O’Connor concluded that the “under God” language in the Pledge constituted an expression of “ceremonial deism” which did not offend the Establishment Clause.

Finally, Justice Clarence Thomas concluded that the recitation of the Pledge did violate the Establishment Clause as interpreted by the Court because it “coerced” young children “to declare a belief” that this is “one Nation under God.” Hence, for Justice Thomas, “as a matter of our precedent, the Pledge policy is unconstitutional.” But, Justice Thomas went further, arguing that almost all of the Court's prior Establishment Clause cases were wrongly decided because, in his view, the Establishment Clause does not apply to the states. Justice Thomas recognized that the Court in prior cases had "incorporated" the Establishment Clause through the Fourteenth Amendment to apply to the states, but he concluded that that incorporation was inappropriate as a matter of history. Because, in Justice Thomas's view, the Establishment Clause does not apply to the states, the recitation of the Pledge by a local California school district was not unconstitutional.

In light of the resolution of the Elk Grove case on standing grounds, the constitutionality of recitations of the Pledge in public schools remains uncertain.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

Collins, Todd, Lost in the Forest of the Establishment Clause: Elk Grove v. Newdow, Campbell Law Review 27 (2004): 1–38.

Gey, Steven, 'Under God,' The Pledge of Allegiance, and Other Constitutional Trivia, North Carolina Law Review 81 (2003): 1865–925.

Hancock, Kevin P., Comment: Closing the Endorsement Test Escape-Hatch in the Pledge of Allegiance Debate, Seton Hall Law Review 35 (2005): 739–88.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)

See also Ceremonial Deism; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Pledge of Allegiance ("Under God")

ELLSWORTH COURT (1796–1800)

The "Ellsworth Court" is the title attributed to the Supreme Court during the tenure of Oliver Ellsworth as chief justice of the United States, from March 1796 to December 1800. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, was the de facto leader of the Federalist faction in Congress prior to his appointment. In addition, Ellsworth had been instrumental in the passage of the Judiciary Act of 1789 that established the basic structure of the federal judiciary. Ellsworth was the third chief justice of the United States, attaining the office after John Rutledge failed to achieve confirmation after becoming chief justice by recess appointment.

Prominent associate justices to serve during Ellsworth's time as chief justice include William Cushing, Samuel Chase, James Iredell, William Paterson, Bushrod Washington, and James Wilson. Justice

Alfred Moore also served briefly during this period, resigning due to ill health and dissatisfaction with his duties. As with the Jay Court, each of these jurists was selected by President George Washington and was considered sympathetic to Federalist principles. The Ellsworth Court met twice annually in Philadelphia, which was then the temporary national capital.

Unlike the contemporary Supreme Court, the Ellsworth Court consisted of only six justices. The composition of the Supreme Court during Ellsworth's tenure was geographically balanced with members drawn from each region of the United States. This was the norm for the early Supreme Court, as it facilitated "circuit riding" duties and stifled disputes among sectional interests.

Circuit riding was a hallmark of the Supreme Court in its first century, requiring justices to hold court alongside district judges twice each year in a judicial circuit assigned to them. Justices rode circuit each year following the February and August terms of the Supreme Court. Many justices found circuit riding objectionable as it required extensive travel for weeks or months at a time. Although this aspect of the justices' duties provoked discontent, their repeated appeals to Congress yielded little relief.

Although it remained relatively small, the workload of the Supreme Court under Ellsworth's leadership was greater than during the tenures of John Jay and John Rutledge (1789–1795). The institution's docket during Ellsworth's tenure was generally dominated by admiralty and diversity cases, many of which resulted from contemporaneous American treaty obligations. The years 1796 and 1797 in particular saw escalation in the Supreme Court's workload, with more than fifty cases considered in 1796 and nearly thirty in 1797. Along with maritime and economic disputes, the justices faced some controversies with ramifications for American civil liberties. The most significant of these concerned seditious libel and the legitimacy of criminal prosecutions under federal common law.

Federal indictments for sedition and acts of rebellion had occurred as early as 1792, but these issues became particularly important during Ellsworth's tenure. Domestic furor over Jay's Treaty (1795–1796) and strained relations with France created a volatile political climate. Following the scandalous XYZ Affair, the federal government prepared for war with France and sought to discourage domestic dissent. This contributed to the passage of the Sedition Act (1798). This statute clearly stipulated that sedition was a criminal act, as it had been considered by jurists previously on the basis of common law. This proved controversial, with some legislators asserting that the act merely codified existing common law, and others believing it to be an infringement of Americans' civil liberties guaranteed by the Constitution.

The Supreme Court justices enforced the Sedition Act in the circuit courts, with Chief Justice Ellsworth advocating the position that the act was in agreement with constitutional principles and the common law. The other justices were sympathetic with this position and enforced the Sedition Act, sometimes vigorously. Both ordinary citizens and members of the press were prosecuted under the Act, most often for criticism of President John Adams and the Federalists in Congress. The Sedition Act came to be viewed as a tool of the Federalists to thwart dissent and became a contentious issue in the election of 1800. Both the Sedition Act and the notion of federal common-law crimes were attacked by Thomas Jefferson and the Democratic-Republicans. The Supreme Court never addressed the Sedition Act directly, as it expired in 1801 and was not renewed by the Democratic-Republicans after their electoral victory in 1800.

Interestingly, the Ellsworth Court preceded the Supreme Court's 1803 decision in Marbury v. Madison (1803), but its justices apparently agreed on the legitimacy of judicial review. The justices clearly considered the constitutionality of a federal tax in Hylton v. United States (1796), although they did not strike down the relevant statute. In addition, the Court's decision in Ware v. Hylton (1796) provided perhaps the Supreme Court's earliest expression of the supremacy of federal law. While Ware dealt specifically with a conflict between a Virginia statute and a federal treaty with Britain, the invocation of the Supremacy Clause was an important declaration of the precedence of federal over state laws.

A notable institutional development during this period was the decline of in seriatim opinions under Ellsworth's leadership. Unlike his predecessors as chief justice, Ellsworth employed the prestige of his position to craft a single majority opinion. While in contrast to English tradition, this custom had been followed on the Connecticut court on which Ellsworth had previously served. While the practice of justices publishing in seriatim opinions did not diminish completely until the tenure of Chief Justice John Marshall (1801–1835), the Ellsworth Court issued consolidated majority opinions in every case in which the chief justice participated.

Chief Justice Ellsworth retained his position until December 1800, when he resigned after four and a half years of judicial service. Prior to his resignation, Ellsworth had been appointed as minister to France in 1799–1800 and was instrumental in the effort to thwart a naval war with America's former ally. While serving abroad Ellsworth's health declined considerably, and it is believed to have contributed substantially to his decision to step down. Ellsworth was succeeded as chief justice by John Marshall of Virginia, whose own contributions to the legal and political development of the Supreme Court would be immense.

RICHARD L. VINING

References and Further Reading

- Casto, William R. The Supreme Court in the Early Republic: The Chief Justiceships of John Jay and Oliver Ellsworth. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.
- Gerber, Scott D., ed. Seriatim: The Supreme Court Before John Marshall. New York: New York University Press, 1998.
- Goebel, Julius Jr. History of the Supreme Court of the United States. Volume I: Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801. New York: Macmillan Company, 1971.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Hylton v. United States*, 3 Dall. 171 (1796)
- Judiciary Act of 1789, Act of September 24, 1789, 1 Stat. 73
- Marbury v. Madison*, 5 U.S. 137 (1803)
- Sedition Act of 1798, Act of July 14, 1798, 1 Stat. 596
- Ware v. Hylton*, 3 Dall. 199 (1796)

See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386 (1798); Chase, Samuel; Common Law or Statute; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History (1791–1917); Jefferson, Thomas; Judicial Review; Marshall, John; National Security and Freedom of Speech; Natural Law, 18th Century Understanding; Seditious Libel

ELROD v. BURNS, 427 U.S. 347 (1976)

Cook County, Illinois was notorious for patronage. The Democratic Party hired supporters for city and county jobs and required them to work on behalf of its political candidates. When Richard Elrod was elected Cook County sheriff in 1970, he promptly fired several Republican employees of the office. Those fired brought suit under the First Amendment, alleging that they were discharged because they were not Democrats.

The Supreme Court agreed, relying upon its decisions in loyalty oath cases, such as Keyishian v. Board of Regents (1967), which held that conditioning a public job upon political belief was unconstitutional. Firing an employee based on political belief or association amounted to coercion of the individual's freedom of association and could deter others who would like to apply for city jobs from the free exercise of speech and association.

The defendants argued that political patronage was necessary to ensure efficient and loyal employees and to maintain a strong democratic political party system. Applying the high level of review required when government action affects First Amendment rights, the Court rejected this argument. These interests could be served by politically based dismissals of policymaking employees only (defined in Branti v. Finkel [1980] as those where “party affiliation is an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of the public office involved”).

Elrod prohibited political firing, but left political hiring an open question. This was held unconstitutional in Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois (1990). Elrod also invited lawsuits about the reasons employees had been fired and whether they were policymakers and thus exempt from Elrod’s prohibition.

CYNTHIA GRANT BOWMAN

References and Further Reading

- Allswang, John M. Bosses, Machines and Urban Voters. Rev. ed. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986.
- Bowman, Cynthia Grant, ‘We Don’t Want Anybody Sent’: The Death of Patronage Hiring in Chicago, Northwestern University Law Review 86 (1991): 1:57–95.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Branti v. Finkel*, 445 U.S. 507 (1980)
- Keyishian v. Board of Regents*, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)
- Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois*, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)

See also Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980); Political Patronage and the First Amendment; Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990); Unconstitutional Conditions

EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION (1863)

On January 1, 1863 President Abraham Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation, which declared that slaves living in most of the Confederate states were forever free. The Proclamation was certainly one of the most important advances in civil liberties, because it provided for freeing from slavery millions of African Americans. At the same time, from the perspective of slave owners, the proclamation was a huge violation of civil liberties because it took their “property” away from them without any compensation. From the perspective of constitutional law, the Proclamation was extremely problematic. The Constitution prohibited the government from taking private property without compensation. Furthermore, the Constitution protected slavery a variety of ways and the Supreme Court, in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857), had held that slavery was a privileged form of property deserving of special constitutional protection. Finally, it was not at all clear that under the Constitution the president ever had power to unilaterally act in such a way as to deprive citizens of their property.

President Lincoln understood all of these issues, and thus he drafted the Proclamation carefully. He excluded from the Proclamation those portions of the Confederacy, such as New Orleans and parts of Virginia, which were under the control of the United States. In the rest of Confederacy, Lincoln acted in his capacity as commander-in-chief of the Army to emancipate all slave on the grounds they constituted a military asset to those states in rebellion.

By proceeding in this manner, Lincoln avoided a number of constitutional pitfalls. Since he acted as commander-in-chief, he presumably did not need any authorization from Congress. Clearly Lincoln could order the Army to destroy or confiscate the property of Confederates in order to suppress the rebellion. Freeing the slaves was simply another form of destroying property that those in rebellion were using to make war on the United States. Lincoln could plausibly argue that the Constitution was in force where the Confederate government operated. Thus, by limiting the Proclamation to those regions of the United States that were under the control of the Confederates, Lincoln could argue that emancipation was not a “taking of private property” as contemplated in the Fifth Amendment, because the Constitution was not in force in the Confederacy. Alternatively, he could argue that the writ of habeas corpus had been suspended in all of those states in rebellion, and thus the military could seize property (and emancipate slaves) as needed to suppress the rebellion.

Each of these theories was sufficient to justify freeing the slaves of rebel masters while the war was in progress, but it was not clear what would happen to the emancipated slaves when the war ended. Lincoln had some reason to believe that the Supreme Court might overturn the Proclamation, or enforce a judgment against the United States for taking private property without just compensation in violation of the Fifth Amendment. This was especially plausible because the Supreme Court was still dominated by pro-slavery justices, and continued to be until led by Chief Justice Roger B. Taney, the author of the Dred Scott decision. Thus, Lincoln was delighted when Congress passed the Thirteenth Amendment and sent it on to the states for ratification. Once ratified, this Amendment freed all remaining slaves in the nation and prevented any former masters from making any claims on the U.S. government for the value of their emancipated slaves.

The Emancipation Proclamation was the most significant antislavery action by the U.S. government until the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment. The Proclamation freed millions of slaves. That freedom, however, would only be secured as the U.S. Army moved deeper in the South, crushing the rebellion. However, after January 1, 1863, the nature of the Civil War was permanently altered. It was still a war to preserve and restore the Union. But, after that date it was also a war to extend the most fundamental civil liberty—freedom to millions of African Americans who were held in slavery. After Lincoln issued the Proclamation, the U.S. Army became the greatest army of liberation the world had ever known, bringing liberty everywhere it went.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Franklin, John Hope. The Emancipation Proclamation. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1963.
 McPherson, James. Battle Cry of Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Dred Scott v. John F.A. Sandford*, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393 (1857)

EMERGENCY, CIVIL LIBERTIES IN

Discussions of civil liberties in emergency are plagued by the recurrent problem of defining the kind of situation designated by the term “emergency.” According to German jurist Carl Schmitt, sometimes thought of as the theorist of the Third Reich, the “exception”—closely related to the emergency—can only be declared, not defined; hence, “Sovereign is he who decides on the exception.” Justice Stone, concurring in Duncan v. Kahanamoku (1946), a case involving martial law, described “the power which resides in the executive branch of the government to preserve order and insure the public safety in times of emergency, when other branches of the government are unable to function, or their functioning would itself threaten the public safety.” As he explained, “[t]he Executive has broad discretion in determining when the public emergency is such as to give rise to the necessity of martial law, and in adapting it to the need.” While the emergency may coincide with war, it need not do so. Likewise, although foreign relations may be implicated, the emergency may possess a largely domestic compass, as in the case of civil unrest. It may, indeed, be in the nature of the emergency to defy definition except in contradistinction to a “normal” state of affairs. And, in general, in an emergency, the survival of the nation is thought to be at stake. In this respect, the emergency stands in the lineage of the “raison d’état,” or “reason of state,” which designates, according to one formulation, “the doctrine that whatever is required to insure the survival of the state must be done by the individuals responsible for it, no matter how repugnant such an act may be to them in their private capacity as decent and moral men.” Initially derived from Italian political theory, this concept found expression in the Anglo-American context in John Locke’s discussion of prerogative in the Second Treatise of Government. Although economic emergencies have sometimes swept the United States—most notably during the Great Depression—the most prevalent associations with emergency involve the imminent threat of violence.

The main questions that arise in considering emergency situations involve who identifies or constructs the existence of an emergency, and by what means; the scope of extraordinary powers sought to resolve the declared emergency; and the emergency’s duration. As Schmitt’s and Justice Stone’s comments suggest, the executive has traditionally taken charge of designating emergency situations. Some constitutions, like that of Poland, contain explicit provisions concerning emergencies and specify the mechanism by which an emergency is to be announced; that is not the case in the United States. The most relevant constitutional clauses include those articulating Congress’s power to declare war and to call forth the militia (art. I, sec. 8, cls. 11 and 14), and the provision for suspension of the writ of habeas corpus (art. I, sec. 9, cls. 2). Despite the congressional nature of these related powers, the president has, in emergency situations, often issued an executive order concerning the emergency or simply taken what he asserts is necessary action. In the attempt to reduce the likelihood of executive overreaching during and through times of emergency, the constitutions of many other countries, such as Estonia, have granted legislatures a greater role in declaring and limiting the duration of emergencies. Some have argued that this strategy is currently being or should be employed in the United States as well. A proposal put forth by Professor Bruce Ackerman would involve a “supermajoritarian escalator,” under which the president would be given “the power to act unilaterally only for the briefest period—long enough for the legislature to convene and consider the matter, but no longer,” and subsequent action would have to be approved by ever-increasing supermajorities in Congress. Professors John Ferejohn and Pasquale Pasquino assert that a similar reliance on legislative action to delegate emergency powers to the executive has been on the rise internationally, and that a “new model of emergency powers . . . has evolved over the past half century, at least for the advanced or stable democracies.”

A related concern implicates the scope of the emergency powers exercised, and who is authorized to employ them. To the extent that the president acts in an emergency, he may do so either pursuant to a statute or through authority derived directly from particular provisions of Article II of the Constitution. In Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer (1952), involving President Truman’s seizure of the steel mills “to avert a national catastrophe which would inevitably result from a stoppage of steel production” when a strike was threatened during the Korean War, Justice Jackson’s concurrence articulated three categories of presidential action and described the relative legitimacy of each. According to Jackson’s typology, “[w]hen the President acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at its maximum,” while “in absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority,” a “zone of twilight” exists where the president may have concurrent authority with Congress, and, finally, the president’s “power is at its lowest ebb” when he “takes measures incompatible with the expressed or implied will of Congress.” After the events of September 11, 2001, the government has, however, insisted in several instances that Article II of the Constitution grants the president a more extensive overarching power than its individual clauses alone provide. For example, in the case of Yaser Esam Hamdi, a U.S. citizen captured during hostilities in Afghanistan and subsequently held in a naval brig in South Carolina, the government claimed that “the Executive possesses plenary authority to detain [citizens considered “enemy combatants”] pursuant to Article II of the Constitution” (Hamdi v. Rumsfeld [2004]). The extent to which the president can exercise power independent of congressional authorization during times of emergency thus remains subject to dispute. Granting the president greater capacity in emergencies could have an adverse impact on civil liberties because it would diminish the check on executive aggrandizement provided by the constitutional separation of powers.

Tactics employed to deal with the emergency may also directly infringe upon civil liberties through three mechanisms, or a combination of them: legislation granting the government greater powers of surveillance or limiting the freedom of association, executive action contravening or exceeding the scope of statutes designed to protect certain rights, or reduction in the compass of those liberties that are constitutionally based. Historically, noncitizens have been subject to the most dramatic restrictions on their civil liberties, as David Cole has demonstrated in Enemy Aliens, and, with the increasingly international reach of the United States, those located outside the country have suffered more extreme forms of rights deprivation. The judiciary has tended to acquiesce in the political branches’ violation of civil liberties during emergency, either by refraining from vindicating individuals’ rights until after a particular crisis has ended, as in the post-Civil War case Ex parte Milligan (1866), or by upholding the government’s actions on the grounds of necessity, as in the World War II case Korematsu v. United States (1944). Which alternative is worse has been the subject of some dispute. Whereas some commentators—such as Kathleen M. Sullivan—insist that constitutional norms should remain the same during times of emergency, others—such as Mark Tushnet and Oren Gross—maintain that accommodation is the right approach, whether achieved by the Supreme Court’s recognition of a difference between normal and emergency situations or by allowing public officials to take extralegal measures in moments of crisis that the public may or may not subsequently ratify. A recent empirical study by Lee et al. has concluded counterintuitively that emergency does affect judicial decision making, but only with respect to non-war cases.

The right of habeas corpus is the only one that the Constitution explicitly contemplates suspending under certain circumstances. Because of the placement of the Suspension Clause amid the limitations upon Congress’s powers in Article I, scholars and judges have concluded that the legislature alone has the capacity to restrict availability of the writ. The executive branch has not, however, accepted this judgment without resistance. In 1861, towards the beginning of the Civil War, President Lincoln proclaimed a suspension of the writ in certain areas; although Chief Justice Taney, riding circuit, vehemently rejected the constitutionality of this purported suspension, in the 1861 case Ex parte Merryman, the Supreme Court itself never adjudicated the question. Congress subsequently granted the president authority to suspend habeas corpus “during the Rebellion”—an authority that Lincoln rapidly and comprehensively implemented—but simultaneously provided for judicial review of detentions (An Act Relating to Habeas Corpus). More recently, under President George W. Bush, the government contended that the writ was not available to “enemy combatants” or to those detained outside the territorial limits of the United States. The Supreme Court’s opinions in Rasul v. Bush (2004) and Hamdi v. Rumsfeld confirmed respectively, however, that at least a partial right of habeas corpus remained for individuals held at the military base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and that, in general, “a citizen-detainee seeking to challenge his classification as an enemy combatant must receive notice of the factual basis for his classification, and a fair opportunity to rebut the Government’s factual assertions before a neutral decisionmaker.”

Internment has also been employed in a manner comparable to executive branch detention. Subsequent to the bombing of Pearl Harbor, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt issued Executive Order 9066, which excluded Japanese Americans, including citizens, from certain areas of the West Coast, on the grounds of military necessity; Congress soon criminalized failure to obey this directive. Fred Korematsu, a Japanese American, was convicted of violating the order. In its decision on his appeal, the Supreme Court insisted that racial classifications should be subject to strict scrutiny—but that the exclusion of Japanese Americans under emergency circumstances satisfied this searching review. In doing so, Justice Black deferred to the judgment of the “war-making branches” that “exclusion of the whole group was . . . a military imperative” (Korematsu v. United States). Although recognized as one of the most reviled cases that the Supreme Court has ever decided, Korematsu remains good law. At the same time, however, the Court in Ex parte Endo (1944), in language reminiscent of the technique of constitutional avoidance, construed the War Relocation Authority’s continued detention of loyal Japanese Americans—as opposed to their exclusion from particular areas—as exceeding its delegated capacity; the decision effectively coincided with the end of the relocation camps.

The government has infringed on civil liberties in times of emergency in ways short of detention or internment as well. During World War I and the subsequent red scare, as well as the cold war, among other periods of conflict, First Amendment freedoms of speech and association were statutorily curtailed, with the Supreme Court’s partial acquiescence. Commentators have likewise argued that the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition against unlawful searches and seizures has been relaxed during times of emergency. The most notable recent examples include the expansion of various forms of surveillance under the USA Patriot Act, passed just days after the attacks of September 11, 2001, as well as President Bush’s secret program for collecting data on telephone calls routed through the United States.

Finally, measures taken during emergency have often curtailed the cluster of rights surrounding the trial of an accused individual. During both the Civil War and World War II, the executive established military commissions and tried various individuals under these tribunals, thus circumventing a number of due process guarantees, including that of trial by jury. In ruling on the constitutionality of these commissions, the Supreme Court held that, although the government cannot subject civilians to trial by military tribunal when the courts are actually open (Ex parte Milligan), it may so prosecute allegedly unlawful combatants, whether citizens or not (Ex parte Quirin [1942]). The “war on terrorism” has sparked renewed debate about the constitutionality, advisability, and legality under international law of trial by military commission. While the Bush administration initially promoted the notion of trying al-Qaeda operatives and other suspected terrorists by military tribunal, it soon resorted to a strategy of indefinite detention at Guantánamo Bay and elsewhere. Language from the plurality’s opinion in Hamdi suggested that the government might meet the due process standards for establishing that an individual should be identified as an “enemy combatant” “by an appropriately authorized and constituted military tribunal.” The Hamdan v. Rumsfeld (2005) case—granted certiorari during the October 2005 term—likewise concerns the validity under domestic and international law of a trial by military commission. The Supreme Court has, however, declined to answer the question of whether the government can, consistent with the public’s First Amendment right of access to certain types of judicial proceedings, close so-called “special interest” deportation hearings (North Jersey Media Group v. Ashcroft [2003]).

Finally, the duration of emergency—or even of war—may have implications for its effect on civil liberties as well. To avoid the situation of permanent or semipermanent emergency—such as occurred in South Africa under apartheid—many countries’ constitutions prescribe temporal limitations upon declared emergencies. The current “war on terrorism” does not, however, possess a well-defined endpoint. Nor is it likely under the Court’s current construction of political question doctrine that the question of the termination of this—or any war—would be subject to judicial review (Baker v. Carr [1962]).

BERNADETTE MEYLER

References and Further Reading

- Ackerman, Bruce, The Emergency Constitution, Yale Law Journal 113 (2004): 5:1029–1092.
- Amar, Akhil Reed, and Vikram David Amar, The New Regulation Allowing Federal Agents to Monitor Attorney–Client Conversations: Why It Threatens Fourth Amendment Values, Connecticut Law Review 34 (2002): 4L1163–1167.
- Cole, David. Enemy Aliens. New York: New Press, 2003.

- , The New McCarthyism: Repeating History in the War on Terrorism, Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 38 (2003): 1:1–30.
- Dauber, Michele Landis, The Sympathetic State, Law and History Review 23. (2005): 2:387–442.
- Detroit Free Press v. Ashcroft*, 303 F.3d 681 (6th Cir. 2002).
- Ellmann, Stephen. In a Time of Trouble: Law and Liberty in South Africa's State of Emergency. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Epstein, Lee, Daniel E. Ho, Gary King, and Jeffrey A. Segal, The Supreme Court During Crisis: How War Affects Only Non-War Cases, New York University Law Review 80. (2005): 1:1–116.
- Ferejohn, John, and Pasquino, Pasquale, The Law of the Exception: A Typology of Emergency Powers, International Journal of Constitutional Law 2 (2004): 2:210–239.
- Friedrich, Carl J. Constitutional Reason of State: The Survival of the Constitutional Order. Providence, RI: Brown University Press, 1957.
- Gross, Oren, Chaos and Rules: Should Responses to Violent Crises Always Be Constitutional? Yale Law Journal 112 (2003): 5:1011–1034.
- Gudridge, Patrick O., Remember Endo? Harvard Law Review 116 (2003): 7:1933–1970.
- Home Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Blaisdell*, 290 U.S. 398 (1934).
- Koh, Harold Hongju, The Case Against Military Commissions, American Journal of International Law 96 (2002): 2:337–344.
- Lichtblau, Eric. “Officials Want to Expand Review of Domestic Spying.” New York Times, December 25, 2005.
- Locke, John. Two Treatises of Government. Edited by Peter Laslett. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Mark Tushnet, Defending Korematsu? Reflections on Civil Liberties in Wartime, Wisconsin Law Review 2003 (2003): 273–307.
- Mayer, Jane. “Outsourcing Torture: The Secret History of America’s ‘Extraordinary Rendition’ Program.” New Yorker, February 14 and 21, 2005.
- Posner, Eric A., and Vermeule, Adrian, Accommodating Emergencies, Stanford Law Review 56 (2003): 3:605–44.
- Reed, Christopher. “Are American Liberties At Risk?” Harvard Magazine, January–February 2002: 100–1 (summarizing Kathleen M. Sullivan’s Tanner Lecture on “War, Peace, and Civil Liberties”).
- Rehnquist, William H. All the Laws but One: Civil Liberties in Wartime. New York: Vintage Books, 2000.
- Rostow, Eugene, The Japanese American Cases—A Disaster, Yale Law Journal 54 (1945): 3:489–533.
- Rotenberg, Marc, Privacy and Secrecy After September 11, Minnesota Law Review 86 (2002): 6:1115–1136.
- Schmitt, Carl. Political Theology: Four Chapters on the Concept of Sovereignty. Trans. George Schwab. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1985.
- Stone, Geoffrey R. Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime from the Sedition Act of 1798 to the War on Terrorism. New York: W.W. Norton & Co., 2004.
- Tribe, Lawrence H., and Gudridge, Patrick O., The Anti-Emergency Constitution, Yale Law Journal 113 (2004): 8:1801–1870.
- Wedgwood, Ruth, Al Qaeda, Terrorism, and Military Commissions, American Journal of International Law 96 (2002): 2:328–337.
- Whitehead, John W., and Aden, Steven H., Forfeiting ‘Enduring Freedom’ for ‘Homeland Security’: A

Constitutional Analysis of the USA PATRIOT Act and the Justice Department’s Anti-Terrorism Initiatives, American University Law Review 51 (2002): 6:1081–1133.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Albanian Constitution of 1998, Article 173
- “An Act Relating to Habeas Corpus,” 12 Stat. at Large, 755 (1863)
- Baker v. Carr*, 369 U.S. 186, 213 (1962)
- Constitution of Poland of 1997, Article 228
- Duncan v. Kahanamoku*, 327 U.S. 304 (1946)
- Estonian Constitution of 1992, Articles 65, 129
- Ex parte Endo*, 323 U.S. 283, 287 (1944)
- Executive Order Concerning the Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism, 66 Federal Register 57 (November 13, 2001): 833
- Hamdan v. Rumsfeld*, 415 F.3d 33 (D.C. Cir. 2005), cert. granted 126 S.Ct. 622 (November 7, 2005)
- Hamdi v. Rumsfeld*, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)
- Korematsu v. United States*, 323 U.S. 214, 215–16 (1944)
- Ex parte Merryman*, 17 F. Cas. 144 (1861)
- Ex parte Milligan*, 71 U.S. 2 (1866)
- North Jersey Media Group v. Ashcroft*, 308 F.3d 198 (3d Cir. 2002), cert. denied 538 U.S. 1056 (May 27, 2003)
- Ex parte Quirin*, 317 U.S. 1 (1942)
- Rasul v. Bush*, 542 U.S. 466 (2004)
- USA Patriot Act of 2001, Pub. L. No. 107-56, 115 Stat. 272 (2001)
- Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer*, 343 U.S. 579 (1952)

EMERSON, THOMAS IRWIN (1907–1991)

Thomas Irwin Emerson was a noted legal scholar and civil rights and civil liberties advocate. Born in Passaic, New Jersey, he graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Yale College (1928), attended Yale Law School and was editor-in-chief of the Yale Law Journal. While at the law school he studied under, among others, Robert Maynard Hutchins, and was a friend and classmate of William O. Douglas. He received his law degree in 1931.

A few years after graduating from law school, Emerson worked at the National Recovery Administration, on the National Labor Relations Board, and in the Attorney General’s Office. During World War II, he then served as general counsel for the Office of Economic Stabilization and for the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion. In 1948 he ran for governor of Connecticut as the People’s Party candidate, and in 1950–1951 was the president of the National Lawyers Guild.

Emerson served on the Yale law faculty from 1946 to 1976; in 1955 he was named the Lines Professor of Law. He authored or edited four books and numerous articles, including an autobiographical work entitled, Young Lawyer for the New Deal: An Insider's Memoir of the Roosevelt Years (1991).

Civil Rights

As a young lawyer Emerson was employed at Engelhard, Pollak, Pitcher and Stern. Working with Walter Pollak—one of the lead lawyers who argued Gitlow v. New York (1925) and Whitney v. California (1927)—Emerson was on the legal team that successfully appealed the convictions of the Scottsboro Boys. In that case eight black teenagers were sentenced to death for the alleged rapes of two white women. Emerson and his colleagues challenged the convictions on Fourteenth Amendment grounds, arguing that due process required the appointment of counsel by state courts for indigent defendants in capital cases. The Court in Powell v. Alabama (1932) agreed by a seven-to-two margin, thereby launching a new era in civil rights law.

Early in January of 1950, Emerson filed an important amicus brief—joined by Dean Erwin Griswold of Harvard and Professor John P. Frank of Yale, among others—in Sweatt v. Painter (1950) on behalf of 188 law professors. The brief defended the claim of Heman Marion Sweatt that he had been denied equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment when the University of Texas Law School refused to admit him on the basis of race; instead it referred him to a newly created state law school for blacks. The brief also challenged the viability of Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) and argued that inequality was inherent in segregation. The Court, in a nine-to-zero decision, held that the separate systems of education were not equal and sustained Sweatt's claim, thus mandating his admission to the University of Texas Law School. Both the brief and the holding helped to set the stage for the Court's ruling in Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

Emerson co-edited (initially with David Haber and then with Haber and Norman Dorsen, et al.) Political and Civil Rights in the United States (1967–1979), the first casebook of its kind and a voluminous treatment of the subject that included the reproduction of many original documents.

Freedom of Expression

Throughout his life Thomas Emerson was a staunch defender of freedom of expression. As early as 1948 he co-authored (with David Helfeld) a scholarly 143-page article entitled “Loyalty Among Government Employees,” in which he argued that government loyalty programs were repressive and violated the First Amendment. Two years later Emerson openly condemned the University of California regents for firing 157 university employees suspected of being communists or communist sympathizers. During a “Bill of Rights Conference” in New York (July 17, 1949) Emerson, an active member of the American Civil Liberties Union's (ACLU) Free Speech Committee, strongly defended a resolution calling for restoring civil liberties for members of the Socialist Workers Party who had been caught up in government loyalty sweeps. Morris Ernst, a noted ACLU lawyer, and others took a different view and defeated the resolution.

In 1957, Professor Emerson successfully represented Paul Sweezy, a university teacher, in the Supreme Court case involving legislative inquiries concerning his ties to the Progressive Party and about a lecture he gave on socialism. The petitioner, who declined to respond to such inquiries, prevailed on due process grounds (Sweezy v. New Hampshire [1957]).

Emerson's most enduring contribution to First Amendment law was his widely respected book, The System of Freedom of Expression (1970), which grew out of an earlier work entitled Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment (1966), which in part was based on a 1963 article published in the Yale Law Journal. Tracking in format the presentation offered by Zechariah Chafee in Free Speech in the United States (1941), Emerson's 750-page tome offered a comprehensive survey and analysis of nineteen broadly defined areas of free speech law.

In The System of Freedom of Expression, Emerson argued that the “system of freedom of expression in a democratic society rests upon four main premises:” (1) “freedom of expression is essential as a means of assuring individual self-fulfillment,” (2) “freedom of expression is an essential process for advancing knowledge and discovering truth,” (3) “freedom of expression is essential for participation in decision making by all members of society,” and (4) “freedom of expression is a method of achieving a more adaptable and hence a more stable community, of maintaining the precarious balance between healthy cleavage and necessary consensus.” Hence, for Emerson, First Amendment freedom was “essential to all other freedoms.” It was, he stressed, “a good in itself, or at least an essential element in a good society.”

While not entirely subscribing to either the Black or Douglas “absolutist” approaches to the First Amendment, Emerson was highly critical of the Supreme Court's ad hoc balancing and clear-and-present-danger tests. His presumptively protective theory of expression was based, in meaningful part, on the “distinction between ‘expression’ and ‘action’ and the difference in degree of social control allowed over each.” Thus, the more expression was actually “linked to action” or the more it had the “same immediate impact as action,” the more it became a candidate for government regulation. Absent such direct consequences linked to harmful actions, Emerson’s theory would protect expression.

One of his later writings on the First Amendment was his 1983 article “Freedom of the Press under the Burger Court.” He wrote, “The Burger Court has taken a ‘crabbed view’ of the First Amendment and has exhibited a ‘disturbing insensitivity’ to the role of the press. In doing so, it has significantly reduced the protections afforded the press by the First Amendment.” The Burger Court’s press rulings—reflected in cases such as Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. (1974, libel) and Branzburg v. Hayes (1972, reporter’s privilege)—he concluded, “bode ill for the future.”

Right to Privacy

Emerson’s greatest achievement as a lawyer was his victory in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), a case he argued in the Supreme Court. Emerson represented the petitioners, Estelle Griswold and Dr. Thomas Buxton, who had been prosecuted under a state law that banned the use and distribution of contraceptives, even to married couples. The Court ruled seven-to-two in favor of the petitioners. In an opinion by Justice Douglas, it was declared that the Connecticut statute violated the right of marital privacy deemed within the penumbra of specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights and hence protected under the Fourteenth Amendment. The ruling thus foreshadowed the holding in Roe v. Wade (1973), the landmark abortion case.

Women and Equality

Eleven months before the equal rights amendment’s (ERA) final approval by Congress, Emerson co-authored “The Equal Rights Amendment: A Constitutional Basis for Equal Rights for Women.” The 113-page article (in support of the ERA) offered an authoritative analysis of the probable impact of the proposed amendment. Several years later, in November 1977, Emerson testified before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee concerning the ERA. Taking issue with his Yale Law School colleague

Charles L. Black, Emerson argued that Congress could constitutionally extend the ratification period of the proposed amendment by a simple majority vote rather than by a two-thirds vote of each house. Agreeing with Emerson, in 1978 Congress by a 233-to-189 vote extended the ratification period by five years, though to no avail.

During that period, Emerson also wrote the foreword to Sexual Harassment of Working Women (1979) by Catharine A. MacKinnon, a friend and former student. “Sexual harassment,” he began, “has been one of the most pervasive but carefully ignored features of our national life.” Emerson’s concern about this problem reflected his parallel concerns about “real” equality:

MacKinnon undertakes to give a new dimension to the Equal Protection Clause . . . [She] argues that the focus in equal protection law should not be on the ‘differences,’ or whether the differences are ‘arbitrary’ rather than ‘rational,’ but upon the basic issue of inequality. In other words, the courts should consider whether the treatment by the law results in systematic ‘disadvantage’ because of group status . . . Such an approach deserves serious consideration.

That consideration, however, did not prevent him from taking exception to Professor MacKinnon’s claim that there should be civil law remedies for women who suffered harm from the alleged effects of pornography. Writing in the Yale Law and Policy Review (1984), Emerson declared: “My claim arises not from Professor MacKinnon’s statement of the problem but from her proposals for a solution.” While he granted that “pornography plays a major part in establishing and maintaining male supremacy,” he also believed that if MacKinnon’s proposals were tested against First Amendment law, “there is no way her solution of the pornography problem can be sustained.” He concluded on an emphatic note: “Any attempt to deal with the problem of pornography through government suppression would involve a dangerous evisceration of the First Amendment.”

RONALD K. L. COLLINS

References and Further Reading

- Chafee, Zechariah Jr. Free Speech in the United States. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1941.
- Dorsen, Norman, Thomas Irwin Emerson, Yale Law Journal 85 (1976): 463.
- Emerson, Thomas Irwin., Loyalty Among Government Employees, Yale Law Journal 58 (1948): 1.
- . Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment. New York: Random House, 1966.
- . The System of Freedom of Expression. New York: Random House, 1970.

- . “Freedom of the Press under the Burger Court.” In The Burger Court, edited by Vince Blasi. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983.
- . Pornography and the First Amendment: A Reply to Professor MacKinnon, Yale Law and Policy Review 3 (1984): 130–143.
- . Young Lawyer for the New Deal: An Insider’s Memoir of the Roosevelt Years. Savage, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1991.
- . The Writings of Thomas Irwin Emerson, Yale Law Journal 101 (1991): 327.
- Emerson, Thomas I., Barbara Brown, Gail Frank, and Ann Freedman, The Equal Rights Amendment: A Constitutional Basis for Equal Rights for Women, Yale Law Journal 80 (1971): 871.
- Emerson, Thomas I., David Haber, Norman Dorsen, eds. Political and Civil Rights in the United States. 1st–4th eds. 2 vols. Boston: Little, Brown, 1967–1979.
- MacKinnon, Catharine A., with Thomas I. Emerson. Sexual Harassment of Working Women. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1979.
- Yale Law Library. Thomas Irwin Emerson: 1907–1991. Memorial Booklet. New Haven, CT: Yale Law Library, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Branzburg v. Hayes*, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)
- Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Gertz v. Robert Welch Inc.*, 418 U.S. 323 (1974)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
- Powell v. Alabama*, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Sweatt v. Painter*, 339 U.S. 629 (1950)
- Sweezy v. New Hampshire*, 354 U.S. 234 (1957)
- Whitney v. California*, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES v. SMITH, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)

This is currently the leading case on the scope of the First Amendment’s prohibition against laws that “prohibit the free exercise” of religion. The case attracted little notice during its prolonged consideration by the Court. However, in its opinion, the Court’s majority announced an entirely new doctrine of free exercise, reinterpreting or discarding much seemingly settled doctrine and sharply limiting the effect of the Free Exercise Clause. In Smith, the Court held that “neutral, generally applicable laws” do not violate the clause even when they limit or entirely prohibit the practice of minority religions. The clause, the Court said, is violated only when government intentionally targets religious practice. The result has since been subject to withering academic and public criticism, all the more intense because the Court gave no hint to the parties or the public that it was considering abandoning precedent and fashioning a new rule. Smith remains controversial today, and has inspired no fewer than three federal statutes designed to overturn its result in whole or part.

The case arose in 1984, when a private, government-funded alcohol and drug abuse treatment agency in Roseburg, Oregon, fired two of its employees, Alfred Leo Smith, Jr. and Galen W. Black, because they had participated in the tipi ceremony of the Native American Church and had consumed peyote as part of the ceremony. The Native American Church, a loose federation of congregations and church bodies, is the main representative in the United States of peyotism, the religious worship of the hallucinogenic peyote cactus. Indian lore and anthropological records suggest that people in the New World have been making ceremonial use of peyote for well over 10,000 years. In the nineteenth century, peyotism assumed its present shape in the United States, and during the late twentieth century public health specialists studying native people began to suggest that the ritual and peyote itself were useful methods of treating alcoholism and drug addiction, at least among indigenous populations. It was this possibility that led Galen Black, a white man and a recovering alcoholic, to participate in a tipi ceremony in late 1983. When his employers found out that he had consumed peyote at the ceremony, they dismissed him, suggesting that the use of peyote constituted “drug abuse” and “relapse” into substance abuse. Al Smith, a Klamath Indian with many years of experience with the church, then also consumed peyote to protest against what he saw as disrespect for Native-American traditions. The agency fired him as well, and the Employment Division of the State Department of Human Resources denied both men unemployment compensation, alleging that they had been dismissed for work-related “misconduct.”

The two men brought separate lawsuits against the division in the Oregon State courts, and in 1986 the Oregon Supreme Court held that the denial of unemployment compensation violated the Free Exercise Clause. The state court relied on a precedent called Sherbert v. Verner (1963), in which the Court had ordered the State of South Carolina to pay unemployment compensation to a Seventh-Day Adventist who refused a job because it required Saturday work, forbidden by her faith. The Oregon Court reasoned that the two cases were equivalent, even though Oregon law technically forbade the use of peyote by anyone, even for religious reasons.

The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari, vacated the state court opinion, and remanded the case (Employment Division v. Smith [1988], Smith I). The Court majority ordered the state court to determine whether religious use of peyote violated state law. If so, the majority suggested, this fact might distinguish the case from Sherbert. On remand, however, the state court simply stated that Oregon law did not appear to provide a religious exemption to the prohibition on peyote. Citing its own rule against advisory opinions, it declined to consider whether the state law violated the Oregon Constitution. Instead, it reaffirmed its holding that Sherbert required payment to Smith and Black as a matter of federal constitutional law. Once again, the state petitioned the Supreme Court for certiorari, which was granted in 1989. Representatives of the Native American Church, fearing the effects of a loss, attempted to negotiate a settlement. Oregon agreed, provided that Smith and Black would return the compensation they had received. Smith refused, and the case went forward.

Smith II was briefed and argued by both parties and all amici as a case about the proper application of Sherbert. In that case, the Court had suggested that state laws that “burden[ed]” religious practice could pass First Amendment muster only if they furthered a “compelling state interest.” The State of Oregon argued that its public policy of refusing any exemptions to its drug laws was a “compelling interest”; Smith and Black argued that, because the state had not actually prosecuted Smith and Black, the only “state interest” present in this case was the state’s desire to conserve funds in its unemployment compensation fund—an interest the Sherbert Court had already rejected as less than “compelling.”

When the Court announced its opinion in Smith II, shock waves traveled around the religious community. Without giving any hint to anyone that it was considering doing so, the Court had decided, in an opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia, to scrap the Sherbert rule and replace it with a new rule, hitherto unknown, that was significantly less protective of religious minorities who found themselves in conflict with majority beliefs. Unless such a minority plaintiff could show that the law burdening her belief had been passed with the purpose or intention of discriminating on religious grounds, the Free Exercise Clause would provide no protection at all. “Neutral, generally applicable laws” that unintentionally gutted minority religions were not subject to any heightened scrutiny by the Court. Minorities facing such “incidental” burdens were directed to seek exemptions from the political process rather than from courts. In order to reach this result, Justice Scalia reinterpreted much of the Court’s prior free exercise jurisprudence as dealing with “hybrid cases,” involving two or more provisions of the Bill of Rights, rather than free exercise alone. He also relied heavily upon the Court’s decision in Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940), one of the Court’s more reviled precedents—and one that had been overturned by West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943), only three years after it was decided. Justice Scalia further explained that the growing religious diversity of the American people meant that “we cannot afford the luxury of deeming presumptively invalid, as applied to the religious objector, every regulation of conduct that does not protect an interest of the highest order.”

Religious groups across the political and theological spectrum mobilized in opposition to the decision. In 1993, Congress passed the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), which directed the courts to apply the Sherbert test to any state or federal law or regulation that burdened a religious practice. (Although seeking to reverse the doctrine of Smith, the religious coalition deliberately excluded peyotists and cooperated in the creation of legislative history suggesting that a prohibition of peyotism might pass the “compelling interest” test.) In passing RFRA, Congress relied on the enforcement clause in section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. In 1997, the Supreme Court, in City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores (1997), held that RFRA, as applied to states, exceeded Congress’s power under section 5. In response, Congress in 2000 enacted the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, which made use of the commerce and spending powers to impose the “compelling interest” test on state actions that burdened religious organizations or persons in zoning and prison-discipline cases. To date, the new act has been upheld by the federal courts of appeals.

Meanwhile, the Native American Church, with the assistance of Sen. Daniel Inouye, persuaded Congress in 1994 to pass the American Indian Religious Freedom Act Amendments (AIRFAA). AIRFAA prohibits the federal or state governments from outlawing the use of peyote by Native Americans as part of a traditional native religion, or from denying native peyotists state benefits because of their religious use of peyote.

The Smith rule, however, remains the Court’s statement of the constitutional scope of the Free Exercise Clause. Justice David Souter, who joined the Court after its decision in Smith, has criticized the rule as leaving free exercise doctrine “in tension with itself,” and Justice O’Connor, who concurred in the result in Smith but defended the Sherbert rule, has also called for Smith to be overruled.

GARRETT EPPS

Cases and Statutes Cited

American Indian Religious Freedom Act Amendments, 1994, 42 U.S.C. sec. 1996a

City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
Employment Division v. Smith, 485 U.S. 660 (1988)
(Smith I)
Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 42 U.S.C. sec. 2000bb
Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42
U.S.C. sec. 2000cc et seq
Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624
(1943)

ENGEL v. VITALE, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)

One of the most controversial issues involving the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment is the constitutionality of prayer in public schools. Public school prayer had been a common feature in government-operated schools throughout the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth century, but in 1962 the Court found the practice unconstitutional in Engel v. Vitale.

In Engel, the Court considered the constitutionality of the following prayer which the state of New York required to be said aloud in every public school classroom each day: "Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and we beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers and our Country." A group of parents brought suit, alleging that the recitation of this official prayer in the public schools was contrary to their beliefs and religious practices and violated the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment.

Although New York intended the prayer to be nonsectarian and observance on the part of students to be voluntary (no student was compelled to say the prayer), the Court, with Justice Hugo Black writing, held that the state-mandated prayer offended the Establishment Clause. The Court determined that the Establishment Clause barred more than simply the preference of one religion over another; it also required that the government remain neutral between religion and nonreligion. The Court found it irrelevant that objecting students were permitted to leave the classroom during the recitation of the prayer:

The Establishment Clause . . . does not depend upon any showing of direct governmental compulsion and is violated by the enactment of laws which establish an official religion whether those laws operate directly to coerce non-observing individuals or not When the power, prestige and financial support of government is placed behind a particular religious belief, the indirect coercive pressure upon religious minorities to conform to the prevailing officially approved religion is plain.

The Court made an appeal to history to justify its position:

The history of governmentally established religion, both in England and in this country, showed that whenever government had allied itself with one particular form of religion, the inevitable result had been that it had incurred the hatred, disrespect and even contempt of those who held contrary beliefs.

In a separate concurrence, Justice William Douglas conceded that a "religion is not established in the usual sense merely by letting those who choose to do so to say the prayer that the public school teacher leads." But Douglas was troubled by the fact that New York had financed a religious exercise and had thereby inserted "a divisive influence into our communities." To Douglas, "the First Amendment leaves the Government in a position not of hostility to religion but of neutrality The philosophy is that if government interferes in matters spiritual, it will be a divisive force."

Justice Potter Stewart was the lone dissenter in Engel (Justices Frankfurter and White did not participate in the decision). Stewart concluded that by requiring the recitation of the prayer, New York had not "established an 'official religion' in violation of the Constitution." Rather, argued Stewart, New York had merely recognized the deeply entrenched and highly cherished spiritual traditions of our Nation—traditions which come down to us from those who almost two hundred years ago avowed their 'firm Reliance on the Protection of divine Providence' [quoting the Declaration of Independence] when they proclaimed the freedom and independence of this brave new world.

The Court's decision in Engel decision produced widespread opposition in the United States. Justice Tom Clark, who joined the majority in Engel, took the unusual step of defending the decision in a public speech in which he emphasized the narrowness of the Court's holding. In response to Engel, many efforts were launched in Congress to secure a constitutional amendment that would permit school prayer. Although enjoying broad support, all of these efforts failed. Since Engel, the Court has not departed from its view that public school prayer, composed by the state and led by school officials, is unconstitutional. The following year, in Abington School District v. Schempp (1963), the Court expanded on the Engel holding by finding state-endorsed prayer also unconstitutional; Schempp involved the recitation of the Lord's Prayer in the public schools. Subsequent legal debates have centered on the constitutionality of moments of silence or prayer by private persons in public schools. In every such case, the Supreme Court has found the public school prayer in question unconstitutional. But even today, Engel remains contentious for many Americans and is properly described as one of the most controversial Supreme Court decisions of the twentieth century.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

Stone, Geoffrey R., In Opposition to the School Prayer Amendment, University of Chicago Law Review 50 (1983): 823–848.

Sutherland, Arthur E. Jr., Establishment According to Engel, Harvard Law Review 76 (1962): 25–62.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)

See also Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Prayer in Public Schools

ENGLISH BILL OF RIGHTS, 1689

The Bill of Rights was the most important document of the Glorious Revolution, and constituted the core of the Revolution settlement. Among the primary causes of the revolution was conflict over whether James II possessed “dispensing power,” or prerogative to absolve a person from the duty to obey a particular law, and if he could thereby exercise the legislative power without consent of Parliament. After James II fled to France, William of Orange convened a convention Parliament to reestablish the government. A committee designed to resolve the issue of succession drew up a Declaration of Rights, which was to comprise the bulk of the Bill of Rights (the exclusion of Roman Catholics and spouses of Roman Catholics from the throne was included in the bill but not the declaration). However, the declaration needed the committee’s approval, the support of a majority of both houses of Parliament and the acquiescence of William: bargains and compromises had to be struck, among them that James could not be accused of violating a contract, and that the monarch could exercise dispensing power only with consent of Parliament. The Bill of Rights was enacted on December 16, 1689; in 1701, the Act of Settlement, an “Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject,” further strengthened Parliament against the monarchy. Beyond clarifying monarchical authority and situating legislative power with the king and both houses of Parliament, the Bill of Rights included among its provisions that “raising or keeping a standing army” in peacetime required parliamentary consent; that Protestant subjects “may have arms for their defense suitable to the conditions and as allowed by law;” that “excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted;” that parliamentary debate ought to be free; and that the subjects possessed the right to petition the king and the right of jury trials.

Although the English Bill of Rights certainly was part of the Framers’ intellectual background, scholars disagree about its significance: whereas some have highlighted the similarities between the two bills of rights, others have held that the English experience was obviously not taken by the Americans to be authoritative. Nevertheless, comparing the two texts helps to illuminate some of the American framers’ choices both to reflect and to deviate from this earlier document. Two recent controversies in American constitutional interpretation have focused attention on the proper understanding and the degree of influence of the English Bill of Rights on the American Constitution.

Remarkably, at least since Weems v. United States (1910), some of the most salient Eighth Amendment cases have focused at least in part on the question of whether the English Bill of Rights granted a right to proportionate punishment. The opinions in Furman v. Georgia (1972), in particular, debate the influence of the tenth section of the English Bill of Rights at substantial length; notably, Justice Thurgood Marshall’s concurrence featured a noteworthy discussion of the origins of the provision. Justice Lewis Powell’s dissent in Rummel v. Estelle (1980) suggested that English constitutional law was deeply concerned about disproportionality, and argued that this held enduring importance for Eighth Amendment jurisprudence even in noncapital cases. Further, Powell’s majority opinion in Solem v. Helm (1983) located a right to proportionate punishment in the English Bill of Rights. However, Justice Potter Stewart argued that the Framers focused on prohibiting torture rather than proportionality in his opinion in Gregg v. Georgia (1976), as did Burger in his dissent to Solem v. Helm (1983). This view was echoed in Harmelin v. Michigan (1991), in which Justice Antonin Scalia argued that the “cruel and unusual punishments” provision was not intended to forbid disproportionate sanctions.

Historical investigations of the English Bill of Rights have also shaped recent Second Amendment jurisprudence. Historian Joyce Lee Malcolm has recently argued that the seventh article of the English Bill of Rights granted Protestants an individual right to bear arms, and that the Framers had this provision in mind when they drafted the Second Amendment. Both Scalia (in Matter of Interpretation) and Judge Samuel Cummings, in United States v. Emerson (1999), have cited Malcolm’s work in this context.

Although some prominent historians have challenged Malcolm's understanding of the English Bill of Rights, as well as the claim that the seventh article influenced the Framers, the debate has generated fresh interest in the legacy of the English Bill of Rights for American constitutionalism.

MELISSA SCHWARTZBERG

References and Further Reading

- Granucci, Anthony, 'Nor Cruel and Unusual Punishments Inflicted': The Original Meaning, California Law Review 57 (1969): 839.
- Maitland, F.W. Constitutional History of England. Delanco, NJ: Legal Classics Library, 2000.
- Malcolm, Joyce Lee. To Keep and Bear Arms: The Origin of an Anglo-American Right. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Scalia, Antonin. A Matter of Interpretation: Federal Courts and the Law. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Schworer, Lois, Symposium on the Second Amendment: Fresh Looks: To Hold and Bear Arms: The English Perspective, Chicago-Kent Law Review 76 (2000): 26.
- Weston, Corinne Comstock, and Janelle Renfrow Greenberg. Subjects and Sovereigns: The Grand Controversy over Legal Sovereignty in Stuart England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- An Act Declaring the Rights and Liberties of the Subject and Settling the Succession of the Crown. (English Bill of Rights, 1689). 1 Gul. & Mar., sess. 2, c. 2. In Act for the Further Limitation of the Crown, and Better Securing the Rights and Liberties of the Subject (Act of Settlement, 1701). 12 Gul. III, c. 2. In Andrew Browning, ed., English Historical Documents, 1660–1714. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953
- Browning, Andrew, ed., English Historical Documents, 1660–1714. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. <http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/england.htm>
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
- Harmelin v. Michigan*, 501 U.S. 957 (1991)
- Rummel v. Estelle*, 445 U.S. 263 (1980)
- Solem v. Helm*, 463 U.S. 277 (1983)
- United States v. Emerson*, 46 F Supp. 598 (N.D. Tex. 1999)
- Weems v. United States*, 217 U.S. 349 (1910)

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII); English Tradition of Civil Liberties; Right to Bear Arms (II)

ENGLISH TOLERATION ACT

A 1689 Act of Parliament granted increased religious freedom for Protestants whose beliefs or practices did not conform (hence, nonconformists) to the national Church of England. The act allowed dissenters separate places of worship, as well as their own preachers and teachers.

Of the many issues taken up by the Convention Parliament at the height of the Glorious Revolution in January 1689, none proved more difficult than settlement in the church. Although historians disagree regarding the depth of political division within English society at the end of the seventeenth century, few doubt the magnitude of religious tensions throughout the Stuart period. Indeed, religious loyalties shaped the political affiliations that caused the Glorious Revolution. Just as England wrestled over royal prerogative and Parliamentary rule, Tories versus Whigs, so too was the nation having to choose between the established church and nonconforming Protestantism, Anglicans versus Dissenters. Dissent had escalated during previous periods of toleration in a way that generated grave concern among Anglicans (a term describing members of the Church of England that really only entered common usage in the nineteenth century). Furthermore, religious fervor was easily politicized, rendering dissent against the church equivalent to dissent against the state. It was no small coincidence that Tories favored royal prerogative to the same degree that Whigs feared arbitrary rule, nor that the former tended to be Anglicans while the latter accepted dissent. A significant distrust of centralized power united politics and religion.

The rash of Protestant sectarianism that fomented during Cromwell's Commonwealth in the 1650s (for instance, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Quakers) gave way to the post-Restoration discord among three main camps: separatists who dissented against, and desired toleration from, the established church; hard-line Anglicans who refused to concede anything to anyone; and Presbyterians who were open to compromise, namely a settlement with Anglicans that did not include toleration for separatists. Despite the fact that Protestant Dissenters constituted less than 6 percent of the total English population, their influence was disproportionately large. Parliament was pressured to consider three statutory alternatives relating to the Church of England: abolition of the sacramental oath required of office holders (mandated by the Test and Corporation Acts of 1661 and 1673); the incorporation of moderate dissenters (known as "comprehension"); and complete freedom of worship, including even the more radical dissenters (toleration). These proposals represented increasing levels of challenge to Anglican supremacy; each threatened the status quo.

In 3,100 words and nineteen paragraphs, the act did not repeal any laws relating to religion per se, nor did it exempt anyone from the obligation to tithe for the established church. On the other hand, certain dissenting practices would henceforth be tolerated, but only for “certified” Protestants willing to sign loyalty oaths. The act makes repeated mention of these professions of loyalty, demonstrating the insecurity still prevalent within both the political realm and the Church of England. Future tolerance was predicated upon an oath “to be true and faithful to King William and queen Mary and . . . abhor, detest, and renounce . . . any authority of the see of Rome.” Although comprehension never passed and toleration did not extend to non-Christians, Quakers, or Catholics, Parliament granted nonconforming Protestants outside the Church of England the freedom to worship in their own meetinghouses under their own leaders.

The Toleration Act gained royal assent in May 1689, thus becoming one of the most important elements of the Revolution settlement. Through the act, Parliament demonstrated that it had statutory authority stretching beyond royal prerogative; it also put an end to Anglican hegemony as it liberalized religious practice. In the first year after passage of the act, hundreds of non-Anglican places of worship were licensed; two decades later, parishes of the Church of England outnumbered other Protestant meeting places by fewer than four to one.

R. OWEN WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

- Harris, Tim. Politics under the Later Stuarts, 1660–1715. London: Longman Group, 1993.
 Hoppit, Julian. A Land of Liberty? England 1689–1727. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

ENGLISH TRADITION OF CIVIL LIBERTIES

The Bill of Rights in the U.S. Constitution, which has been critical in defining the civil liberties enjoyed by Americans, reflects the influence of political struggles that occurred in seventeenth-century England. Indeed, the roots of American liberty lie in the constitutional conflicts that pitted Parliament against the English monarch and defenders of England’s “ancient liberties” against attempts by the Stuart kings to exercise unlimited executive power. The gradual resolution of this conflict, often referred to as the English Revolution, established a tradition of constitutionally limited government based on custom, the common law, and a series of momentous written declarations, including the Petition of Right (1628), the Agreement of the People (1647), and the Bill of Rights (1689), each of which will be discussed below.

In the Middle Ages, liberty was understood to consist of exclusive privileges and immunities claimed by corporate bodies such as guilds or the clergy, rather than rights that were universal because they belonged to all members of society. Such liberty could be claimed by individuals only as members of those organizations. Thus, freedom was more a matter of social status than a quality inherent in individuals per se, and was exclusive rather than inclusive because it depended on the possession of property or special status in society. However, the events of the English Revolution—which began to germinate early in the reign of Charles I (1625–1649), deepened during the period of the personal rule (when Charles ruled for eleven years without calling a single Parliament), exploded into Civil War during the 1640s, and was finally concluded in the Glorious Rebellion of 1689—led the English to rethink and expand their understanding of the meaning of liberty. Although these struggles produced a less expansive understanding of civil liberties than Americans were to embrace at the writing of their constitution a century later, they did lay a foundation on which the American understanding of civil liberty could evolve.

Freedom in the English Revolution

As the term is being used in this article, the English Revolution was a long, drawn-out affair, provoked by the efforts of the Stuart monarchs to impose absolute rule. Based on their belief that all political authority flowed from the Crown, the Stuarts conducted themselves in ways that deeply offended members of Parliament. The Stuart doctrine of “royal absolutism,” which was defended in well-known works of the period, such as Sir Robert Filmer’s Patriarcha, theorized that all privileges enjoyed by Parliament were grants from the king rather than inherent rights. Armed with this theory, the early Stuart monarchs, James I (1603–1625) and his son, Charles I, frequently exercised governing powers without the cooperation or consent of Parliament. This assertion of royal power led Parliament to engage in an equally vigorous search to define its own privileges. What was Parliament’s legitimate role in government? In the search for answers to this question, Parliament pushed forward a discussion not only of its own liberties but indeed a nearly century-long debate over the rights of the English people. In their absolutist zeal, the Stuarts tried to restrict Parliament’s role when it was sitting and often resorted to ruling without Parliament altogether. This policy reached its zenith in 1629 when Charles I initiated eleven years of rule without calling Parliament into session. This period, known as the “personal rule” period, led to civil war in the 1640s. The Civil War (1642–1649), which ended with the execution of Charles I, brought into focus the civil liberty issues that would be a continuing source of tension until they were resolved in the Glorious Rebellion (1689).

What were those issues? Perhaps the most fundamental issue dividing king and Parliament was the issue of taxation. The Stuarts sought to use the prerogative power to impose taxes without parliamentary approval. This policy led to notoriously unpopular forms of royal revenue such as “forced loans,” which were based on a theory of the king’s right to seize his subjects’ property for public purposes at his discretion. Members of Parliament spoke out strongly against this breach of their property rights. To blunt such criticism, the Stuarts resorted to arresting individual members of Parliament (MPs), which was seen as an attack on the MPs’ right of free speech. They also utilized the Star Chamber, a juryless court whose members served at the pleasure of the king, to send offending MPs to prison or impose severe penalties on them for acts of political opposition. To quell spreading protests against this abuse of power, the monarchy imposed heavy censorship on an emerging opposition press. All published materials were subject to strict censorship by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and severe punishments, including mutilations and death sentences, could be imposed for violators.

Direct censorship of the press was reinforced by the doctrine of seditious libel, which treated criticisms of the government or individual office holders as a crime because it was thought to undermine respect for public authority. The Star Chamber helped to establish this doctrine in the 1606 case De Libellis Famosis, but it was subsequently incorporated into the common law and the English government continued to draw upon it to punish dissent long after abolition of the Star Chamber in 1641. Following the Glorious Rebellion, Parliament would finally end formal press censorship in 1695, but the law of seditious libel persisted and served as a tool to restrain criticism of the government. Libel cases were to be heard by juries after adoption of Fox’s Libel Act of 1692, but in eighteenth-century England and colonial America alike, juries typically upheld government prosecutions for seditious libel.

In sum, during the reign of the early Stuart monarchs a momentous struggle developed over the competing claims of royal prerogative and parliamentary privilege. This struggle put issues of basic rights of property, free speech and press, and trial by jury on the agenda of English national politics.

Seventeenth-Century Milestones in the Development of English Liberties

One of the most important milestones in the evolution of English liberty was the Petition of Right put forward by Parliament and signed in 1628 by King Charles I. The petition sought to formalize Parliament’s claim that the king could not impose taxes without its consent. Under the leadership of Sir Edward Coke, the era’s most distinguished jurist and defender of the common law, Parliament asserted that its role in raising taxes could be traced back to the Magna Carta and was an inviolable element of the “ancient constitution.” The first step toward the petition was a “protestation” by Parliament in 1621, which asserted MPs’ right of free speech. King James famously repudiated this claim by tearing out the page where it appeared in the Commons Journal, and Sir Edward Coke was sent to prison for eight months for his advocacy of the right. Because both James and Charles ignored the protestation, Parliament resorted to the Petition of Right. The petition asserted that citizens could not be forced to loan money to the king or be imprisoned for not doing so, thereby highlighting the importance of the right of habeas corpus as an essential protection of the individual against the arbitrary exercise of power. Parliament enacted the Petition of Right as a statute in order that it would be treated as law by the king, but to no avail. When Charles I dismissed the 1628 Parliament and entered on the personal rule period, he proceeded to violate freely the principles articulated in the petition. Even though the Petition of Right did not succeed in limiting absolutist power in the short run, however, it affirmed principles of constitutional liberty that would remain on the political agenda until they eventually were enshrined in law and practice.

The personal rule foundered in the late 1630s due to the king’s inability to raise sufficient revenue without Parliament’s collaboration. Charles’s need for money led to the famous Long Parliament, which convened in November 1640. Determined to restore constitutional rule and protect parliamentary liberties, MPs passed the Triennial Act, which called for regular sittings of Parliament. They abolished the Star Chamber and other prerogative courts, thereby laying a foundation for a more independent judiciary. In declaring forced loans illegal, they affirmed the sanctity of property rights. But the Long Parliament was unable to reconcile with King Charles, and England plunged into civil war in 1642, a war that finally ended with the king’s execution for treason in January 1649. During the Civil War, the discussion of English liberties spread beyond the traditional political elite and produced a second milestone in English thinking about civil liberty.

The decisive factor in Parliament's victory in the Civil War, Oliver Cromwell's New Model Army, facilitated the rise of the Levellers, a popular movement for the extension of civil liberties. The Levellers put forward ideas that became staples of the written constitutions and bills of rights that were adopted in America. Reformers who lacked the status of gentlemen, the Levellers professed to speak for the common people of England. They opposed not only the tyranny of the king but also the potential for tyranny by Parliament. The Levellers made common cause with the Agitators (regimental leaders in the New Model Army who shared their views) to put forward claims for the individual rights that belonged equally to all Englishmen. These ideas were innovative and anticipated the modern conception of rights because they were based on the presumption of human rationality rather than on precedent. In this respect, they anticipated the famous doctrines of John Locke's Two Treatises of Government, which was published four decades later.

Leveller ideas were advanced in an Agreement of the People, which has been regarded as the first written constitution in modern history. It proposed limiting both royal and parliamentary power through a written charter that would derive its authority directly from the people. The Levellers contended that Parliament should not exercise a judicial function, thereby contributing to the notion of separation of powers that subsequently figured so prominently in the American conception of limited government. They attacked the use of bills of attainder, which were used by Parliament as well as the king to punish individuals legislatively. They expressed a demand for freedom of speech, not just for MPs but for all Englishmen. In an age when persons were drawn and quartered or even hanged for dissident religious views, they advocated freedom of conscience in matters of religion and for general suffrage of all men, a goal that was not to be fulfilled in English history for two more centuries. In essence, the Levellers contended that Parliament was the trustee of the people, which implied that its authority was limited by inherent rights that were beyond the reach of government. Although Leveller aspirations were far ahead of their times, some of their goals were achieved in a more modest, but nonetheless decisive fashion during the Glorious Rebellion in 1689, which produced the historic Bill of Rights.

Although Charles I was executed in 1649 and the monarchy abolished temporarily, experiments with republican government during the 1650s failed, and when the English monarchy was restored in 1660 the limits of royal power were still unresolved. During the reign of Charles II, this question again became politically explosive over the prospect that his successor, James II (1685–1688), might restore a Catholic dynasty to the English throne. To enforce his pro-Catholic policies, James (a professing Catholic) turned to the prerogative power just as his father, Charles I, had done. He dissolved Parliament and threatened his dissenting subjects with a standing army. This turn back toward absolutism led a rebellious Parliament to invite the Protestant Dutch prince, William of Orange, and his wife Mary (daughter of James II) to accept the Crown of England under conditions specified by Parliament. When Prince William's army forced James's abdication, the Glorious Rebellion finally defeated the absolutist tendencies of the English monarchs and brought the king under the law. The Rebellion's most famous achievement, the Bill of Rights adopted in December 1689, was a third milestone in the development of English liberty.

The English Bill of Rights does not contain guarantees of free speech rights for individuals. Such guarantees first appeared a century later in the setting of the American and French revolutions. It did, however, guarantee the right of free speech to MPs during parliamentary debates. What had been considered at the beginning of the century a privilege granted by the king now became a right that the king could not deny. In this sense, the Bill of Rights vindicated the claim made by Sir Edward Coke some sixty years earlier that the liberty of the English people depended on the liberty of Parliament. On that basis, the high priority given to parliamentary rights made sense. Leaders of the Glorious Rebellion did not consider that Parliament itself could threaten the civil liberties of the citizens. Later generations seem to have agreed. The English people accepted the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty established by the Glorious Rebellion, and Britain did not develop a system of separate powers with checks and balances, or a system of judicial review. In this latter regard, however, the Glorious Rebellion did open the way to a more independent judiciary by limiting the Crown's power to appoint and dismiss judges at will. The 1701 Act of Settlement consolidated the principle of judicial independence by providing for lifetime appointment of judges. The Bill of Rights also stipulated that any attempt to impose taxes without the authorization of Parliament was illegal. Subsequently, no English monarch has attempted to override this provision, and in the eighteenth century legislative supremacy in this matter became accepted practice in the colonial assemblies in America.

During the Civil War, English parliamentarians had come to appreciate the importance of a right to bear arms and the danger of standing armies, a danger that the excesses of James II had reinforced. Hence, the Bill of Rights specifies that all Protestant Englishmen could retain arms for their own defense, as provided by law. However, we should note that the Bill of Rights actually preserved discrimination against Roman Catholics and it explicitly prohibited any Roman Catholic from occupying the English throne. In this respect it fell well short of the aspirations for religious freedom and tolerance advocated by the Levellers forty years earlier. Englishmen had also developed a strong aversion to the forced quartering of soldiers, which they saw as an invasion of their liberty. Thus, the Bill of Rights includes a prohibition against a standing army in peacetime, except by consent of Parliament.

Finally, although the Bill of Rights was not written from the point of view of individual rights of citizens, it did provide certain critical legal protections to persons accused of crimes. Let us bear in mind that it was a common practice of Stuart monarchs to imprison their subjects without trial or bail and to use courts such as the Star Chamber to inflict cruel punishments on political adversaries. With these abuses in mind, the authors of the English Bill of Rights included provisions that anticipated the concern in the American Bill of Rights with due process of law. These provisions included a prohibition against excessive bail, the repudiation of cruel and unusual punishment, and the right to a jury trial.

Civil Liberties in Colonial America

It is somewhat paradoxical that, despite their attacks on civil liberties in England, the Stuart monarchs adopted more forward-looking policies in the American colonies, especially with regard to religious freedom. Because most colonial charters were nondiscriminatory, religious freedom was encouraged in early seventeenth-century America, even as religious conflict was tearing England apart. Maryland's Toleration Act of 1649 was more generous with religious liberty than England's Bill of Rights. Meanwhile, during the reign of Charles II, the grant of religious freedom was written into the charters of Rhode Island, the Carolinas, and Pennsylvania.

More generally, the American colonists were strongly influenced by the English Bill of Rights to regard themselves as living under a constitutional system that limited government's power over the individual. American lawyers were familiar with Edward Coke's Commentaries on the Common Law, from which they derived the notion that Parliament itself was under the law. The colonists strongly believed that they enjoyed the rights granted to all English citizens. Consider the following illustrations. The Massachusetts Body of Liberties (1641) included the right of free speech and assembly, the right to bail, legal counsel, and trial by jury, and prohibited excessive bail and cruel punishment. In Pennsylvania, the Frame of Government (1682) enshrined these same rights and offered detailed procedural guarantees for the criminally accused. On the eve of the American Revolution, the Virginia Constitution of 1776 opened with a declaration of rights that presaged the national bill of rights and anticipated the famous due process rights contained in the Fourth through Eighth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. In short, the Americans, more vigorously than their English brethren, embraced the Leveller legacy that civil liberty depends on restraining the power of government and enshrining the protection of individual rights in a written constitution.

MICHAEL DODSON

References and Further Reading

- Barth, Alan. "The Heritage of Civil Liberties." In The Rights of Free Men, edited by James E. Clayton, 110–24. New York: Alfred E. Knopf, 1984.
- Davies, Stevie. A Century of Troubles: England 1600–1700. London: Pan Macmillan, 2001.
- Hexter, J.H., ed. Parliament and Liberty: From the Reign of Elizabeth to the English Civil War. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1992.
- Jones, James R., ed. Liberty Secured? British Freedom Before and After 1689. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1992.
- Kelly, Alfred H., ed. Foundations of Freedom in the American Constitution. New York: Harper and Brothers, Publishers, 1954.
- Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Bill of Rights. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Schwartz, Bernard. The Great Rights of Mankind: A History of the American Bill of Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- Schworer, Lois G. "The English Bill of Rights, 1689: A Perspective on Liberty." In Three Beginnings: Revolution, Rights and the Liberal State, edited by Stephen F. Englehart and John Allphin Moore Jr., 93–114. New York: Peter Lang, 1994.
- Smith, David L. The Stuart Parliaments, 1603–1689. London: Arnold, 1999.
- Wolfe, Don M. Leveller Manifestoes in the Puritan Revolution. New York: Humanities Press, 1967.
- Wormuth, Francis D. The Origins of Modern Constitutionalism. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1949.
- Zaret, David. "Tradition, Human Rights, and the English Revolution." In Human Rights and Revolutions, edited by Jeffrey N. Wasserstrom, Lynn Hunt, and Marilyn B. Young, 43–58. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield Publishers, Inc., 2000.

ENTRAPMENT AND “STINGS”

Entrapment is a defense to criminal charges based on the idea that the defendant was induced to commit the crime by government agents. The defense is often raised in drug crimes, child pornography crimes, bribery, and prostitution. These “victimless crimes” are often prosecuted based on undercover investigations, which are colloquially known as stings.

Entrapment is an affirmative defense, meaning the defendant admits that he committed the crime but seeks to avoid punishment by explaining the conduct. In effect, the defendant is saying, “Yes, I committed the crime, but you should not punish me because the government made me do it.”

The entrapment defense is hard to define because government encouragement to commit a crime is not per se impermissible; merely setting a trap to ensnare a criminal is not entrapment. The courts often say that a line must be drawn between the trap for the unwary innocent and the trap for the unwary criminal. A court must evaluate where that line is to be drawn based on the facts of each case by focusing on the individual defendant’s predisposition and police conduct.

Two basic theories for the entrapment defense have evolved, and jurisdictions in the United States are about evenly split on which is best. One approach focuses on the defendant and asks whether the defendant is worthy of punishing. The theory is that persons should not be held liable for acts they would not have committed without encouragement from a government agent. This approach focuses on the actual mental state of individual defendant, and is often called the subjective approach. Judge Learned Hand described the rationale in United States v. Becker (1933) as “a spontaneous moral revulsion against using the powers of government to beguile innocent, though ductile, persons into lapses which they might otherwise resist.” This is the approach used in the federal courts.

The Supreme Court recently clarified this subjective approach to the defense in Jacobson v. United States (1992). Jacobson was a child pornography case wherein the defendant received repeated invitations and inquiries from several fictitious organizations. He was also invited to place orders with several businesses. Many of the communications from the bogus organizations referred to freedom of speech and censorship. The Court held that Jacobson’s conviction for receiving child pornography could not stand because the government had not shown that “Jacobson was predisposed, independent of the Government’s acts and beyond a reasonable doubt, to violate the law by receiving child pornography through the mails.” By the time he committed the offense, in other words, Jacobson had already been exposed to so much inducement by the government that he had become predisposed to commit it, but only because of the government’s inducement. Thus, the government must prove that a defendant was predisposed to commit the offense, and was so predisposed before any government action to induce the commission of the offense.

The second approach to the defense is based on using the defense as a tool to regulate police conduct. If the defendant has a defense to crimes committed when police are heavily involved, the prosecution will be worthless, so the defense will extinguish any incentive the police have to set up abusive stings. This approach focuses on the police conduct without regard to the mental state of the particular defendant being prosecuted. This definition of entrapment is often referred to as objective because it focuses on police conduct without regard to the particular defendant’s mental state. This is the approach used in a majority of state courts.

These somewhat conflicting rationales have translated into two definitions of the entrapment defense. For jurisdictions focusing on the defendant’s mental state, the government can overcome the defense by showing that the particular defendant was predisposed to commit the offense. If the defendant was predisposed to commit the offense, it does not matter what the government agents did, as the defense is unavailable. For jurisdictions focusing on police conduct, the defense is established if the conduct of the government agents is so intrusive that an ordinary law-abiding person would have been enticed to commit the offense. If this is so, the police went too far and need to be deterred from such investigations. For example, in one case a friend (actually an undercover police officer) approached the defendant and begged her to buy her food stamps because she needed money to buy Christmas presents for her children; when the defendant was prosecuted for trafficking in food stamps, she claimed entrapment.

An important difference between the objective approach focusing on police conduct and the subjective approach focusing on the defendant’s mental state is that predisposition of the defendant is irrelevant under the objective approach, while under the subjective approach, it is the key element. This means that in jurisdictions adopting the subjective approach, the government can introduce at trial evidence of the defendant’s bad conduct as proof of predisposition. This bad conduct, normally excluded from trial as irrelevant under the rules of evidence, is rendered admissible under the subjective definition of the defense.

This evidentiary impact of the subjective approach is a drawback for defendants.

One question frequently raised by the defense is whether a defendant may be targeted for investigation in the absence of any suspicion. In other words, must the government justify why the defendant was chosen as the target for a sting? The Supreme Court has never directly addressed the question of whether the government must demonstrate some level of suspicion before targeting a defendant. Generally the lower appellate courts have concluded that no suspicion is required.

A defendant cannot use the defense of entrapment when a private agent induces commission of the offense.

SARAH N. WELLING

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Warren, From Sorrells to Jacobson: Reflections on Six Decades of Entrapment Law, and Related Defenses in Federal Court, Wake Forest Law Review 27 (1992): 829.
- Marcus, Paul. The Entrapment Defense. 2nd ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie Butterworth, 1995.
- Paton, Scott C., The Government Made Me Do It: A Proposed Approach to Entrapment Under Jacobson v. United States, Cornell Law Review 79 (1994): 995.
- Seidman, Louis M., The Supreme Court, Entrapment, and Our Criminal Justice Dilemma, Supreme Court Review 1981 (1981): 111.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- United States v. Becker*, 62 F.2d 1007, 1009 (2d Cir. 1933)
- Jacobson v. United States*, 503 U.S. 540 (1992)

See also Child Pornography; Due Process; Entrapment by Estoppel

ENTRAPMENT BY ESTOPPEL

In the American criminal justice system, individuals are held to the principle that “ignorance of the law is no excuse.” Essentially, this rule means that an accused may not escape criminal liability by alleging that he was unaware that his conduct was illegal. All people are presumed to know the law, and to act in accordance with it. However, courts have recognized a narrow exception to this rule where an accused relies on information from an official state actor and acts in accordance with that information. This exception is referred to as “entrapment by estoppel,” “reasonable reliance,” or “good faith reliance on a state actor’s advice.”

The U.S. Supreme Court discussed the constitutional aspect of the defense in Raley v. Ohio (1959) and Cox v. Louisiana (1965). In these decisions, the Court recognized that individuals should not be prosecuted for engaging in conduct specifically authorized through government advice. Prior to these decisions, state courts had considered the issue with varying results, weighing the need for bright-line rules on the one hand, against the potential for government misconduct and the conviction of individuals with little or no moral culpability on the other. In 1962, the American Law Institute included a codified form of entrapment by estoppel in the Model Penal Code, a version of which many states subsequently adopted.

The specific elements of the defense of entrapment by estoppel may vary slightly by jurisdiction; however, to rely on the defense, an accused must essentially show that (1) the legality of the conduct was officially authorized by a government agent, (2) the accused relied on this acknowledgement, (3) the reliance was reasonable, and (4) given the reliance, prosecution would be unfair. “Official” authorization can be found in statutes, judicial decisions, or interpretations offered by relevant government actors in an official capacity. Under no circumstances are individuals permitted to rely on their own interpretation of a law as a defense, no matter how reasonable that interpretation may be. This principle was noted in People v. Marrero (1987), in which a New York court upheld a conviction even though half of the judges who considered the issue agreed with the defendant’s interpretation of the law in question. Additionally, as the court found in Miller v. Commonwealth (1997), the government agent must be one who is charged with the interpretation, administration, or enforcement of the law at issue.

There are several justifications for the defense of entrapment by estoppel. First and foremost, the defense recognizes that it is fundamentally unfair to convict an individual for conduct that is authorized by the government, even if that authorization later turns out to be erroneous. Second, individuals who act in compliance with the government’s interpretation of a law, even if that interpretation is erroneous, lack the moral culpability necessary to justify a criminal conviction. Finally, holding individuals criminally liable for complying with the government’s interpretation of a law may have the effect of inhibiting otherwise lawful behavior and undermining society’s confidence in the government.

JUDITH M. BARGER

References and Further Reading

- Cohen, Mark S., Entrapment by Estoppel, Colorado Lawyer 31 (February 2002): 45–48.
- Dressler, Joshua. “When Mistake of Law Is a Defense: Exceptions to the General Rule.” In Understanding

Criminal Law, 168—177. 3rd ed. New York: Lexis Publishing, 2001.

Parry, John T., Culpability, Mistake, and Official Interpretations of Law, American Journal of Criminal Law 25 (1997): 1–78.

Pasano, Michael S., Walther J. Tache, and Thierry Oliver Desmet. “Using the Defense of Entrapment by Estoppel.” Champion, May 26, 2002, 20–4.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559 (1965)

Miller v. Commonwealth, 492 S.E.2d. 482 (Va. 1997)

People v. Marrero, 597 N.E.2d 1068 (N.Y. 1987)

Raley v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 423 (1959)

See also Due Process; Entrapment by Estoppel; Raley v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 423 (1959)

EPPELSON v. ARKANSAS, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)

The legal conflict over the teaching of Darwinism in public schools began with the 1925 Scopes trial. But it was not until 1968 that the U.S. Supreme Court, in Epperson v. Arkansas, struck down as unconstitutional an antievolution statute similar to the one upheld in both Scopes and the Tennessee Supreme Court (Scopes v. State [1927]).

This case concerns the constitutionality of a 1929 Arkansas statute that prohibited the teaching of evolution—in either textbooks or by classroom instructors—in all state-supported educational institutions, including universities, colleges, and public schools. The statute defined evolution as “the theory or doctrine that mankind ascended or descended from a lower order of animals.”

In the beginning of the 1965 school year, Susan Epperson, a tenth-grade biology teacher in Little Rock, was provided with a new textbook from which she was to instruct her students. Unlike the one she had used the previous school year, this textbook “contained a chapter setting forth ‘the theory about the origin . . . of man from a lower form of animal.’” This put Epperson in a quandary: if she uses the state-required textbook, she violates the state’s law and subjects herself to criminal prosecution and termination. Joined by other parties, Epperson filed a suit in Chancery Court. That court held that the statute violated Epperson’s First Amendment freedom of speech and thought. The court also prohibited the state from terminating Epperson based on any alleged violation of the statute. The Arkansas Supreme Court reversed on appeal.

The Supreme Court held that the statute was unconstitutional because it violated both the Free Exercise and Establishment Clauses of the First Amendment. The Court concluded that the statute proscribed evolution solely because it is inconsistent with the creation story in the Book of Genesis. The court cited two reasons for this conclusion: (1) “no suggestion has been made that Arkansas’ law may be justified by considerations of state policy other than the religious view of some of its citizens,” and (2) “fundamentalist sectarian conviction was and is the law’s reason for existence.” The second reason was supported by the historical origin of the Arkansas statute and its connection to the Tennessee statute adjudicated in Scopes. Thus, the statute had no secular purpose.

The Court did not base its holding, as the Chancery Court did, on the teacher’s right to freedom of speech, but rather, on the principle that “government . . . must be neutral in matters of religious theory, doctrine, and practice.” Arkansas’ statute was not religiously neutral, for it did not prohibit from its academic institutions all discussion of human origins, but rather, singled out one view to prohibit, evolution, because of its apparent conflict with a religious belief.

Epperson’s importance lies in its establishing the principle of “religious neutrality” as central to public school curricula, especially in the sciences. That principle, however, cuts both ways, for it means that scientific criticisms of evolution that may be consistent with certain religious beliefs may pass constitutional muster. For such views typically appeal to public reasons—empirical facts and widely held conceptual notions—that do not contain religious texts or dogmas.

FRANCIS J. BECKWITH

References and Further Reading

Beckwith, Francis J. Law, Darwinism & Public Education: The Establishment Clause and the Challenge of Intelligent Design. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2003.

Campbell, John A., and Stephen C. Meyer, eds. Darwinism, Design, and Public Education. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 2003.

Carter, Stephen L., Evolutionism, Creationism, and Teaching Religion as a Hobby, Duke Law Journal 1987 (1987): 977.

Darwin, Charles. On the Origin of Species. Facsimile of the 1st edition (1859), with introd. by Ernst Mayr. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1964.

Dembski, William A., and Michael Ruse, eds. Debating Design: From Darwin to DNA. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

Greenawalt, Kent, Establishing Religious Ideas: Evolution, Creationism, and Intelligent Design, Notre Dame Journal of Law, Ethics & Public Policy 17 (2003): 2:321–397.

Johnson, Phillip E. Darwin on Trial. Chicago: Regnery Gateway, 1991.

- Miller, Kenneth R. Finding Darwin's God: A Scientist's Search for Common Ground Between God and Evolution. New York: Cliff Street Books, 1999.
- Numbers, Ronald. Darwinism in America. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Pennock, Robert T., ed. Intelligent Design Creationism and Its Critics: Philosophical, Theological, and Scientific Perspectives. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2001.
- Ruse, Michael. The Evolution Wars: A Guide to the Debates. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Arkansas (Anti-Evolution) Statute. Initiated Act No. 1, Ark. Acts 1929; Ark. Stat. Ann. ss 80–1627, 80–1628 (1960 Repl. Vol.)
- Arkansas v. Epperson*, 242 Ark. 922, 416 S.W. 2d 322 (1967)
- Scopes v. State*, 154 Tenn. 105 (1927)

See also Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987); Scopes Trial; Teaching “Creation Science” in Public Schools; Teaching Evolution in Public Schools

EQUAL ACCESS ACT

The Equal Access Act (EAA), enacted with broad bipartisan support by Congress in 1984, prohibits public school districts receiving federal financial assistance from discriminating among noncurriculum-related student groups who want to use school premises. Once schools have created a limited open forum within the definition of EAA, those schools cannot deny student access to school premises on the basis of “religious, political, philosophical, or other speech content.” An immediate effect of EAA was that student religious groups, previously denied use of school facilities in such federal circuit court of appeal cases as Brandon v. Board of Education (1980) and Lubbock Civil Liberties Union v. Lubbock Independent School District (1982) because of concern about advancing or sponsoring religion in violation of the Establishment Clause, now had a federal statutory right to meet on the same terms as other non-curriculum-related student groups. The language and purpose of the EAA was influenced by a Supreme Court decision, Widmar v. Vincent (1981), where the Court held with reference to a public university that, once it had opened its facilities to use of a wide range of student groups, it had created a limited public forum and was prohibited under the free speech clause from denying the use of its facilities to student religious groups. In enacting EAA, Congress deliberately selected the term, “limited open forum,” so as not to confuse rights granted under EAA with those granted, as in Widmar, under the free speech clause’s limited public forum. A limited open forum exists whenever one or more noncurriculum-related student groups meets on school premises during noninstructional time. While EAA does not define what constitutes noncurriculum-related student groups, the Supreme Court, in upholding the constitutionality of EAA against an Establishment Clause challenge in Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens (1990), provided a useful analytical framework for determining the curricular relatedness of student groups. The EAA defines non-instructional time as that which is “set aside by the school before actual classroom instruction begins or after actual classroom instruction ends.” In order to assure that students have a fair opportunity to conduct meetings under a school’s limited open forum, meetings must be voluntary and student-initiated; cannot be government sponsored; can be attended by government employees only in a nonparticipatory capacity; cannot materially or substantially interfere with the educational activities of the school; and cannot be directed, conducted, or regularly attended by nonschool persons. In clarifying the statute’s prohibition on government-sponsored meetings, EAA defines “sponsorship” as “promoting, leading, or participating in a meeting,” but expressly excludes from sponsorship “the assignment of a teacher, administrator, or other school employee to a meeting for custodial purposes.” Congress in enacting EAA provided assurance to public schools that the statute was not intended to “limit the authority of the school, its agents or employees, to maintain order and discipline on school premises, to protect the well-being of students and faculty, and to assure that attendance of students at meetings is voluntary.” However, Congress also placed broad limitations on every level of government and its subdivisions, including school districts, to prohibit them from: influencing the content of prayer or religious activities, requiring that any person participate in prayer or religious activities, expending more than incidental funds to provide space for student meetings, compelling school agents or employees to attend meetings where the content of speech at a meeting would be contrary to a person’s beliefs, sanctioning meetings otherwise unlawful, limiting the rights of groups not of a specified size, and abridging the constitutional rights of any person. The EAA allows for private enforcement of the statute by students who claim that they have been denied equal access rights, but the statute expressly prohibits the federal government from denying or withholding federal financial assistance to any school.

The Equal Access Act has been extended to a wider range of student groups than religious clubs, such as gay/straight clubs. Protection under EAA’s limited open forum may overlap with free speech’s limited public forum which means that students denied access to school premises could have both statutory and constitutional claims.

RALPH D. MAWDSLEY

References and Further Reading

Equal Access Act, 20 U.S.C. sec. 4071–4074 (1984).
 Establishment Clause, U.S. Const., First Amendment.
 Free Speech Clause, U.S. Const., First Amendment.
 Mawdsley, Ralph, The Equal Access Act and Public Schools: What Are the Legal Issues Related to Recognizing Gay Student Groups? Brigham Young University Education and Law Journal 2001 (2001): 1:1–33.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)
Brandon v. Board of Education of Guilderland Central School District, 635 F.2d 971 (2d Cir. 1980)
Lubbock Civil Liberties Union v. Lubbock Independent School District, 669 F.2d 1038 (5th Cir. 1982)
Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 283 (1981)

EQUAL PROTECTION CLAUSE AND RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution serves to ensure that all persons are afforded equal treatment by the government, including governmental treatment of religious groups. Through the Fourteenth Amendment, the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment were first incorporated against the states in 1947 through Everson v. Board of Education. More recently, the courts have tended to ground treatment of religious groups in the First Amendment instead of an equal protection clause analysis grounded in the Fourteenth.

Ordinarily, equal protection acts to protect members of minority groups, in general, from unfair treatment in a majoritarian system. An equal protection analysis is triggered when the government treats similarly situated individuals dissimilarly or when government action affects an individual's fundamental rights under the Constitution. Classifications based on a "suspect class" (for example, race) are subjected to "strict scrutiny." That is, in order for the government action to survive, the government must have a "compelling state interest," and the governmental action must be "narrowly tailored" to accomplish that interest. The courts consider certain characteristics that strongly correlate with suspect classes: historical subjugation, political powerlessness, distinct attributes, and immutability, all of which are prevalent in minority religious groups. When the equal protection inherent in the Religion Clauses is imported, the requirements of the Free Exercise Clause can conflict with a stigma-based equal protection. The government may not endorse one religion over another.

In the area of free speech and equal protection, religious groups are protected in their speech and press activities at the same level as other groups and individuals. However, the Religion Clauses do not provide greater protection to the religious groups in proselytizing. As a result, the Free Exercise Clause does not provide rights unavailable to other groups under the free speech clause where expression is concerned.

Also, in public education religious groups are afforded a right similar to any other group to gather under either a free exercise or free speech analysis. In application, however, certain minority religious groups, particularly disfavored groups such as Wiccan or Satanist groups may face hurdles in gaining the constitutional rights that apply.

One of the major factors that differentiate religion, specifically religious practice from other suspect classifications, is the belief structure inherent in religion. A constitutional doctrine that bends to every belief (and claimed belief) may place religious doctrine ahead of the legal mandate of neutral laws. In Employment Division v. Smith (1990), the Supreme Court diminished the scrutiny required by the equal protection aspect of the Religion Clauses as applied to neutral laws of general applicability.

Despite the lower level of scrutiny afforded to religious groups in the face of neutral laws, laws that treat religious groups less favorably than cultural, educational, and civic groups may be struck down. For example, in Fairfax Covenant Church v. Fairfax County School Board (1994), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit struck down a law setting rental rates of school facilities higher for churches than other nonprofit organizations.

MICHAEL KOBY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
Fairfax Covenant Church v. Fairfax County School Board, 17 F.3d 703 (4th Cir. 1994)

EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAW (XIV)

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.'s famous quip that equal protection is "the usual last resort of constitutional arguments" would today be accepted more as a positive than a negative commendation. Given the importance of equality in today's America, many are surprised to discover that neither the original Constitution nor the Bill of Rights contains a reference to equality. Neither the founders nor the members of the First Congress chose to borrow at all from Thomas Jefferson's memorable proclamation in the Declaration of Independence "that all Men are created equal."

The Civil War, what some scholars have termed America's true revolutionary experience, changed that. Significantly, Abraham Lincoln in his Gettysburg Address marked the founding of "a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal" to 1776 and not to the Constitution of 1787. Within a month of Lincoln's speech, Congress came to grips with the issue of framing an amendment abolishing slavery. One version, put forth by Senator Charles Sumner would have provided that "all persons are equal before the law, so that no other person can hold another as a slave." Sumner, however, was rebuffed; opponents of his formula wanted no part of language "copied from the French Revolution," preferring "the good old Anglo-Saxon language employed by our fathers in the [Northwest O]rdinance of 1787."

No such objection was raised to the inclusion in the first section of the proposed Fourteenth Amendment that "[n]o State shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Today, equality is universally embraced as a value of American society, but different people have vastly different ideas of what it means and what the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of equal protection requires.

The Fourteenth Amendment: Framing and Early History

The language of the Fourteenth Amendment clearly reflected earlier language from the Civil Rights Act of 1866. Indeed, many who voted for the Fourteenth Amendment felt that it was necessary in order to constitutionalize the 1866 legislation that hitherto rested solely on Congress's power to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment. Among other things, the Civil Rights Act provided that all persons born in the United States . . . citizens of the United States . . . that] such citizens, of every race and color . . . shall have the . . . equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Unfortunately, the Thirty-ninth Congress's debates offer little help as to exactly what equal protection meant. The general consensus among scholars is that in addition to putting the 1866 Act on firmer constitutional ground, it was intended to ensure that, were the Democrats to regain power, they would have to amend the Constitution to undo the protections for the freedmen. This said, the most prominent historian of the Fourteenth Amendment, Charles Fairman, summed up the problem facing later generations seeking to plumb the depths of meaning of the equal protection clause by observing that "in the main the [authors of the Freedom Amendments] did not discern the obduracy of problems lying on the shady side of victory." Americans of the twenty-first century continue to be divided and uncertain as to what equal protection means.

Unlike the Bill of Rights, which waited until the twentieth century for judicial interpretation, the Fourteenth Amendment and in particular the first section were interpreted a scant five years after ratification, or as Justice Samuel F. Miller wrote in the opinion of the Court in The Slaughterhouse Cases (1873), "in the light . . . of events, almost too recent to be called history, but which are familiar to us all" Speaking for a five-member majority, Miller dismissed the butchers' claims that by granting the Crescent City Slaughter-House Company a monopoly the Louisiana legislature had deprived them of the equal protection of the laws.

[N]o one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all [that is, The Freedom Amendments], lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have even be suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freedman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him.

Specifically addressing the meaning of equal protection, Miller concluded simply that it was [t]he existence of laws . . . which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against [African Americans] as a class, was the evil to be remedied It is so clearly a provision for that race and that emergency, that a strong case would be necessary for its application to any other.

The Court continued in a similar vein in Strauder v. West Virginia (1880), striking down a statute barring African Americans from jury service. In that opinion, though, Justice William Strong allowed that the guarantees of equal protection extended beyond the former slaves, protecting both “white men” and “naturalized Celtic Irishmen.”

Subsequent decisions, most notably those in The Civil Rights Cases (1883) and Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), made Miller’s and Strong’s language ring hollow. In the former case, the Court held that prosecutions under the Civil Rights Act of 1875 of private individuals for discriminating against blacks went beyond the powers of Congress. In Plessy, Justice Henry Brown found that state-mandated segregation on railroad cars was reasonable, in contrast to hypothetical “laws requiring colored people to walk upon one side of the street, and white people upon the other.” Brown’s distinction built on Justice Stanley Matthews’ earlier opinion in the case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins (1886). There Matthews had used the equal protection clause to protect the Chinese operators of laundries in San Francisco from the discriminatory application of a facially neutral ordinance designed to reduce dangers from fire. According to Matthews, “No reason for [its current enforcement] is shown, and the conclusion cannot be resisted, that no reason exists except hostility to the race and nationality to which [Yick Wo] belong[s]”

Using this standard, the Court upheld various measures enacted to impose segregation under the banner of “separate but equal,” actions that would undo all the advances that the former slaves had gained during Reconstruction. For its part, the equal protection clause was used sporadically to allow the Court an additional check on state economic legislation with which it disagreed, although in this area the Due Process Clause played a much more important role. Other than these exceptions, the equal protection clause slipped into the same degree of irrelevance to which the Court in The Slaughterhouse Cases had relegated the Fourteenth Amendment’s “privileges and immunities” clause.

The Demise of the Old Court and the Rise of the New Court

Matters stood pretty much unchanged until the 1930s. Then, the struggle between the Court and the New Deal, culminating in the so-called “switch in time that saved nine,” produced a Court that adopted a very different role than any of its predecessors. Although Congress had rejected President Franklin Roosevelt’s effort to appoint additional judges and thus secure a majority of justices willing to uphold challenged New Deal legislation, the Court in 1937 appeared to give way, first upholding a state minimum wage law and later, the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Board. Commentators, accordingly, generally refer to Roosevelt as having lost the battle over expanding the size of the Court, but winning the war to save the New Deal.

For the Court, this was a time of adjustment from the “Old Court’s” concern with property to the “New Court” and its protection of civil rights and liberties. In 1938, in an otherwise unremarkable case, Justice Harlan Fiske Stone traced the basic outlines of this new role. Frequently dubbed a “double standard,” the famous footnote four of United States v. Carolene Products (1938) set forth a highly deferential standard for legislation dealing with economic matters. In contrast, a far more rigorous test was established for legislation that dealt with noneconomic individual rights.

[A] narrower scope for operation of the presumption of constitutionality [is appropriate for] legislation [that] appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as the first ten amendments . . . , or which restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, [or] review of statutes directed at particular religions . . . or national, . . . or racial minorities . . . [or] prejudice against discrete and insular minorities . . .

The NAACP and the Challenge to “Separate But Equal”

The Court’s changed attitude was not lost on Court watchers and, in particular, on those who sought to fight Jim Crow laws. In 1939, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) took steps to strengthen its already nine-year-old legal attack on segregation by establishing the Legal Defense Fund with future Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall as its first head. A year earlier, the NAACP had scored a major victory against segregation before the Supreme Court in the case of Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada (1938). Missouri had a policy providing for payment of tuition of African-American law school applicants attending an out-of-state law school. It eventually agreed to start an all-black law school in Missouri. Neither was enough to satisfy Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes who spoke for a six-to-two Court in finding that Missouri had failed to provide a “legal education substantially equal to those which the State there offered for persons of the white race.”

World War II brought other changes to American society that raised further questions about segregation.

The war effort required a total mobilization of the population, and one consequence was that jobs formerly monopolized by white men were now open to blacks and to women. This development attracted a growing stream of southern blacks moving to northern cities where they were able to vote and gain some share of political power. The racist ideology preached by Hitler and the discovery of the horrors of the Holocaust raised further discomfiting questions about America's own policies on race. The gradual breakup of the European colonial empires and the contest for the hearts and minds of these new nations with the Soviet Union gave a new urgency to re-examining the prewar racial status quo.

With the end of the war, the NAACP renewed its attack on educational segregation. In the wake of Gaines, some southern states had expanded educational opportunities for blacks, albeit on a segregated basis. South Carolina's new governor, former associate justice James Byrnes returned from Washington to warn South Carolinians that Washington, and in particular the Supreme Court, was likely to demand more equality as the price the South must pay for maintaining "separate but equal."

Two victories soon validated the NAACP's 1930 decision to attack segregation in education. Even before these, however, the Vinson Court signaled a significant change in its 1948 decision in Shelley v. Kraemer.

The White Court had previously struck down an effort to enforce residential segregation in Buchanan v. Warley (1917) on grounds typical of the "Old Court," that is, the fact that Kentucky's restriction interfered with an individual's liberty of contract. Restrictive covenants posed quite a different issue. These were conditions placed in deeds to property limiting the right of the property owner to either to rent or sell the property to persons of certain ethnic or racial backgrounds. They had been upheld in Corrigan v. Buckley (1926) in a unanimous decision by a Court that included Holmes, Louis Brandeis, and Stone. As had been true in The Civil Rights Cases, the Court found no state action and therefore no equal protection violation. In contrast, in Shelley, Chief Justice Fred Vinson for a unanimous Court—three justices not participating—now found judicial enforcement of covenants to be "state action."

The 1950 education decisions were also unanimous. Sweatt v. Painter and McLaurin v. Oklahoma caused the Court to consider whether separate could ever be equal. In Sweatt, Texas, after much litigation, had finally established a law school for blacks. Again Chief Justice Vinson spoke for the Court. He accepted Thurgood Marshall's argument that there was no way that this newly established law school could ever be the equal of the existing white law school. Vinson noted that even if the facilities were equal, the education could not be. By the state's excluding members of the racial groups which number 85 percent of the population . . . and include most of the lawyers . . . with whom petitioner will inevitably be dealing . . . we cannot conclude that the education offered . . . is substantially equal to that which he would receive if admitted to the University of Texas Law School.

In McLaurin, Oklahoma had admitted a veteran African-American teacher into the university's graduate program in education. Instead of establishing a separate doctoral program at an existing black-only state school, it proceeded to require McLaurin to sit behind a cordon in class that separated him from his fellow classmates and to sit at tables in both the library and cafeteria labeled as reserved for "colored." Although Vinson's opinion in McLaurin was brief, it may have presaged more than Sweatt what the Court would write in the 1954 decision of Brown v. Board of Education. By so separating him from his fellow graduate students, Oklahoma had denied McLaurin "his personal and present rights to equal protection of the laws . . . [He] must receive the same treatment . . . as students of other races." By denying this, Oklahoma adversely affects McLaurin's education and the education of his future students. "Their own education will necessarily suffer to the extent that his training is unequal to that of his classmates. State-imposed restrictions which produce such inequalities cannot be sustained."

Buoyed by these victories, Marshall and his team at the Legal Defense Fund prepared to make their long-planned frontal attack on public education at the elementary and secondary levels. Their decision to concentrate on graduate and professional education had been a tactical one. They realized that since this involved fewer students, it was likely to produce less of a backlash than an attack on public schools. They also thought that by challenging separate but equal at law schools, they would have a more sympathetic hearing from the justices.

Still they realized that the Court of the 1950s was itself an institution that might be hesitant to wade into this highly explosive area. The Court's prestige had not fully recovered from the scars suffered in its battle with Roosevelt. The Court was also more conservative. The Truman appointees had tilted the Court away from the very liberal tint it had taken on in the 1940s. This combination had created a Court that largely embraced the judicial role known as self-restraint, a notion that Holmes had championed and which had been enthusiastically embraced by Justice Felix Frankfurter. According to C. Herman Pritchett, the Vinson Court took “[t]he strong legislature–weak judiciary formula which Holmes developed for the . . . purpose of controlling judicial review over state economic legislation,” and extended it to legislation that touched directly upon guarantees of individual liberties found in the Constitution.

Despite these concerns, the NAACP undertook to mount a series of challenges to public school segregation. Five state cases were combined in what has come to be known as Brown v. Board of Education (1954), arguably the Court’s most important decision of the twentieth century. Each had been carefully selected to force the Court finally to address squarely whether “separate but equal” was still good law. First argued in 1952, the Court took the unusual step of ordering a second set of arguments set for October 1953. Clearly, the justices realized the political implications of a decision setting aside a precedent that not only had survived since 1896 but had been repeatedly invoked by the Supreme Court, a fact that South Carolina’s attorney, John W. Davis, vigorously reminded the Court. Before the second round of argument, Chief Justice Vinson died and President Dwight D. Eisenhower nominated California Governor Earl Warren to succeed him. Although scholars disagree as to how the Court would have voted in 1953, they seem universally to credit Warren with ensuring that the Court would speak with one voice in Brown. The Warren opinion seems to have been as much directed at the general public than to academics or lawyers. One of the chief justice’s biographers noted that more than any thing else, Warren was guided by a desire for fairness, and if anything was not fair it was segregation.

After reviewing the Court’s previous rulings on educational segregation, Warren proceeded to address the particular issues in elementary and secondary education.

To separate them from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone We concluded that in the field of public education the doctrine of “separate but equal” has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal.

Current Controversies

The unanimity that Warren had worked to achieve in Brown was maintained throughout his tenure (1953–1968) despite little support from the political branches of government and dogged opposition by public officials from the old Confederacy. Warren’s successor, Warren Earl Burger, was not so successful in this regard. Although he held the Court together in the first of the busing cases, Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg School District (1971), the unanimity ended two years later in another busing case, Keyes v. School District No. 1, Denver (1973) from which Justice William Rehnquist dissented, and further deteriorated in Milliken v. Bradley (1974) with the issue of de jure versus de facto segregation producing a five-to-four split, a margin that would be repeated frequently in subsequent cases involving race.

The issue of affirmative action, although not provoking the violence that frequently surrounded busing, has proven to be more enduring. In early opinions, the Burger Court adopted the “disparate impact” theory, and held that job qualifications must be closely related to job performance. Affirmative action in education proved more troublesome. By a vote of five to four, the Court found the quota adopted by a California medical school violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964, but a different five-member majority found that the equal protection clause did not preclude a school from considering race as one factor in admissions. Subsequent decisions of the Burger and Rehnquist Courts appeared to undermine the finding of Regents of the University of California v. Bakke (1978). Despite concerns that the transformation of the Court effected by the appointees of Presidents Reagan and Bush would result in a holding that racial preferences could be used only when there was evidence of past discrimination, another five-to-four Court in 2003 upheld the use of race as one factor in making decisions. Justice Sandra Day O’Connor’s opinion in Grutter v. Bollinger (2003) in fact put Justice Lewis Powell’s opinion in Bakke on much firmer precedential ground than it had ever enjoyed previously. (Powell’s Bakke opinion had been only a judgment of the Court; the core of his decision was not fully accepted by any of the eight other justices.)

O’Connor found that “the Law School’s use of race [was] justified by a compelling state interest,” the school’s and society’s interest in having diversity in education and in the legal community. “Strict scrutiny” meant for O’Connor that racial “classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored to further compelling state interests”

Suspect Categories and Fundamental Rights

Early opinions, such as The Slaughterhouse Cases and Strauder, had emphasized that the equal protection clause was designed for “the newly emancipated negroes.” Paragraph three of Carolene Products’s footnote four returned to this theme and provided a basis upon which the concept of “suspect categories” developed and the requirement that such classifications be subjected to “strict scrutiny,” serve a “compelling state interest,” and be “narrowly tailored” to the achievement of that interest.

Footnote four’s promise in this regard was first realized in the 1940s. Justice William O. Douglas used “strict scrutiny” to strike down an Oklahoma law that required the sterilization of a three-time offender in Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942). Ironically, however, the emergence of the idea of race as a modern-day “suspect category” surfaced first in what is generally labeled the infamous case of Korematsu v. United States (1944). An executive order signed by President Franklin Roosevelt gave the military power to designate military zones “from which any and all persons” might be excluded. General John DeWitt carried the order out on the West Coast. When queried why Italian and German aliens were not included, he replied “a Jap is a Jap,” and this was “a war of the white race against the yellow race.” Justice Hugo Lafayette Black sustained Korematsu’s conviction for not reporting for evacuation, while at the same time holding that all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. That is not to say that all such restrictions are unconstitutional. It is to say that courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny.

None of the early education cases made mention of suspect categories or strict scrutiny, but in finally addressing the sensitive subject of state antimiscegenation statutes (Loving v. Virginia [1967]), the Warren Court invoked strict scrutiny to strike down a statute that punished blacks and whites equally.

The requirement that legislation challenged under the equal protection clause be reasonable or rational, the standard used in Yick Wo and Plessy, was now reserved only for situations that did not involve fundamental rights or suspect categories, the “New Court” applying it, for example, to economic classifications. These received deferential scrutiny; it was sufficient that government was able to establish a legitimate goal for its legislation and to demonstrate that the means employed had a rational relationship to the goal.

In addition to race and ethnicity, the late Warren Court appeared interested in expanding the number of suspect categories adding illegitimacy. The Burger Court seemed to add alienage. Subsequently, however the Burger Court cut back on both.

More significant during the Warren Court was the use of “strict scrutiny” in reviewing equal protection claims that involved rights identified as fundamental, such as the rights to vote in Reynolds v. Sims (1964), and Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections (1966), and access to courts in Douglas v. California (1963).

The Burger Court signaled in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez (1973) a reluctance to expand neither fundamental rights nor suspect categories. By a five-to-four vote, it rejected the claim that poverty constituted a “suspect class,” and education, a “fundamental right.”

Equal Protection and Gender

In contrast to its general reluctance and that of the succeeding Rehnquist Court to expand on either concept, the Burger Court began a judicial revolution affecting gender-based classifications. Although the Court in Reed v. Reed (1971) claimed that it was simply determining whether the differential treatment prescribed by the challenged Idaho statute was reasonable, two years later a four-member bloc sought to elevate gender to suspect status in Frontiero v. Richardson (1973). Justice William Brennan, who had argued in Frontiero that gender should be treated as a suspect category, subsequently fashioned what has been referred to as an intermediate test between suspect and nonsuspect classes or rationality with bite. According to Brennan in Craig v. Boren (1976), “classifications based on gender must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives.” With the appointments of Justices Sandra Day O’Connor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg and, despite the failure of the equal rights amendment to win ratification, the Court has moved ever closer to placing gender on the same level as race. Justice Ginsburg’s opinion in the 1996 case of United States v. Virginia (1996) called for “skeptical scrutiny of official action denying rights or opportunities based on sex,” while at the same time conceding that “[t]he heightened review standard our precedent establishes does not make sex a proscribed classification.” Unanswered is whether under “skeptical scrutiny” any classification based on gender would survive that would not survive under “strict scrutiny.”

Equal protection, despite Holmes’s observation, is surely no longer a forgotten section of the Constitution.

FRANCIS GRAHAM LEE

References and Further Reading

- Abraham, Henry J. "Some Post-Bakke-and-Weber Reflections on 'Reverse Discrimination.'" In Taking the Constitution Seriously: Essays on the Constitution and Constitutional Law, edited by Gary L. McDowell. Dubuque, IA: Kendall-Hunt, 1981.
- Cottrol, Robert J., Raymond T. Diamond, and Leland B. Ware. Brown v. Board of Education: Caste, Culture, and the Constitution. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.
- Fairman, Charles. Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–88, Part One. New York: Macmillan, 1971.
- Graglio, Lino A. Disaster by Decree: The Supreme Court Decisions on Race and the Schools. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1976.
- Kelly, Alfred H., Winfred A. Harbison, and Herman Belz. The American Constitution: Its Origin and Development. Vol. 2, 7th ed. New York: W.W. Norton, 1991.
- Klarman, Michael J. From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: The Supreme Court and the Struggle for Racial Equality. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Kluger, Richard. Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1975.
- Lee, Francis Graham. Equal Protection: Rights and Liberties under the Law. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2003.
- Myrdal, Gunnar. An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy. New York: Harper, 1944.
- Patterson, James T. Brown v. Board of Education: A Civil Rights Milestone and Its Troubled Legacy. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Pritchett, C. Herman. Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954.
- Reams, Bernard D. Jr., and Paul E. Wilson. Segregation and the Fourteenth Amendment in the States. Buffalo, NY: William S. Hein, 1975.
- Wilkinson, J. Harvie. From Brown to Bakke: The Supreme Court and School Integration, 1954–1978. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Buchanan v. Warley*, 245 U.S. 60 (1917)
- The Civil Rights Cases*, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
- Corrigan v. Buckley*, 271 U.S. 323 (1926)
- Craig v. Boren*, 429 U.S. 190 (1976)
- Douglas v. California*, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)
- Frontiero v. Richardson*, 411 U.S. 677 (1973)
- Grutter v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 306 (2003)
- Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections*, 383 U.S. 663 (1966)
- Keyes v. School District No. 1, Denver*, 413 U.S. 189 (1973)
- Korematsu v. United States*, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)
- Loving v. Virginia*, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)
- McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents*, 339 U.S. 637 (1950)
- Milliken v. Bradley*, 418 U.S. 717 (1974)
- Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada*, 305 U.S. 337 (1938)
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
- Reed v. Reed*, 404 U.S. 71 (1971)
- Regents of the University of California v. Bakke*, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)
- Reynolds v. Sims*, 377 U.S. 533 (1964)

- Shelley v. Kraemer*, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)
- San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez*, 411 U.S. 1 (1973)
- Skinner v. Oklahoma*, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)
- The Slaughterhouse Cases*, 83 U.S. 36 (1873)
- Strauder v. West Virginia*, 100 U.S. 303 (1880)
- Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education*, 402 U.S. 1 (1971)
- Sweatt v. Painter*, 339 U.S. 629 (1950)
- United States v. Carolene Products*, 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
- United States v. Virginia*, 518 U.S. 515 (1996)
- Yick Wo v. Hopkins*, 118 U.S. 356 (1886)

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

The equal rights amendment (ERA) is best known as a proposed amendment to the U.S. Constitution, almost ratified in the 1970s, that would have specifically barred government-sanctioned discrimination on the basis of gender. However, the 1970s ERA was the second version of this amendment. An earlier, potentially broader version had been proposed by suffragists shortly after women were granted the right to vote in 1920. Further, many states have incorporated their own versions of an ERA into their state constitutions. These state-level ERAs provide a window into the impact that a federal ERA might have had on women's legal status in the United States.

The Legal and Historic Context of the ERA

The original U.S. Constitution was written at a time when only white men were deemed to be public citizens with the right to vote, hold property, and hold office. Because of this common understanding, there was little need to specifically address gender in a public, political document such as the Constitution. Except for the generic use of male pronouns, the language of the Constitution is gender-neutral, and might be taken to apply to both men and women. But there is virtually nothing in the historical record to indicate that the founders of the Republic considered, or intended to address, women's status.

Instead, for much of U.S. history, the Constitution was deemed to apply to men alone. Upper-middle-class women began to mobilize for greater legal equality in the early nineteenth century. In 1848, abolitionists Lucretia Mott and Elizabeth Cady Stanton convened a women's convention in Seneca Falls, New York. The 1848 Declaration of Sentiments adopted by the convention was one of the first public demands for women's legal equality. Deliberately paraphrasing the Declaration of Independence, the Declaration of Sentiments' second paragraph begins: "We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men and women are created equal.” After the Civil War, leading women’s rights activists Susan B. Anthony and Sojourner Truth fought in vain to have women included in the new constitutional amendments giving rights to former slaves. Instead, the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is a model of terse drafting, providing simply that a state shall not “deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” Without independent personhood, women, white or black, were not protected by this clause. Similarly, the Fifteenth Amendment, ratified in 1870, granted freed male slaves—but not women, white or black—the right to vote.

Decades of marches, litigation, civil disobedience, and activism followed, and women finally gained the right to vote—and constitutional recognition—with the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920. By that time, suffragists were already planning the next phase of their campaign for women’s legal equality. Voting aside, many laws and informal practices perpetuated men’s privileged status and relegated women to second-class citizenship. In 1923, while in Seneca Falls for the seventy-fifth anniversary of the 1848 Women’s Rights Convention, Alice Paul, the head of the National Women’s Party and a leading suffragist, introduced a new constitutional ERA. The proposed ERA read in its entirety: “Men and women shall have equal rights throughout the United States and in every place subject to its jurisdiction. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.”

Alice Paul and other activists in the National Women’s Party worked tirelessly in support of the amendment, but progress was slow. Among other things, labor leaders were concerned that women’s equality would eliminate protective labor laws that treated men and women differently. Significant women’s groups, such as the League of Women Voters, the Consumers’ League, and the YWCA, also opposed the amendment strategy, believing that preserving special treatment for women was preferable to blanket equality. Many other women’s groups remained on the sidelines. Despite the efforts by the National Women’s Party, the amendment campaign made little progress through the 1920s and 1930s. By 1937, the only major women’s group to endorse the ERA was the National Federation of Business and Professional Women’s Clubs. Hoping to breathe new life into the campaign by narrowing its scope and focusing more directly on governmental (as opposed to private) discrimination, in 1943, Paul rewrote the ERA to track the language of the post-Civil War constitutional amendments. The substantive provision stated: “Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.”

Although the ERA was introduced in every subsequent session of Congress, there was still no favorable congressional action. In 1946, it was passed out of committee and narrowly defeated by the full Senate; in 1950 and 1953, the Senate passed the ERA, but with a rider that nullified important aspects of the amendment. Finally, in the 1960s, the newly reenergized women’s rights movement, led by the National Organization for Women, broke the logjam. Women’s equality became politically acceptable. Organized labor groups like the National Education Association and the United Auto Workers called for the ERA’s ratification. The League of Women Voters reversed their longstanding position and endorsed the amendment. The 1943 version of the ERA passed the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives by the requisite two-thirds majority, and on March 22, 1972, it was sent to the states for ratification. At the time, Congress placed a seven-year time limit on the ratification process.

In the first year, the ERA received twenty-two of the thirty-eight state ratifications needed. But as ERA opposition forces rallied, the pace of ratification slowed. Twelve more states had ratified the amendment by 1976. In 1977, Indiana became the thirty-fifth and final state to ratify the ERA. As the 1979 ratification deadline approached, at the behest of women’s rights leaders, Congress granted an extension until June 30, 1982.

However, political momentum was turning against the ERA. Phyllis Schlafly, founder of the National Committee to Stop ERA, became a prominent spokesperson against ratification. Schlafly and other ERA opponents tailored their messages to women who might be persuaded to oppose equal rights. They argued that the ERA would eliminate women’s privacy rights, requiring co-ed bathrooms and physical education classes, and that women would be sent into combat alongside men. Further, they claimed, a federal ERA would create a constitutional right to abortion. In 1980, the Republican Party removed support of the ERA from its platform and Ronald Reagan, an active opponent of the ERA, was elected president. Despite massive mobilization by pro-ERA activists, there were no more ratification votes, and the effort to amend the Constitution by the 1982 deadline fell three states short.

The ERA has been reintroduced in every session of Congress since that time. Passage of the reintroduced ERA would again require a vote of two-thirds of each house of Congress and ratification by thirty-eight states. Under an alternative strategy advanced by some activists, Congress could repeal the 1982 time limit on ERA ratification, opening up the possibility of final ratification sometime in the future if three additional states approve.

The ERA's Impact

Because the ERA was never ratified, the U.S. Supreme Court has not been directly called upon to construe it. However, the Supreme Court's decisions in the area of women's equality have played a role in the ERA debate. In particular, because the Court has construed women's equal protection rights in areas that would have been addressed by the ERA, some argue that regardless of whether the ERA was legally significant in an earlier time, it is now no longer necessary. On the other hand, because existing Supreme Court jurisprudence on women's equality has developed on a case-by-case basis, it leaves gaps that would arguably be filled by a more comprehensive constitutional amendment.

Until 1971, the U.S. Supreme Court had never struck down a state or federal law on the basis of its discrimination against women. This fact gave considerable impetus to the ERA movement, since it appeared that existing constitutional doctrine might not be capable of addressing women's equality. However, in 1971, the Court in Reed v. Reed struck down an Idaho law that barred women from administering estates in probate court. And in 1973, in Frontiero v. Richardson, the Court struck down the federal law providing gender-based benefits to military dependents. The federal ERA specifically figured in the latter case. The Court's opinion, written by Justice William Brennan, held that the statutory scheme was unconstitutional and applied the highest level of skepticism, that is, strict scrutiny, in evaluating the gender-based classifications. Strict scrutiny had previously been reserved for race-based classifications. However, only four justices joined that opinion. A fifth justice concluded that the statute was illegal even without any special scrutiny. And three other justices, led by Justice Lewis Powell, concluded that while the statute was illegal, it was inappropriate to decide the particular level of scrutiny to be applied to sex-based classifications while the ERA—then before the states—was pending ratification.

Although ERA ratification remained open until 1982, the standard of scrutiny to be applied to sex-based classifications was settled earlier, in 1976. In Craig v. Boren, a case concerning sex-based laws regulating underage drinking, the Court finally adopted an intermediate scrutiny standard, lower than that applied in cases of race discrimination. Under the intermediate standard, a sex-based classification must be substantially related to an important governmental purpose.

In subsequent cases, the Supreme Court has found that a number of sex-based laws can meet this intermediate standard, including selective service laws, and laws delineating rights of mothers and fathers of out-of-wedlock children. Many other laws and practices, however, have been struck down as unconstitutional, including unequal single-sex schools, sex-based preemptory challenges to jurors, and sex-based allocation of government benefits. These decisions of the Supreme Court and lower courts have done much to undermine the perceived urgency of ratifying the ERA. Similarly, statutes like Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 have provided redress for much of the educational discrimination that once faced women and girls. In short, the purposes that the ERA was intended to address when it was introduced in 1943 have been to some extent superseded by developments dictated by the courts and Congress.

The legislative history of the ERA, however, suggests that a constitutional ERA would have required more than the spotty intermediate scrutiny standard developed by the courts. An authoritative source for this interpretation is a 1970 Yale Law Journal article that comprehensively reviews the potential applications of the ERA. The article, which is cited in the Congressional Record on the ERA debate, interprets the ERA to require the highest level of scrutiny, and surveys labor legislation, domestic relations law, criminal law, and equality in the military. Under its analysis, the ERA would not have permitted separate but equal facilities for women except in those areas where privacy involving personal bodily functions dictated separation of the sexes. Further, the Yale authors conclude that the ERA would have required a restructuring of the military to involve women equally in the draft and in all aspects of military activity.

State ERAs

Although the federal ERA ultimately failed, a number of state constitutions contain their own separate ERAs. Some of these equality provisions, like those in Wyoming and Utah, were part of the original state constitutions. Others, like those in Massachusetts and Illinois, were enacted at the time the federal ERA effort was at its height. In all, eighteen state constitutions have some version of a constitutional sex-based equality provision. State courts cases construing these provisions provide instructive examples of the national impact that might have been felt from a federal ERA had it been tested and applied in the courts.

First, while the 1943 version of the federal ERA, tracking earlier constitutional amendments, has been construed to apply only to governmental action, some state ERAs have been applied more broadly. For example, some Pennsylvania state courts have indicated that the state's ERA is not limited to governmental activities but extends protections from sex discrimination to every sphere of state life.

Second, as predicted by the Yale authors, many of these state ERAs have been construed to include exceptions for personal privacy and biological functions unique to one sex. Thus, an ERA state may still provide single-sex bathrooms in its government buildings, and may extend pregnancy-related benefits (as opposed to parental benefits) only to women. However, some states have taken a broad view of what is biologically "unique" about the sexes. For example, under one Texas court's construction, a state may have a law criminalizing women's exposure of their chests while not imposing such requirements on men.

Third, some state ERAs have been construed to permit affirmative action and to go beyond preferences to uphold rigid, sex-based quotas. For example, a Washington State rule that required parity on political committees was upheld under that state's ERA.

Fourth, in several states, abortion funding restrictions have been struck down as violating state ERAs. New Mexico is an example. Applying the state's ERA, the New Mexico Supreme Court examined whether any similar funding restrictions had been imposed on men needing medical procedures. Finding none, the court concluded that the policy singling out a procedure needed only by women reflected a gender bias that was illegal under the ERA.

Finally, it is important to note that not all state ERAs have been construed so aggressively. The state ERA of Virginia, for example, has been held to require no more than the scrutiny accorded under the federal constitution, that is, intermediate scrutiny. Because of this, the Virginia ERA has little independent force.

Contemporary ERAs

Times have changed since 1943. The constitutional backdrop for the ERA debate is considerably more complex. In the intervening years, social movements have strengthened and waned. National politics have shifted to the right. Many women's rights activists are working to promote U.S. participation in global women's rights efforts, including urging the federal government to ratify the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women. But despite these developments, many members of the women's movement, particularly organizations such as the National Organization for Women and the Feminist Majority Foundation, continue to work to promote a constitutional equality amendment for women. Toward that goal, in 1995, the National NOW Conference adopted a working draft of a new constitutional equality amendment.

Reflecting the influence of more contemporary approaches to constitutional drafting, the proposed amendment is significantly longer and more detailed than prior ERA proposals. For example, it specifically addresses the standard of scrutiny to be applied ("the highest"), rather than leave that issue to be resolved by the courts. Further, the amendment goes beyond sex discrimination to provide for equal rights without regard to "sex, race, sexual orientation, marital status, ethnicity, national origin, color or indigence." It also specifically permits affirmative action. Interestingly, however, NOW's proposed constitutional equality amendment comes full circle, rejecting a focus on governmental action and returning in its opening paragraph to the broad, original language proposed by Alice Paul in 1923: "Women and men shall have equal rights throughout the United States and in every place subject to its jurisdiction."

MARTHA F. DAVIS

References and Further Reading

- Archer v. Mayes*, 213 Va. 633 (1973).
- Berry, Mary Frances. Why ERA Failed. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986.
- Brown, Barbara, Thomas I. Emerson, Gail Falk, and Ann E. Freedman, The Equal Rights Amendment: A Constitutional Basis for Equal Rights of Women, Yale Law Journal 80 (1971): 5:871-985.
- Friesen, Jennifer. State Constitutional Law: Litigating Individual Rights, Claims and Defenses. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Publishing, 2000.
- Mansbridge, Jane J. Why We Lost the ERA. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Marchioro v. Chaney*, 585 P.2d. 487 (Wash.), aff'd on other grounds, 442 U.S. 191 (1979).
- McBride-Stetson, Dorothy. Women's Rights in the U.S.A: Policy Debates and Gender Roles. 3rd ed. New York: Routledge, 2004.
- MJR's Fare of Dallas v. City of Dallas*, 792 S.W.2d 569 (Tex. Ct. App. 1990).
- National Organization for Women. NOW and Economic Equity. <http://www.now.org/issues/economic/cea.html>.
- New Mexico Right to Choose/NARAL v. Johnson*, 975 P.2d 841 (Becker, N.M. 1998).
- Susan D. The Origins of the Equal Rights Amendment: American Feminism Between the Wars. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1981.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, adopted December 18, 1979, art. 6, 1249 U.N.T.S. 13, 17
Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976)
Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973)
Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71 (1971)
 Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. sec. 2000e, et seq
 Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, 20 U.S.C. sec. 1681–1688

See also Anthony, Susan B.; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Ginsburg, Ruth Bader; National Organization for Women; Schlafly, Phyllis Stewart; Stanton, Elizabeth Cady; State Constitutional Distinctions

CITY OF ERIE v. PAP'S A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000)

An Erie, Pennsylvania, law outlawed the act of appearing in public, either knowingly or intentionally, in a “state of nudity.” Respondent Pap’s A.M. (a Pennsylvania corporation) ran “Kandyland,” a strip club that featured totally nude female erotic dancers. In order to comply with the law, the dancers at Kandyland had to wear, at a minimum, “pasties” and a “G-string.”

Pap’s filed suit seeking declaratory relief and a permanent injunction against the enforcement of the ordinance. The Court of Common Pleas struck the ordinance down as unconstitutional. The Commonwealth Court reversed. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court reversed this ruling and held that the ordinance violated Pap’s freedom of expression under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court followed the U.S. Supreme Court’s ruling in Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc. (1991) and held that nude dancing is expressive conduct entitled to some level of First Amendment protection. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court found that the ordinance was not content-neutral and therefore applied strict-scrutiny review.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in Pap’s, held that the ordinance should be analyzed under the framework set forth by the Court in United States v. O’Brien (1961). The Court held that the ordinance at issue satisfied O’Brien’s four-factor test and was therefore constitutionally valid. The Court held that the ordinance was within Erie’s power to protect public health and safety, it furthered an important governmental interest related to the “secondary effects” of nude dancing, it was unrelated to the suppression of free expression, and the restriction was no greater than is essential to the furtherance of the government interest.

MARC M. HARROLD

References and Further Reading

Harrold, Marc M., Stripping Away at the First Amendment: The Increasingly Paternal Voice of Our Living Constitution, University of Memphis Law Review 32 (Winter 2002): 403.
 Leahy, Christopher Thomas, The First Amendment Gone Awry: City of Erie v. Pap’s A.M., Ailing Analytical Structures, and the Suppression of Protected Expression, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 150 (2002): 1021–1078.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991)
United States v. O’Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

ERZNOZNIK v. CITY OF JACKSONVILLE, 422 U.S. 205 (1975)

A Jacksonville, Florida, ordinance prohibited drive-in theaters (and only drive-in theaters) from exhibiting any films that contained nudity visible from a public street or place. Erznoznik, manager of a drive-in theater, was charged with showing an R-rated film, Class of ’74, which ran afoul this law. The theater’s screen was visible from the street and a church parking lot. Florida’s courts upheld the ordinance after Erznoznik challenged its constitutionality. Although the film was not declared obscene, this case is one of several related to the Court’s emerging secondary-effects doctrine dealing with nudity.

Jacksonville argued that it could protect its children and citizens against unwilling exposure to offensive material. At oral argument, the city added that the ordinance prevented displays of nudity which might affect traffic safety. In a six-to-three decision, the Supreme Court struck down the ordinance as both overbroad and not content-neutral. Powell, writing for the majority, was joined by Brennan, Douglas, Stewart, Marshall, and Blackmun. Burger, joined by Rehnquist, dissented as did White. The conference vote had been deadlocked at four to four because Douglas was in the hospital. At conference, Powell and Stewart voted to uphold the ordinance but later switched their votes; White, it appears, changed his vote after Powell circulated his opinion.

The ordinance, according to Powell, “sweepingly forbids display of all films containing any uncovered buttocks or breasts, irrespective of context or pervasiveness.” As examples, he mentions a “baby’s buttocks, the nude body of a war victim . . . newsreel scenes of the opening of an art exhibit.” The problem thus arises that when a government, acting as a censor, decides to “shield the public from some kinds of speech on the ground that they are more offensive than others, the First Amendment strictly limits its power.” Moreover, the ordinance “discriminates among movies solely on the basis of content . . . however innocent or educational” the nudity might be in the films; the ordinance was not content-neutral, as films without nudity could be just as distracting or disturbing for people in nearby areas or driving motor vehicles.

White’s brief dissent objects to Powell’s conclusion in Part IIA of his opinion, where Powell writes, “Thus, we conclude that the limited privacy interests of persons on the public streets cannot justify [Jacksonville’s] censorship of otherwise protected speech on the basis of its content.” White states this “broadside” goes too far if it means expressive nudity on public streets or in other public places cannot be banned because of the limited privacy rights of other persons in those places who may “merely look the other way.” White, however, agrees that the ordinance is fatally overbroad, and if the majority had limited itself to this conclusion he may not have dissented.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

Dickson, Del. The Supreme Court in Conference (1940–1985). New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
Woodward, Bob, and Scott Armstrong. The Brethren. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1979.

ESCOBEDO v. ILLINOIS, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)

Danny Escobedo was arrested by police and told that another suspect, Benedict DiGerlando, had named him as the person that fired the fatal shot that killed Escobedo’s brother-in-law Manuel. Escobedo, refusing to admit his involvement, asked to see his lawyer. At about the same time, Escobedo’s lawyer arrived and asked to speak to his client. Both Escobedo and his lawyer were denied their requests. After some time, the police officers told Escobedo that if he would testify against DiGerlando they would set him free. Without access to his lawyer and without being informed of his right to remain silent, Escobedo made statements against DiGerlando that incriminated himself. These statements were later used to help convict Escobedo of murder.

The Supreme Court of Illinois affirmed the conviction, holding that the statements were admissible because they were made voluntarily even though without the assistance of counsel. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed. The Court found that statements shall be inadmissible when the circumstances of an investigation are such that (1) the person under investigation becomes the target of the investigation, (2) he is not informed of his right to remain silent, (3) he has asked for but been denied access to counsel, and (4) he makes statements that will be prejudicial later at trial. The Court’s opinion severely restricted how police obtain confessions by making it clear that the right to counsel extends beyond the formal institution of proceedings to include pre-indictment examinations. The opinion would lead to the landmark Miranda v. Arizona decision.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

Israel, Jerold H., Yale Kamisar, and Wayne R. LaFare. Criminal Procedure and the Constitution. St. Paul, MN: West, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Miranda Warning; Right to Counsel

ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE (I): HISTORY, BACKGROUND, FRAMING

Since the Establishment Clause is located at the beginning of the First Amendment, it is referred to at times as our “first freedom”: “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion . . .” This article will provide a general guide to understanding the Establishment Clause by describing the historical context of its framing, the process by which it was drafted, and the history of its interpretation and application.

Historical Background

In medieval Europe, after the fall of the Roman Empire and the failure of the attempt to replace it with a Christian empire, political power was fragmented. The bond of a common religion was the only bond that united Western Christian society. In this context, as difficult as it is to imagine today, religious persecution seemed to be not only unavoidable, but necessary. It was taken for granted that rulers had both the right and a duty to punish religious error. With the coming of the Reformation in the sixteenth century, Protestants and Catholics disagreed vehemently about the true content of Christian doctrine, but both groups assumed that a ruler's power would continue to be used to root out and eradicate the errors of those who disagreed with the prevailing side. Reformation-era civil authorities were expected to use their power to enforce religious uniformity.

Accordingly, when the New England colonies were founded by the Puritans, a group known for its commitment to the "New Reformation" project of purifying the Church of England, New England's colonial legislatures, courts, and magistrates involved themselves in supporting the Puritan faith and suppressing any dissenters. Any who refused to comply were free to leave, in the eyes of the Puritan leadership. Any who would not leave were to be punished, in an effort to force the dissenters to abandon their ways and return to living in conformity with Puritan beliefs and expectations.

The most significant early challenge to religious conformity in New England arose when certain colonists who had come to believe that infant baptism could not be biblically justified would either turn their backs or walk out of church to avoid participating in the baptism of children. These early Puritan dissenters, who came to be known as "Baptists," were then haled into court, where they were warned or fined. Those who refused to pay their fines were imprisoned, and the most defiant were whipped.

Meanwhile, in 1636, after being banished from the Massachusetts Bay Colony for his own disagreements with Puritan authorities, Roger Williams had founded the new colony of Providence Plantations, just to the south, where Baptists were free to worship as they pleased. The Puritans' efforts to suppress those Baptists who remained in Massachusetts continued, unsuccessfully, until 1679. That year, a letter came from King Charles II in which he expressed his support for "freedom and liberty of conscience" for all non-Catholic Christians. Puritan authorities responded by halting the practice of imposing criminal punishments on those who refused to conform to Puritan beliefs and practices.

Although Puritan authorities no longer attempted to enforce religious conformity by persecuting dissenters as criminals, they did continue to attempt to promote the Puritan (or, as it came to be known, Congregational) religion in various ways. Massachusetts authorities subjected Baptists and other dissenters to a compulsory religious taxation system that was designed to fund Congregational churches in every settlement. The authorities also required that only the preachers and churches that they had approved could engage in religious activity. This effectively barred non-Puritan worship in Massachusetts until William and Mary issued Massachusetts a new charter in 1691 that granted religious freedom to all Protestants. As for the religious tax, those who refused to pay could be imprisoned, and their property seized and sold at auction to pay the bill. The prosecution of those who refused to pay the tax continued until the early 1700s, when a series of laws was passed to exempt dissenters from this religious tax. The courts interpreted these exemption laws very narrowly, however, with the result that dissenters were still often subjected to imprisonment and the seizure and sale of their property thereafter.

By the outbreak of the Revolution, Puritanism's hold on religion in New England had loosened to the point that each locality was permitted to choose (by majority vote) which church to establish. The will of the majority in a given locality determined which church (usually but not always a Congregational church) would receive the religious taxes collected there. It would not be until 1782 that the Baptists succeeded in having this system declared to be a violation of the Massachusetts Constitution.

Elsewhere, not all colonies had formally established a single church as the official religion. In Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, Rhode Island, and most of New York, no one church was officially established. There were, however, laws requiring religious tests for office; blasphemy laws; and other forms of legal support for the Christian faith. Most of these were still in place through the period that the Constitution was ratified and the First Amendment adopted.

In five Southern colonies, however, from Maryland through Georgia, plus the four counties of metropolitan New York, the Church of England had become the established church. Maryland had originally been founded as a haven for Catholics fleeing persecution in England, but the Glorious Revolution of 1688, which brought about the replacement of Catholic King James II with the Protestants William and Mary, sparked a wave of anti-Catholicism in Maryland that led to the establishment of the Church of England there. Throughout these Southern colonies, laws were enacted to require attendance at Anglican services, to provide financial support for Anglican clergy, to control the clergy selection process, to dictate religious doctrine, to give certain civil powers to church officials, and to penalize participation in non-Anglican worship.

By the mid-1700s, the influx into Virginia of dissenting missionaries who had been inspired by the evangelistic fervor of the Great Awakening had led to the creation of a system that permitted non-Anglicans to worship freely if they were to obtain one of a limited number of licenses. Initially, Presbyterians, Baptists, and other dissenters complied with this system. In the mid-1760s, however, a new type of Baptists, known as Separate-Baptists (ex-New England Congregationalists who had split from their former churches in rigid adherence to the Baptist position on infant baptism) began sending missionaries to Virginia. The Separate-Baptists refused to comply with Virginia's licensure laws on the grounds that civil governments had no authority to license preachers, for God alone governs the church. From 1768 to 1775, Virginia authorities jailed about forty Separate-Baptists for preaching without a license.

In 1774, after a young James Madison witnessed the jailing of some of these Separate-Baptist preachers, he wrote to a friend that he could no longer countenance the "diabolical, hell-conceived" religious persecution in his home state. By 1776, Madison had succeeded in persuading Virginia's Revolutionary Convention to adopt the Virginia Declaration of Rights, which guaranteed for all the right to "the free exercise of religion." In that same year, Virginia's legislature suspended the collection of the compulsory taxes that had been supporting the Church of England, and in 1779 these taxes were repealed. Free exercise protections were not extended, however, to Anglican clergy, who when they were ordained in England were required to take an oath of allegiance to the Crown. The Anglican clergy who refused to violate their oaths were mobbed, beaten, and driven from their pulpits.

In 1785, Patrick Henry championed a bill that would have established Christianity as the state religion of Virginia and imposed a tax that could be directed to the Christian denomination of one's choice (or in the alternative to support public education), but a powerful coalition of dissenters and disestablishment statesmen, led by Madison and Thomas Jefferson, was able to defeat the bill. The next year, the Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom, authored by Jefferson, was enacted. It prohibited any form of compulsory support of religion and guaranteed the rights of all to worship freely.

At the outbreak of the Revolution, nine of the thirteen colonies still had established churches. Only Virginia had, by the time of the adoption of the Establishment Clause, squarely considered and rejected the establishment of religion. Massachusetts, in the course of adopting its new Constitution in 1780, had actually strengthened its system of localized establishments, and every state but Virginia restricted the right to hold office on religious grounds. Five of these states limited public office to Protestants.

The ratification of the U.S. Constitution of 1787 put an end to religious tests for office holding. Article six provides that "no religious test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States." This, the only explicit religious liberty in the Constitution, was controversial due to the risk that it would allow Catholics (who it was feared might persecute Protestants if they were ever to attain a political majority) or non-Christians to hold office.

Drafting

In the years after independence, leading up to the enactment of the First Amendment, many leaders became convinced that the public spiritedness of the Revolutionary era was waning. Some attributed this decline to the collapse of the established church, especially in the South. Virginia had lost half of its clergy during the Revolution, and Connecticut, one-third. In response to this concern, movements arose in nearly every state to institute or strengthen broadly inclusive religious establishments. Civic leaders looked to religion to provide an appreciation of the importance of the common good, which was seen as crucial to the success of the republican form of government.

The countervailing force was concern for religious liberty, which Madison had used as a campaign issue in defeating James Monroe for election from their Virginia district to the first U.S. House of Representatives. Virginia's Baptists had helped Madison to get elected, and when he succeeded, they did not hesitate to remind him of their interest in religious liberty.

Upon arrival, Madison was the spokesperson for religious freedom in the first session of Congress, the session that would begin by considering more than two hundred state-sponsored proposals for amending the new Constitution. Out of these, Madison culled nineteen, and added one of his own. Initially, he planned to work these amendments into the body of the existing Constitution, rather than append them to it in the form of a bill of rights.

With respect to religious freedom, Madison began by proposing his own idea, that the states be prohibited in Article I, section 10, from violating "the equal rights of conscience." With respect to the federal government, Madison proposed that to Article I, section 9, be added: "The civil rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, nor shall any national religion be established, nor shall the full and equal rights of conscience be in any manner, or under any pretext infringed.”

When a House committee took up Madison’s proposals, some representatives were concerned that the anti-Establishment provision in the clause pertaining to the federal government might be interpreted to preclude the courts from protecting the legal rights of clergy. Others worried that the reference to “national religion” conflicted with the structure of the federal system. To avoid these problems, the prohibition against the establishment of a national religion, in the passive voice, was replaced by the subject “Congress,” in the active voice. This clarified that the provision was intended, at the time that the First Amendment was drafted, to limit the powers of the federal legislature only. (Only much later would the U.S. Supreme Court interpret the effect of the Fourteenth Amendment in terms of making the First Amendment apply to the states.) The version that then passed the House read as follows: “Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or to prevent the free exercise thereof, or to infringe the rights of conscience.”

The Senate did not support Madison’s idea about prohibiting the states from violating equal rights of conscience, which effectively ended the First Congress’s consideration of that possibility. In considering the House’s proposal pertaining to the federal government, the Senate countered that Congress should be barred from establishing “articles of faith or a mode of worship,” rather than “religion” in a more general sense, apparently in an attempt to permit financial support for religion but not the endorsement of doctrine or practice. The Senate also dropped the House proposal’s final phrase, about noninfringement of the rights of conscience, presumably because the retained free exercise protection was seen as inclusive of the rights of conscience.

In conference, the House and the Senate finally agreed upon the final version of the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment that Congress passed in 1789 and the states ratified in 1791: “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” Two key changes had been made. First, whereas the House had urged that Congress should be barred from making laws “establishing religion,” and the Senate, from “establishing articles of faith or a mode of worship,” the conference committee proposed that Congress should be prohibited from making laws “respecting an establishment of religion.” Financial support for religion in those states that continued to support churches with taxes would not be disturbed, nor would any other aspect of the existing state religious establishments. Congress could pass no law “respecting an establishment of religion,” whether at the federal or state level, whether the purpose of such a law would be to create or to dismantle it. Second, once the Senate’s references to “articles of faith” and “a mode of worship” were replaced simply with “religion,” the Senate’s ban on Congress “prohibiting the free exercise of religion” could be shortened to “prohibiting the free exercise thereof,” which avoided a second reference to the term “religion,” and thus any possibility that the second reference to religion could be interpreted as having a different meaning than the first.

By the end of the drafting process, the First Congress had developed a proposal to protect religious freedom that contained two complementary halves: the Establishment Clause, which seeks to prevent the imposition of religion by the government, and the Free Exercise Clause, which seeks to prevent governmental imposition on religion. Or as John Witte describes it in Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment, the Establishment Clause prohibits the government from prescribing religion, and the Free Exercise Clause prohibits the government from proscribing religion.

One of the primary current debates about the Establishment Clause focuses on whether it was drafted to prohibit any government support for religion, including support offered on a nonpreferential, inclusive basis, or whether it merely intended to prohibit government support for religion offered on a selective, or preferential, basis. Douglas Laycock, among others, who argue that the drafters of the Establishment Clause intended to prohibit not only governmental preference for one religion over others but also governmental aid to all religions even-handedly, point to the fact that the Senate considered but ultimately rejected four different drafts of the Establishment Clause that would have easily lent themselves to the latter interpretation. Still others, such as Michael Malbin, contend that the drafters intended to permit even-handed, nonpreferential government support for all religion by agreeing to prohibit any law respecting “an establishment of religion,” because hypothetically they might instead have chosen “the establishment of religion.” Their choice of “an” establishment of religion, Malbin maintains, suggests that the drafters intended to bar only selective governmental support for religion, whereas a reference to “the” establishment of religion would have reflected the intent to ban inclusive, even-handed governmental support.

This debate has even split the Supreme Court, as is evident in the opposing views expressed by Justice Souter, for a five-justice majority, taking the position that the drafters intended for the Establishment Clause to prohibit even-handed support for religion in general, and Justice Scalia, on behalf of four justices in dissent, taking the position that they did not so intend, in McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union (2005). Noah Feldman concludes that the answer to this question “seems shrouded in uncertainty,” due in large part to the lack of any consensus at the time regarding whether even-handed governmental support for religion violated basic principles of religious freedom. What was clear to the Framers was that governmental support for selected religious groups and not others did violate the principles that they were attempting to enshrine in the Establishment Clause.

Interpretation and Application

Prior to 1940, the courts interpreted the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment to apply only to Congress, and most questions of religious liberty were left to the states to resolve under their own constitutions. By and large during the early years of the republic, state and local governments did not disturb mainstream Christian activities, but the efforts of evangelical Catholics, Baptists, and Methodists were hampered in New England; abuses against Unitarians, Adventists, and Christian Scientists were ignored in the middle colonies; and Catholics, conservative Episcopalians, and evangelical Protestants were presented with obstacles in the South. In most areas, apart from the largest eastern cities, the religious rights of Jews, Muslims, Native Americans, and enslaved African Americans were not respected. During this period, state and local governments promoted a “public” or civil religion that was generally Christian in character by using religious symbols and ceremonies, subsidizing religious programs, providing special legal protections to certain religious groups, promoting the teaching of basic Christian values, and prohibiting certain conduct on explicitly religious grounds.

Religious groups that could not fit comfortably within the religiously homogenous climate of the early republic were expected to leave, with the frontier providing a “release valve” for religious nonconformists like Mormons, Catholics, Baptists, and Methodists. In the mid- to late nineteenth century, however, the traditional Protestant homogeneity of the East was disrupted by influxes of Methodists, Baptists, and Roman Catholics along with scores of newly formed religious groups such as Disciples, Jehovah’s Witnesses, Pentecostals, Unitarians, and Universalists. These diverse groups challenged state and local policies that promoted traditional Protestantism, with the Baptists and Methodists calling for genuine separation of church and state. State and local governments responded by seeking out ways to hamper the efforts of the new groups, such as by denying charters to Catholic schools and preaching permits to Jehovah’s Witnesses. In the face of such overt discrimination, these dissenting groups turned to the federal courts for relief.

In the landmark cases of Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940) and Everson v. Board of Education (1947), the U.S. Supreme Court determined for the first time that the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment applied equally to local, state, and federal government. The Everson Court’s ruling sent the message that state and local support for the beliefs and activities of dominant religious groups would now be open to challenge.

In the wake of the Everson decision, hundreds of Establishment Clause cases poured into the lower courts. Nearly three-quarters of those that reached the Supreme Court represented challenges to prevailing patterns of state and local support for religious education. As summarized by John Witte in “From Establishment to Freedom of Public Religion,” this series of Supreme Court Establishment Clause rulings banned religion from the public schools, whether in the form of prayers, moments of silence, the reading of scripture, the storage of religious books, the teaching of doctrine, the display of symbols, or the use of religious services or facilities. These rulings also banned public support for religious schools, whether in the form of salaries, services, reimbursements for administering required examinations, loans of state-required educational resources or counseling services, or tax deductions or credits for tuition costs.

By 1971, the Court had formulated a three-part Establishment Clause test to guide its decision making. As set forth in Lemon v. Kurtzman, any government action challenged under the Establishment Clause needs to satisfy three criteria. It must (1) have a secular purpose, (2) not have a primary effect that either advances or inhibits religion, and (3) not foster any excessive entanglement between government and religion. If the government’s action fails to meet any of these three criteria, under the Lemon test the Establishment Clause has been violated and the government must discontinue the offending activity.

Some members of the Supreme Court have come to question the adequacy of the Lemon test for resolving Establishment Clause disputes. In the 1984 case of Lynch v. Donnelly, Justice O’Connor offered a distinctive perspective in a concurring opinion that emphasized the impression that an ordinary citizen would have regarding the activity in question. Her perspective, now known as the “endorsement test,” asks whether a reasonable observer would view the government's action as either official endorsement or disapproval of religion. Her concern was that governmental endorsement of religion might give some members of the community whose beliefs have been officially recognized the impression that they have some special civil status, or conversely, the impression that they lack such status if their beliefs have not been sanctioned. Justice O'Connor consistently applied the endorsement test to Establishment Clause cases that she helped to decide, but it has never been embraced by a majority of the justices as a replacement for the Lemon test.

Five years after Lynch, in the 1989 case of County of Allegheny v. ACLU, Justice Kennedy unveiled another challenge to the Lemon test, the "coercion test." Justice Kennedy's concern was that the Court's contemporary Establishment Clause jurisprudence tends to manifest a certain degree of hostility toward religion, in contrast to the pattern of positive interaction between government and religion that can be observed through the course of U.S. history. To avoid undue governmental hostility toward religion, Justice Kennedy would give government a fair degree of latitude in accommodating and acknowledging religion, so long as government has not coerced someone to support or participate in religion. Justice Kennedy has continued to apply his coercion test to Establishment Clause cases, but (as with the endorsement test) the coercion test has not been embraced by a majority of justices as a replacement for the Lemon test.

Given the multiplicity of competing tests, every Establishment Clause case that reaches the Supreme Court presents an opportunity for the Court to set Lemon aside in favor of another test. Much speculation attends every Establishment Clause decision, as Supreme Court observers await a clarification of Establishment Clause jurisprudence.

When the manner in which the Court has resolved Establishment Clause cases is carefully analyzed, however, it becomes clear that the Court has never confined itself to any of these three competing Establishment Clause tests in resolving these cases. Rather, the Court has consistently, although not systematically, applied a series of questions to scrutinize the government's conduct for Establishment Clause violations. The following paragraphs present these questions in their logical sequence, although any given Supreme Court ruling might not treat all of them, and might not do so in the same order.

The threshold Establishment Clause issue is whether a constitutionally significant governmental imposition of religion has taken place. Without such a finding, the Court need not proceed to consider the challenge any further. In considering this issue, the Court has found that not all governmental impositions of religion are constitutionally significant: the burden that allowing parents to deduct the cost of parochial education from their taxable income imposes on all other taxpayers was found to be too attenuated to be constitutionally significant in Mueller v. Allen (1983). Nor is the expression of religion by nongovernmental actors an Establishment Clause violation: the temporary placement of crosses by the Ku Klux Klan on the grounds of Ohio's state capitol was an instance of private, not governmental, action and thus no Establishment Clause violation in Capital Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette (1995).

If a constitutionally significant governmental imposition of religion is found, the issue becomes whether there is a legitimate governmental purpose behind the action in question. If there is not, then government must discontinue engaging in the challenged activity. In Mueller, for example, it was legitimate for the government to grant parents of parochial school children a tax deduction to defray the parents' educational expenses, to promote the health of private schools, and to support quality education. On the other hand, a requirement that an official prayer be read at the start of every public school day for the sake of the "moral and spiritual training" of the students was found not to have a legitimate Establishment Clause purpose in Engel v. Vitale (1962).

If the government is able to assert with some degree of persuasiveness that a legitimate purpose lies behind its action, the issue becomes whether the case in question arises in the special context in which there is a significant risk of governmental entanglement in the operational autonomy of religious institutions. This, the third prong of the Lemon test, justifies governmental refusal to get involved in the operation of religious institutions, for example, by exempting them from certain types of taxes to avoid the necessity of scrutinizing their internal financial records, as in Walz v. Tax Commission (1970), or due to the monitoring that would be necessary to prevent publicly funded special education teachers from teaching religion in parochial schools, as in Lemon.

Provided a case involving a constitutionally significant governmental imposition of religion and a legitimate governmental purpose does not stand to entangle government in the operational autonomy of religious institutions, a series of four questions can be employed to scrutinize the nature of the relationship between the imposition of religion and the governmental interest that has been asserted to legitimate the action. In this kind of case, if the answer to any of these four questions is "yes," an Establishment Clause violation has occurred.

First, the Court can ask whether there is a clear indication that the governmental purpose that has been asserted is actually a pretext to mask other, illegitimate governmental motives. In Wallace v. Jaffree (1985), for example, Alabama's provision for a moment of silence for "meditation or voluntary prayer" in the public schools, when a previous version of the statute in question had authorized only a moment for "meditation," revealed the inappropriately religious motives behind the statutory change.

Second, the Court can inquire as to whether there is a lack of solid evidence regarding the existence of the problem that the government claims it is trying to solve. In Everson, in which public funding of transportation to parochial schools was challenged, the Court determined that the evidence showed that there are no alternatives to public school transportation systems that are equally safe for the children. In Texas Monthly v. Bullock (1989), by contrast, the Court found that the evidence did not support the government's claim that it was necessary to exempt religious publications from a sales tax to avoid violating religious beliefs or inhibiting religious activity.

Third, the Court can consider whether there are adequate alternative means that would enable the government to achieve its purposes without implicating Establishment Clause concerns. To illustrate, in Everson, the Court found that there are no alternatives to publicly funded school transportation systems that are equally safe for children. In Abington Township School District v. Schempp (1963), by contrast, Justice Brennan's concurring opinion emphasized that students can be taught morality just as effectively by studying the speeches of great Americans as they could by studying the Bible.

Fourth, the Court can ask whether the government has delegated one of its core functions to a group chosen according to a religious criterion. To illustrate, in Larkin v. Grendel's Den (1982), the Court disallowed a statute that granted veto power over applications for liquor licenses to churches within 500 feet of an applicant's premises. Similarly, in Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet (1994), the Court ruled that the creation of a special school district to serve a village inhabited solely by members of a particular Jewish sect violated the Establishment Clause.

As the foregoing discussion reveals, the court has consistently employed a series of several different questions when resolving Establishment Clause cases that are not all reflected in the three-prong Lemon test, nor in the even more narrowly focused "endorsement" or "coercion" tests. These latter two tests focus mainly on the first threshold question that the Court has tended to ask in analyzing Establishment Clause cases: whether a constitutionally significant governmental imposition of religion has taken place. They do not incorporate the other areas of inquiry to which the Court has attended in resolving the Establishment Clause cases that have come before it. Adoption of either one of these tests, therefore, would compress the Court's Establishment Clause analysis, limiting it to resolving these cases on the basis primarily of what has historically amounted to a threshold determination about whether a constitutionally significant governmental imposition of religion has taken place.

Since it is notoriously difficult to define "religion," and since constitutional theorists continue to dispute whether the word "religion" as used in the Establishment Clause prohibits governmental support for religion in any form, as opposed to support for a particular religion or a subset of religious groups, exclusive reliance by the Court on the "endorsement" or "coercion" tests would leave the Court to use imprecise, disputed concepts in resolving Establishment Clause cases without the benefit of asking some of the key questions that it has used to resolve such cases in the past. The result would be that the outcome of cases would be even less predictable than it has already become, as cases are resolved based solely on whether the government has or has not done something that is "religious" in nature, and if so whether it has done something that is inappropriately "religious" or not.

DAVID T. BALL

References and Further Reading

- Cobb, Sanford H. The Rise of Religious Liberty in America: A History. New York: Macmillan, 1902.
- Feldman, Noah, The Intellectual Origins of the Establishment Clause, New York University Law Review 77 (2002): 346–428.
- Laycock, Douglas, 'Nonpreferential' Aid to Religion: A False Claim about Original Intent, William and Mary Law Review 27 (1986): 875–923.
- Levy, Leonard W. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. New York: Macmillan, 1986.
- Madison, James. Letter to William Bradford, January 27, 1774. Quoted in Sanford H. Cobb, The Rise of Religious Liberty in America: A History. New York: Macmillan, 1902.
- Malbin, Michael J. Religion and Politics: The Intentions of the Authors of the First Amendment. Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, 1978.
- McConnell, Michael W., Establishment and Disestablishment at the Founding, Part I: Establishment of Religion, William and Mary Law Review 44 (2003): 2105–2208.
- McLoughlin, William G. New England Dissent, 1630–1833: The Baptists and the Separation of Church and State. 2 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1971.
- Noonan, John T., Jr. The Lustre of Our Country: The American Experience of Religious Freedom. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Reynolds, Noel B., and W. Cole Durham, Jr., eds. Religious Liberty in Western Thought. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1996.

Witte, John Jr., From Establishment to Freedom of Public Religion, Capital University Law Review 32 (2004): 499–518.

———. Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment: Essential Rights and Liberties. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abington Township School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)

Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)

Capital Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995)

County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)

Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)

Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)

Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687 (1994)

Larkin v. Grendel's Den, 459 U.S. 116 (1982)

Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 601 (1971)

Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)

McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union, 125 S.Ct. 2722 (2005)

Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)

Texas Monthly v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1 (1989)

Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

Walz v. Tax Commission, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)

See also Baptists in Early America

ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE DOCTRINE: SUPREME COURT JURISPRUDENCE

The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” This single, integrated statement limits the power of the federal government in religious life. But it contains two distinct principles—free exercise and nonestablishment—that the courts have often treated separately. The Free Exercise Clause prohibits governmental interference with the religious practice of private individuals and groups; as such it resembles other personal liberties in the Constitution such as freedom of speech. But the second component, the Establishment Clause, is unusual among constitutional limitations. Government typically may promote or embrace particular ideas as long as it leaves people free to dissent, but the Establishment Clause prohibits government from promoting religious doctrines in certain ways, and from creating certain relationships with religious institutions. These mandates may be crucial to both religious freedom and social peace. But because they restrict government more than with respect to nonreligious ideas, the Establishment Clause has been especially difficult and controversial to interpret in the circumstances of modern, pervasive government. Just what promotion of and involvement with religion are prohibited?

Background and Adoption

The “establishment[s] of religion” familiar to the founders had three main features, present in varying degrees in the Church of England and in the colonial establishments (Anglicanism in the South, Puritan Congregationalism in New England). One feature was governmental coercion to support the favored church: mandatory membership, mandatory financial contributions, and even prohibitions on practicing other faiths and preaching their doctrines. Prohibitions on dissenting faiths largely disappeared by the time of the founding, with the rise of the “free exercise” ideal; but requirements of financial support for religion continued. A second feature was government regulation of the established church, including selection of clergy and oversight of doctrine and liturgy (for example, Parliament approved the successive Books of Common Prayer). The third feature was symbolic recognition of the favored faith, through official ceremonies and titles. The monarch headed the Church of England, bishops held seats in the House of Lords, and state ceremonies incorporated the established faith.

The practice of establishment rested on both theological and political rationales: protecting the true faith, maintaining social unity, and promoting ideals that would make citizens virtuous. Likewise, the rise of disestablishment in the colonies and the early American republic rested on both theological and political arguments. Certain Christian leaders from Roger Williams through founding-era Baptists argued that the union of religion and government would interfere with the individual’s free response to God and would corrupt (in Williams’s words) the “garden” of the church with the “wilderness” of the world. Meanwhile, Enlightenment figures such as Thomas Jefferson and James Madison attacked establishments on the ground that they threatened social peace and minority rights—“destroy[ing],” in Madison’s words, “moderation and harmony . . . amongst [society’s] several sects,” and “degrad[ing] from the equal rank of Citizens all those whose opinions in Religion do not bend to those of the Legislative authority.”

The latter quotes come from Madison’s “Memorial and Remonstrance” against a 1785 proposal in Virginia to renew tax assessments in support of clergy. Madison masterfully combined political arguments with theological (for example, that “ecclesiastical establishments” have undermined “the purity and efficacy” of religion). Disestablishment in America, unlike its counterpart in France, was generally not hostile to religion, and indeed took much of its inspiration from Baptists and other dissenting Protestant groups. Most Americans continued to believe that religion was essential to civic virtue (an “indispensable suppor[t]” for “political prosperity,” in George Washington’s words). They simply concluded, in increasing numbers, that governmental promotion of religion would weaken, rather than strengthen, it in its social role.

By the late 1780s, these arguments had led to the elimination of taxes for clergy support in the majority of states. Virginia, the most notable case, rejected even a liberalized proposal that would have allowed a citizen to direct to which sect his payment would go. But the pattern was not uniform: clergy taxes remained in three New England states well after the adoption of the Constitution (the last system, in Massachusetts, was repealed in 1833). Like the defeated Virginia proposal, these taxes permitted dissenters to support their own clergy or opt out altogether: yet even these nonpreferential systems were typically referred to as “establishments.”

Thus, when the First Amendment was ratified in 1791, states remained divided over the basic principle of disestablishment (in contrast, all had some commitment to basic free exercise for dissenters). But this division did not matter, for the amendment’s purpose was to restrain the new federal government from interfering in religious matters; the Bill of Rights left untouched the states’ powers over religion. The brevity of congressional debates over the religion provision reflects that the founders were not thinking about the many questions that might arise if state governments were limited from interacting with religion. Despite this brevity, the First Amendment prohibition on laws “respecting an establishment of religion” has some clear meanings. As noted above, a tax to support religion almost certainly qualified as an establishment even when it was nonpreferential among denominations or faiths; this proposition is confirmed by the fact that the Senate rejected several proposals to prohibit establishment of “one religious sect or society” and instead ultimately approved the broader ban on “an establishment of religion.” Moreover, given the Framers’ agreement on the inviolability of religious conscience, they almost certainly rejected federal power to coerce anyone to practice religion.

A far more complicated historical question, however, concerns noncoercive acknowledgements of religion: official prayers, religious proclamations, and religious symbolic displays. Such practices can implicate several concerns underlying disestablishment—diluting the religious message to a politically acceptable content, alienating citizens who dissent from it—and some in the founding generation criticized the practices in the name of a stricter separation of church and state. President Jefferson refused to follow his predecessors in issuing Thanksgiving proclamations, and Madison in a series of letters and memoranda in the 1820s and 1830s attacked such proclamations as well as congressional prayers. Yet the practices were commonplace in the early republic: the First Congress initiated daily prayers, and the congressional chaplaincy and Washington began the nearly unbroken practice of presidential Thanksgiving proclamations. Just how ecumenical such expressions were required to be is also ambiguous. Although most of them referred in general terms to God or the “Supreme Being,” many people in the founding generation would likely have agreed with the narrower position of Joseph Story (in 1835) that the First Amendment was intended “not to countenance, much less to advance Mahometanism, or Judaism, . . . but to exclude all rivalry among Christian sects.”

As the nineteenth century progressed, formal disestablishment mixed even more with government promotion of a generalized Protestantism, producing what historians have called a “de facto establishment.” A series of revivals driven by evangelicals, especially Methodists and Baptists, made Americans much more thoroughly and explicitly religious, and this widespread faith pervaded public discourse. Much of this expression occurred within state governments, but it nonetheless reflected Americans’ understanding of the disestablishment ideal. A different controversy arose in the mid-1800s when Catholics departed the new, Protestant-dominated public school system and sought equal funding for their own schools. Most states banned such support in their own constitutions—a move that has been controversial ever since—thus extending the founding-era ban on specifically religious taxes to prohibit even general tax support for education from including religiously affiliated schools.

State Establishments, Federalism, and Incorporation

As enacted, the First Amendment, like the rest of the Bill of Rights, bound only the federal government. But the Supreme Court has held, of course, that the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868 made most of the Bill of Rights applicable to state and local government actions. The incorporation of the Establishment Clause was declared in Everson v. Board of Education (1947). Although several commentators have argued that the Fourteenth Amendment was not intended to incorporate the Bill of Rights, the Court continues to adhere emphatically to incorporation (see, for instance, Wallace v. Jaffree [1985]).

Special challenges have been raised to the incorporation of the Establishment Clause. The clause, it is asserted, was meant not just to prohibit establishment of a national church, but as much to prohibit federal interference with the state establishments still existing in 1791. This interpretation could explain the peculiar phrasing “no law respecting an establishment.” In Justice Thomas’s words, “the Establishment Clause is best understood as a federalism provision—it protects state establishments from federal interference but does not protect any individual right,” which in turn “make[s] incorporation of the Clause [to limit state governments] difficult to understand” (Elk Grove Unified School Dist. v. Newdow [2004] [concurring in the judgment]). Thomas would incorporate, at most, the aspects of non-Establishment that protect individuals from direct coercion. But no other justice has joined him; the Court implicitly follows Justice Brennan’s argument that a fully incorporated Establishment Clause makes sense “as a co-guarantor, with the Free Exercise Clause, of religious liberty” for individuals against all levels of government (Abington School Dist. v. Schempp [1963] [concurring opinion]).

Modern Interpretation: The Lemon Test and Church–State Separation

The modern Court’s Establishment Clause interpretations reflect a fundamental tension. As American society has become more religiously diverse—with Christians joined by substantial numbers of Jews, Muslims, and Eastern-religion adherents as well as atheists and believers in generalized spirituality—any religious involvement by government appears more partial to one group of citizens and thus threatens some of the general harms of establishment: division among faiths and alienation of dissenters. At the same time, given the pervasive activity of the modern welfare state, to keep government wholly separate from religion can discriminate against religious citizens and artificially restrict religion’s role in public life.

The tension appeared in the very first modern Establishment Clause case, Everson (1947), where a local government reimbursed parents’ costs for sending their children to parochial schools on public buses. The majority opinion by Justice Hugo Black began by emphasizing a strict “wall of separation between Church and state” (quoting Thomas Jefferson) that prohibited “any tax in any amount . . . to support any religious activities.” Next, however, the opinion argued that the First Amendment prohibited excluding individuals, “because of their faith, or lack of it, from receiving the benefits of public welfare legislation,” and it ended up narrowly approving the reimbursements. Strict church–state separation conflicted with and gave way to the equal participation of religion in the widespread programs of the welfare state.

In Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971), however, the Court formulated a general Establishment Clause test that, as applied, elevated strong church–state separation over equal religious participation. Lemon required that a law (1) have a secular legislative purpose, (2) have a primary effect that neither advanced nor inhibited religion, and (3) not create an excessive entanglement between church and state. Under this framework, the Court in the 1970s and early 1980s struck down several programs of government aid to religious education through a “Catch 22”: if the statute allowed aid to benefit religious teaching in church-related schools, it violated the “primary effect” prong, but if it imposed restrictions on religious uses, policing those restrictions created “excessive entanglement.” The no-advancement and no-entanglement prongs both required separation from the religious school.

The Lemon test, or nascent versions of it, also invalidated religious exercises and symbols in public schools: classroom prayers (Engel v. Vitale [1962]), classroom Bible readings (Schempp), postings of the Ten Commandments (Stone v. Graham [1980]), and classroom “moments of silence” (Jaffree). These decisions found it insufficient for Establishment Clause purposes that the exercises were formally voluntary and were general enough in content to encompass many different faiths. The clause, the Court said, reflected the broader “belief that a union of government and religion tends to destroy government and to degrade religion” (Engel). Thus, the government should not promote religion even in noncoercive or denominationally neutral ways; government must be neutral toward religion altogether.

Although official religious practices in public schools could be invalidated based on their religious “effects,” in several cases (Stone, Jaffree) the Court struck them down under the first Lemon prong for lack of a “secular purpose.” To invalidate a law solely because of an impermissible legislative intent, without regard to a forbidden effect, is an unusual principle in constitutional law, and reflects a prophylactic approach: the Court seeks to keep the government from even trying to involve itself in religious matters.

These decisions also led some observers to suggest that government might violate the Establishment Clause if it relied too heavily on religious doctrines as the basis even for legislation on facially nonreligious matters such as abortion or other issues of sexuality. See, for instance, Webster v. Reproductive Health Services (1989) (Stevens J., dissenting) (arguing that abortion law based on declaration that life begins at conception “serves no identifiable secular purpose”). The Warren Court invalidated an Arkansas law forbidding the teaching of evolution in public schools—a remnant of the Scopes-era fundamentalist movement—on the ground that the law could not “be justified by considerations of state policy other than the religious views of some of its citizens” (Epperson v. Arkansas [1968]). Since then, however, the Court has generally affirmed the legitimate role of religious activism in politics, noting that “[a]dherents of individual faiths and individual churches frequently take strong positions on public issues” and have the right to do so “as much as secular bodies” (Walz v. Tax Commission [1970]). In the same vein, the fact that denials of government funding for abortions “coincide with the religious tenets of the Roman Catholic Church does not, without more, contravene the Establishment Clause” (Harris v. McRae [1980]).

Lemon’s Decline and Less Separationist Alternatives

The Lemon test came under substantial attack from some justices and commentators. Some found the test too indeterminate, especially in the various rulings on when a law’s “primary effect” was to advance religion or promote a secular goal such as education. But other objections ran deeper.

Some critics objected to the requirement that government not advance any religious proposition. They argued that the demand of neutrality was contradicted by the long historical tradition of government endorsements of religion: legislative prayers, presidential proclamations, symbolic displays, official mottoes, and statements such as “in God we trust” on coins and “under God” in the Pledge of Allegiance. As Justice Kennedy claimed, “A test for implementing the protections of the Establishment Clause that, if applied with consistency, would invalidate longstanding traditions cannot be a proper reading of the Clause” (County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union [1989] [concurring in part and dissenting in part]). Indeed, some critics observed, landmark founding-era documents themselves argued for religious liberty on religious grounds—“Almighty God hath created the mind free,” began Jefferson’s bill establishing religious freedom in Virginia—and thus, paradoxically, might have been ruled invalid under the neutrality or no-advancement tests. Some critics argued that because many religious ideas concern matters of morality and justice, government cannot be neutral toward them but must embrace or reject them as it does secular ideas.

Critics of “neutrality” tended to train their attack on the decisions invalidating government-sponsored religious ceremonies or symbols. The Court turned to a historical approach in Marsh v. Chambers (1983), upholding the practice of legislative prayer on the basis that it had been instituted by the First Congress—three days before adoption of the Religion Clauses—and the delegates could not have “intended the Establishment Clause to forbid what they had just declared acceptable.” Relying solely on this history, the Court did not apply Lemon or any other analytical test. It used history not to develop a general legal principle reflecting the clause’s original meaning, but simply to validate the specific practice in question. Accordingly, it was unclear if or how Marsh would apply to any other issue, and the Court has never followed the Marsh approach again.

Then-Associate Justice Rehnquist offered an alternative principle to Lemon: the Establishment Clause was intended only “to prevent the establishment of a national religion or the governmental preference of one religious sect over another. (Jaffree [Rehnquist, J., dissenting]). He relied on quotes from the congressional debates on the First Amendment, as well as on many founding-era official statements endorsing religion in generalized form. But no one else on the modern Court ever limited the Establishment Clause solely to forbidding preferences between sects. As Professor Douglas Laycock pointed out, the first Congress’s rejection of drafts that would have prohibited only preferences for one sect further undermines the no-preferences position as a general Establishment Clause rule. Recently, however, Justice Scalia has urged the more limited position that the government must be neutral toward religion in financial aid cases, but may favor religion in noncoercive acknowledgments as long as they are nonpreferential among monotheistic faiths (McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union [2005] [dissenting opinion]).

Indeed, the more persistent alternative to Lemon is the no-coercion test: government may promote or acknowledge religion (perhaps only in generalized form) but may not coerce anyone to profess or participate in religion. The test fits much of the historical record, for most official acknowledgments of religion appear in noncoercive settings: nonbinding proclamations, or displays on government property. But proponents of the neutrality approach answer that limiting the Establishment Clause's reach to coercive practices would make it redundant with the Free Exercise Clause, which (arguably) prohibits coercion to practice religion as well as not practice religion. In addition, they argue, noncoercive acknowledgments still threaten the harms at which the Establishment Clause was aimed—social division, alienation of dissenting citizens, corruption of religious integrity—especially in a society as pluralistic in religious views as America.

After several years of raising doubts about Lemon, the Court relied on the non-coercion test in Lee v. Weisman (1992), striking down officially sponsored prayers at public school graduation ceremonies. But Weisman specifically declined to overrule Lemon, and it referred to noncoercion as only the undisputed “minimum” guarantee of the Establishment Clause. Moreover, proponents of the test divided over its meaning, with Justice Kennedy's majority opinion finding “subtle” peer pressure on dissenting students to participate in the prayer, while Justice Scalia's dissent insisted that only coercion “by force of law and threat of penalty” was unconstitutional. Thus, the no-coercion test remained doubtful in both its status and its scope as of early 2006.

The other chief criticism of the Lemon test was that despite its invocation of “neutrality,” it actually produced hostility and discrimination against religious ideas and religiously motivated citizens. This objection primarily targeted the decisions on financial aid, which disqualified religious schools from the tax-financed support available to public and secular private schools. Those rulings treated public education as “neutral” because it explicitly advanced neither religious nor antireligious views. But critics argued that education limited to secular viewpoints competes with education based on religious viewpoints, and therefore providing equal aid to religious schools coincides more with Establishment Clause values of neutrality and individual choice in religious matters. These arguments, unlike the criticisms of the school prayer decisions, eventually made substantial headway on the Court.

Recent Case Law: Equal Access for Religion, But No Government Endorsement

The Rehnquist Court (1986 to 2005) retreated from strong church–state separationism in its Establishment Clause rulings, but only in part.

The major shift came in financial aid cases, where the Court more and more allowed religious institutions to participate on equal terms with nonreligious institutions. The “equal access” principle developed with respect to the less controversial issue of whether religious groups could meet voluntarily on public school grounds on the same terms as other student groups. Beginning with Widmar v. Vincent (1981), involving evangelical students at a public university, the Court held that permitting religious meetings along with other meetings did not violate the Establishment Clause and indeed, in several cases, was required by the Free Speech Clause principle of viewpoint neutrality. See also, for example, Board of Education v. Mergens (1990) (high school groups); and Good News Club v. Milford Central School (2001) (elementary school students).

Soon after Widmar, financial aid cases were reconceptualized as involving equal access for religion to government funding. Mueller v. Allen (1983) upheld a state tax deduction for tuition and other educational expenses of families, even though the vast majority of deductions went for religious schooling and the tuition benefit was not limited to the secular aspects of such schooling. Under a strict application of the Lemon approach, these features would have doomed the program. But the Court, while still using Lemon's phrases, emphasized different features: The deduction's terms were neutral and thus created no incentive for parents to choose religious schools over public or secular private schools. The emphasis on neutral terms and individual choice continued in Witters v. Dept. of Services (1986), which allowed a blind student to use generally available state rehabilitation funds to study for the ministry at an evangelical Bible college. Under the program, the aid flowed to religious teaching “only as a result of the genuinely independent and private choices of aid recipients,” much like a state employee “donat[ing] all or part of [his] paycheck to a religious institution.”

The “private choice” approach culminated in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), which upheld the inclusion of religious schools in a program of vouchers for students in Cleveland's failing public schools. Like the tax deductions and rehabilitation funds, the voucher's terms were neutral and left the family the choice of the school at which to use it. The Court also found that “genuine secular alternatives” existed—charter and magnet public schools, secular private schools—so that children would not be pushed into religious education to escape poor public schools. Zelman set forth a permissive blueprint for aid, and by treating public schools as simply one “secular alternative” to religious education, it rejected Lemon's premise that they were a neutral baseline.

But Zelman has not entirely displaced the separationist, Lemon-oriented approach. In Locke v. Davey (2004), the Court held that although a state program of college scholarships could include students studying theology in preparation for the ministry, the Free Exercise Clause did not require their inclusion. The majority gave the state discretion because it found “strong Establishment Clause interests” in denying public funding for clergy training, interests grounded in history as far back as Madison’s “Memorial and Remonstrance” and the rejection of taxes to support teachers of Christianity. Although Davey’s application beyond clergy training is uncertain, the decision limits the argument that religion must be allowed equal participation in private-choice programs.

Moreover, when an aid program falls outside the rubric of “private choice,” the Court has continued a Lemon-like approach. In Mitchell v. Helms (2000), a splintered Court upheld a federal law providing computers and other instructional equipment and materials to public and private, including religious, schools. Justices O’Connor and Breyer, the decisive votes, upheld the program only because it included safeguards to prevent “diversion” of materials to religious uses. They argued that direct aid to religious schools fell closer to the core prohibitions of the Establishment Clause than did aid to individuals who could use it at religious schools. This distinction—if it survives changes in the Court’s makeup—significantly affects funding not only of education but of social services, where aid often flows through direct government contracts with providers.

In contrast to its increasing approval of aid to private religious activities, the Rehnquist Court reaffirmed the decisions prohibiting government’s own religious activity. The Court refused to limit the Establishment Clause to cases of coercion against individuals, instead gravitating toward a test championed by Justice O’Connor: government should not act with the purpose or effect of endorsing (or disapproving of) religion or any religious view. Endorsement of a religious view, she argued, “sends a message to non-adherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community,” and a message to adherents that they are favored “insiders” (Lynch v. Donnelly [1984] [concurring]). The no-endorsement test gathered a majority in County of Allegheny v. ACLU (1989), which invalidated a county courthouse’s stand-alone display of a nativity scene (distinguishing the Lynch case, which had upheld a municipal nativity display accompanied by numerous secular Christmas symbols).

The endorsement test paralleled Lemon in looking beyond coercion to more subtle effects such as government messages concerning the status of citizens.

Accordingly, critics found the approach too subjective and complained that government disagrees on issues with dissenters every day without thereby consigning them to general second-class status. The “outsider” argument thus requires another step showing why disagreements on religious issues are of special concern. That step might be that religious debates are irrelevant to government policy, so the public divisions they create are unnecessary; that religious divisions are especially heated and irreconcilable; or that religious identity is more central to persons than are particular political views, and thus the alienation produced by government favoritism is deeper. But all of these propositions are debatable, some of them extremely so.

The Court recently reaffirmed its restrictions on even noncoercive government symbolism, by invalidating a display of the Ten Commandments in a county courthouse (McCreary County). Although the display also included historic secular documents of law and government, the majority interpreted it in the light of immediate previous displays that had been solely religious in nature, as well as numerous religious statements from county officials. The decision thus reaffirmed Lemon’s “secular purpose” prong, indeed arguably stiffening it by requiring that the secular motive not just exist but be “primary.”

Even approaches based on separationism and neutrality, however, can be expected to permit some religious statements and displays by government—although it is not always clear how to explain this logically. Religious elements may appear in a broader display that overall does not endorse religion: a crèche with secular Christmas symbols as was upheld in Lynch v. Donnelly, or a Ten Commandments plaque as one of an assortment of monuments on public grounds representing various historic events and ideas as was upheld in Van Orden v. Perry (2005). Moreover, individual justices who vote to invalidate some government symbols or statements have justified others—“In God we trust” on coins, “under God” in the Pledge of Allegiance—as examples of “ceremonial deism,” a category of short, highly generalized religious references, often with a long-standing history, that impose on no one’s liberty and may indeed have developed largely ceremonial rather than specifically religious meanings. See, for instance, Newdow (O’Connor, J., concurring).

To approve religious references only by stripping them of their religious meaning surely calls to mind the founding-era concern that official establishments undermine the purity and vigor of religion. It is also doubtful that some of these references, such as “under God” in the Pledge, have lost religious import. Justice Breyer was likely more honest when he explained his decisive vote to uphold the Decalogue display in Van Orden: striking down all official religious symbols, especially longstanding ones, would be more divisive than are the symbols themselves. But Breyer provided no clear line for whether a display was permitted or forbidden; the jurisprudence in this area remains uncertain.

The recent cases reveal a shift in answers to the question posed at the outset of this entry: beyond protecting individuals from being coerced to engage in religion, what limits does the Establishment Clause impose on government? In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the majority generally understood disestablishment to prevent tax-financed support for religious schools, but to permit governmental expression endorsing a generalized Christianity. At the dawn of the twenty-first century, the Supreme Court case law has moved in the opposite direction: greater latitude for religious schools and social services to receive aid on equal terms with nonreligious institutions, but significant limits on official endorsement even of familiar symbols like the Ten Commandments. The shift has several causes. The welfare state's widespread spending on social programs makes the denial of aid to religious providers appear less as nonentanglement and more as discrimination. And while increasing religious pluralism in America makes any explicit religious statement by government look more and more partial, financial aid can be defined in secular terms and in theory can be available to a wide range of religious groups. The pervasive modern state has reduced the viability of strict separationism as an ideal, and the competing ideals of equality, neutrality, and individual choice are more hospitable to aid programs than to explicit government endorsement of any religious view.

The Establishment Clause and Religious Institutional Autonomy

Finally, one potential implication of the Establishment Clause remains relatively unexplored by the Court: the use of the clause as a shield to protect religious institutions from government interference, at least in core or inherently religious matters such as doctrine, liturgy, and the selection of clergy. Establishments typically involved government oversight of such religious matters—albeit in the name of preserving the favored faith—and a prime purpose of disestablishment was to separate the structures of church and state to ensure the autonomy of religious life. The Establishment Clause may play an increased role in protecting religious institutional autonomy as Free Exercise Clause protections have declined with the Court's holding (Employment Division v. Smith [1990]) that religiously motivated conduct generally has no constitutional claim to exemption from "neutral law[s] of general applicability."

A few Court decisions have sounded the theme of Establishment Clause immunity from regulation. Most explicitly, the Court invalidated financial aid to religious schools on the ground that the regulation accompanying aid produces "excessive entanglement" (Lemon) and "the spectre of government secularization of a creed" (Aguilar v. Felton [1985]). Ironically, such rulings used the school's autonomy as a ground to strike down aid that the school wished to receive. "Pure" protections of religious institutional autonomy, by contrast, have invoked the Religion Clauses in general, a rationale consistent with, but not explicitly mentioning, the Establishment Clause. Under a century-long series of decisions involving property disputes between church factions, civil courts deciding such cases must sometimes defer to the resolution of the matter by the highest authority within the church (Watson v. Jones [1872], Serbian E. Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevich [1976]). Although states may often apply "neutral principles" of property or trust law to such disputes, they must defer to the internal church authority whenever the controversy requires interpretation of religious concepts or involves "religious authority or dogma" (Jones v. Wolf [1979], Milivojevich, Smith). Applying these principles, lower courts have barred suits by clergy against churches for employment discrimination, suits against clergy and churches for "malpractice" in religious counseling, and—in some cases—suits against churches for negligent hiring or supervision of clergy who commit torts. Whether these decisions extend to nonclergy positions in religious institutions is uncertain at best, although the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Catholic Bishop (1979) held that application of collective bargaining laws to teachers in parochial schools would raise serious constitutional questions concerning church-state entanglement. Institutional autonomy from regulation remains among the least explored implications of the Establishment Clause.

THOMAS C. BERG

References and Further Reading

- Conkle, Daniel O., Toward a General Theory of the Establishment Clause, Northwestern University Law Review 82 (1988): 1113–1194.
- Esbeck, Carl H., Dissent and Disestablishment: The Church-State Settlement in the Early Republic, Brigham Young University Law Review 2004 (2004): 4:1385–592.
- Laycock, Douglas, 'Nonpreferential' Aid to Religion: A False Claim About Original Intent, William and Mary Law Review 27 (1986): 875–921.

- Lupu, Ira C., Government Messages and Government Money: Santa Fe, Mitchell v. Helms, and the Arc of the Establishment Clause, William and Mary Law Review 42 (2001): 771–822.
- McConnell, Michael W., Coercion: The Lost Element of Establishment, William and Mary Law Review 27 (1986): 933–941.
- McConnell, Michael W., John H. Garvey, and Thomas C. Berg. Religion and the Constitution. Boulder, CO: Aspen Publishers, 2002.
- Smith, Steven D., The Rise and Fall of Religious Freedom in Constitutional Discourse, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 140 (1991): 149–239.
- Sullivan, Kathleen M., Religion and Liberal Democracy, University of Chicago Law Review 59 (1992): 195–223.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abington School Dist. v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- Aguilar v. Felton*, 473 U.S. 402 (1985)
- Board of Education v. Mergens*, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)
- County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
- Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow*, 542 U.S. 1 (2004)
- Employment Division v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Epperson v. Arkansas*, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- Good News Club v. Milford Central School*, 533 U.S. 98 (2001)
- Harris v. McRae*, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
- Jones v. Wolf*, 443 U.S. 595 (1979)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Locke v. Davey*, 540 U.S. 712 (2004)
- Lynch v. Donnelly*, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
- Marsh v. Chambers*, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)
- McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union*, 125 S. Ct. 2722 (2005)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Mueller v. Allen*, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)
- NLRB v. Catholic Bishop*, 440 U.S. 490 (1979)
- Serbian E. Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevic*, 426 U.S. 696 (1976)
- Stone v. Graham*, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)
- Van Orden v. Perry*, 125 S.Ct. 2854 (2005)
- Wallace v. Jaffree*, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)
- Walz v. Tax Commission*, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)
- Watson v. Jones*, 13 Wall. 679, 722–724 (1872)
- Webster v. Reproductive Health Services*, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)
- Widmar v. Vincent*, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)
- Witters v. Dept. of Services*, 474 U.S. 481 (1986)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE: THEORIES OF INTERPRETATION

The Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the Constitution provides that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion”

The aim of the Establishment Clause is to keep the government neutral in matters of religion (Epperson v. Arkansas [1968], McCreary County v. ACLU [2005]). The Supreme Court has used a number of different approaches to determine whether a government action has departed from the neutrality principle and unconstitutionally established religion.

The Court has most often used the Lemon test, a three-prong test announced in Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971). More recently, however, Justice Sandra Day O’Connor has moved the Court towards more frequent use of the “endorsement test.” See, for instance, Lynch v. Donnelly (1983) (O’Connor, J., concurring), County of Allegheny v. ACLU (1989) (O’Connor, J., concurring), and Santa Fe Ind. Sch. Dist. v. Doe (2000). Still another test that has gained some currency on the Court is the “coercion test” articulated by Justice Anthony Kennedy. See Allegheny (Kennedy, J., dissenting in part). In light of the Court’s turbulent approach in this area, as well as changes in the Court’s membership, it is reasonable to characterize the Establishment Clause as an area in transition.

The Lemon Test

When applying the Lemon test, courts will find no establishment of religion if the government action (1) has a secular legislative purpose, (2) does not have the effect of advancing or prohibiting religion, and (3) does “not foster ‘an excessive entanglement with religion’” (Lemon [internal citations omitted]).

First, the challenged law or action must have a legitimate secular purpose. In Stone v. Graham (1980) (per curiam), for example, the Supreme Court struck down a state law requiring that the Ten Commandments be hung on the walls of Kentucky classrooms. The Court looked beyond the secular purpose proffered by the legislature and found that the “pre-eminent purpose for posting the Ten Commandments on schoolroom walls is plainly religious in nature.” Similarly, in Wallace v. Jaffree (1985), the Court found an unconstitutional purpose behind a law whose sponsor had confirmed that it was “an ‘effort to return voluntary prayer’ to the public schools.” More recently, in McCreary County v. ACLU (2005), the Court found that a Ten Commandments display in a courthouse violated the Establishment Clause. Critical to the Court’s decision was that the initial display included only the Ten Commandments and a subsequent display, erected after the first was challenged, included religious excerpts from historical documents. The Court found the purpose behind the display was to “favor religion.” As the Court noted in McCreary, “the principle of neutrality has provided a good sense of direction: the government may not favor one religion over another, or religion over irreligion.”

The second prong of the Lemon test looks at whether the effect of the challenged government action is the establishment of religion. In Lynch, the Court upheld a crèche surrounded by other secular Christmas symbols, including a Santa Claus house, reindeer, and a Christmas tree, because the display’s effect was not to establish religion over nonreligion or endorse one particular sect over another. Similarly, in Allegheny, the Court approved a holiday display that included a menorah, a Christmas tree, and a plaque explaining a secular connection. The inclusion of the secular elements with the religious ones meant that the display did not have the effect of establishing religion. However, the Court held unconstitutional a separate display, consisting solely of a crèche sitting on another piece of government property. By displaying the crèche on its own, without the surrounding secular items, the county sent “an unmistakable message that it supports and promotes the Christian praise to God that is the crèche’s religious message.” Similarly, student-led prayer before high school football games had the unconstitutional effect of endorsing religion in Santa Fe. There, the Court found that forcing students to make religion a factor in deciding whether to attend the games had the “effect of coercing those present to participate in an act of religious worship.”

The entanglement prong of the Lemon test is focused primarily on government spending that supports religion and the resulting government intrusion into religious organizations. In Lemon itself, the policies of two states to spend tax dollars to support religious schools were found unconstitutional because of excessive entanglement. To determine if the entanglement between government and religion is excessive, the Court looks at “the character and purposes of the institutions that are benefited, the nature of the aid that the State provides, and the resulting relationship between the government and the religious authority.” Because of the intrusive government oversight necessary to administer financial aid, the Court in Lemon found excessive entanglement in the states’ laws. A similar monetary and oversight analysis for the entanglement prong was applied to a Texas sales tax exemption for religious publications in Texas Monthly v. Bullock (1989). The statute required that applicants for the exemption prove to government officials that their “message or activity is consistent with ‘the teaching of the faith.’” This entanglement could also lead to the perception that government has approved some religions and disapproved others (Bullock quoting United States v. Lee [1982] [Stevens, J., concurring]). Where government action, especially concerning money, could result in intrusive oversight of religion, the Court has found excessive entanglement and an Establishment Clause violation.

The Endorsement Test

The endorsement test grew out of the effects and purpose prongs of the Lemon test. In Lynch, Justice O’Connor suggested that the Court should focus its attention not on generalized inquiries into the purpose and effect of the challenged government action, but instead should ask whether the action was taken with the purpose, or had the effect, of endorsing religion (Lynch [O’Connor, J., concurring]). She also suggested analyzing government action from the standpoint of the “reasonable observer,” asking whether that observer would believe her standing in the political community was based on adherence or nonadherence to that message. In Lynch itself, the surrounding secular symbols neutralized the religious nature of the crèche, ensuring that a reasonable observer would not feel the government was endorsing the crèche’s religious message. However, in Allegheny, there were no secular symbols surrounding the crèche, which to Justice O’Connor conveyed “a message to nonadherents of Christianity that they are not full members of the political community, and a corresponding message to Christians that they are favored members of the political community.” This religious symbol in a government building had the “the unconstitutional effect of conveying a government endorsement of Christianity.”

Justice O’Connor’s theory of endorsement animates the majority opinions in Wallace, Allegheny, and Santa Fe. In Wallace, the majority framed the analysis of the purpose prong as “whether the government intends to convey a message of endorsement or disapproval of religion.” In Allegheny, the majority noted the recent trend in Court decisions of paying “close attention to whether the challenged governmental practice either has the purpose or effect of ‘endorsing’ religion.” Finally, in Santa Fe, the Court deemed school-sponsored religious speech “impermissible because it sends the ancillary message to members of the audience who are nonadherents ‘that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community, and an accompanying message to adherents that they are insiders, favored members of the political community’” (Santa Fe citing Lynch). While the Court still applies the Lemon framework in these cases, its analysis of the effects and purpose prong has been transformed by Justice O'Connor's endorsement test. In most cases, the previously generalized inquiry into purpose and effect has been narrowed into a search for one particular purpose (to endorse) and one specific effect (endorsement).

The Coercion Test

Justice Kennedy has proposed a coercion test for Establishment Clause cases, and Justice Thomas has recently incorporated this idea into his own opinions (Allegheny [Kennedy, J., dissenting], Van Orden v. Perry [2005] [Thomas, J., concurring]). Justice Kennedy suggested in Allegheny that actions should be invalidated only when they "further the interests of religion through the coercive power of government." He suggested that coercion, rather than "infringement on religious liberty by passive or symbolic accommodation" is the evil that the Establishment Clause is designed to guard against. Justice Kennedy incorporated the coercion analysis in his opinion for the majority in Lee v. Weisman (1992). There, a public school graduation prayer led by a rabbi was found to violate the Establishment Clause. Kennedy held that "at a minimum, the Constitution guarantees that government may not coerce anyone to support or participate in religion or its exercise, or otherwise act in a way which 'establishes a [state] religion or religious faith, or tends to do so'" (internal citations omitted). Because children were coerced to either participate in or protest a religious exercise, the school violated the Establishment Clause in Lee.

Justice Thomas has recently begun to advocate use of the coercion test as well. He argued in Van Orden that the original constitutional meaning of establishment was coercion. "The Framers understood an establishment 'necessarily [to] involve actual legal coercion'" (Van Orden [Thomas, J., concurring] quoting Elk Grove Unified Sch. Dist. v. Newdow [2004] [Thomas, J., concurring in the judgment]). Justice Thomas had argued in Newdow that "'government practices that have nothing to do with creating or maintaining . . . coercive state establishments' simply do not 'implicate the possible liberty interest of being free from coercive state establishments'" (Van Orden quoting Newdow [Thomas, J., concurring]). While Justice Kennedy was the first member of the contemporary Court to propose use of the coercion test, he has not suggested that it be adopted to represent the full scope of the Establishment Clause's reach. As his opinion in Lee intimated, he sees refraining from coercion as the "minimum" that is required of government. Justice Thomas, on the other hand, has opined that only coercive governmental measures can violate the Establishment Clause.

In light of these crosscurrents in the Court's Establishment Clause jurisprudence, it is difficult to predict with any confidence which approach (if any) will come to dominate the Court's analysis in the future. Because of her centrality in the development and application of the endorsement test, Justice O'Connor's departure from the Court heightens this uncertainty. There are few, if any, signs of the emergence on the Court of a consistent, clear majority in favor of a single approach to deciding Establishment Clause cases.

SAMUEL A. MARCOSSON

References and Further Reading

- Levy, Leonard W. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
 McConnell, Michael W., Religious Freedom at a Crossroads, University of Chicago Law Review 59 (1992): 1:115–194.
 Shiffrin, Steven H., The Pluralistic Foundations of the Religion Clauses, Cornell Law Review 90 (2004): 1:9–95.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- County of Allegheny v. ACLU*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1 (2004)
Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 613 (1971)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union, 125 S.Ct. 2722 (2005)
Santa Fe Ind. Sch. Dist. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)
Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)
Texas Monthly v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1 (1989)
U.S. v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 262 (1982)
Van Orden v. Perry, 125 S.Ct. 2854 (2005)
Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION AND FREE EXERCISE CLAUSES

The First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution begins as follows: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The first clause is commonly called the Establishment Clause, and the second the Free Exercise Clause. Together they are commonly called the Religion Clauses. Their meaning, however, is a matter of considerable debate.

Do the Clauses Have Different Meanings?

The first issue is whether the two clauses have different meanings or are two different ways of making the same point. Scholars who say the latter contend that the clauses together were intended to prevent Congress from directly addressing and legislating on the subject of religion or any religious issue. They take this position, first, because during the ratification of the Constitution several of its defenders stated that it was not intended to grant Congress any power over religion. For example, at the Virginia Ratifying Convention, James Madison said, “There is not the shadow of right in the general government to intermeddle with religion. Its least interference with it would be a most flagrant usurpation.” Second, they note that the Constitution’s opponents, unconvinced by Madison’s and similar assurances, insisted that an amendment be added to the Constitution to make it abundantly clear that Congress has no jurisdiction over religion. Finally, both the First Amendment’s initial words, “Congress shall make no law . . . ,” and the fact that Madison originally intended for it to become part of Article I, section 9, of the Constitution, which lists restraints on the powers granted Congress in section 8, imply that the Religion Clauses were meant to deny Congress any jurisdiction over religion.

Those scholars who interpret the Religion Clauses as a single provision meant to prevent the national government from legislating on the subject of religion are, however, divided over why early Americans wanted such a provision. Some scholars contend that the Religion Clauses were intended to protect states’ rights. They note that many of the Constitution’s opponents feared that the new national government it created would be so powerful as to significantly weaken, if not destroy, the state governments. They also note that the states traditionally had the power to legislate on the subject of religion. The Religion Clauses, they reason, were intended to protect this power of the states by denying it to the national government.

Other scholars say that the reason the Religion Clauses gave jurisdiction over religion to the states was because the nation was so divided over the issue of church–state relations that the framers of the Religion Clauses could not possibly have agreed on what policy toward religion the national government should have. Rather than proposing a policy that would have been controversial and divisive, they drafted the Religion Clauses simply as a way of saying that the issue should be left up to the individual states to resolve. In either case, whether to protect states’ rights or to avoid dealing with an issue “too hot to handle,” the Religion Clauses have no substantive meaning, that is, they express no position on what the proper relationship between religion and government should be. Rather, they uphold the principle of federalism.

Another, larger group of scholars, while agreeing that the Religion Clauses were meant to deprive the national government of jurisdiction over religion, contend that they did so primarily, if not entirely, for substantive reasons. They point out that most early Americans thought that whenever any government legislates on the subject of religion it poses a threat to religious freedom and to the integrity of religion itself, and often leads to conflict among different religions and to political instability. They also note that according to the contract theory of government, originally propounded by John Locke and widely accepted by early Americans, liberty of conscience is an inalienable right—one that persons can never and have never ceded to any government’s control.

In contrast to the preceding interpretations of the Religion Clauses, the Supreme Court and some scholars have said that the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses have different meanings and were not intended to deprive the government of all jurisdiction over religion. Essentially the Court has said that the Free Exercise Clause prohibits the government from harming or disfavoring religion in general, any particular religion, or any person or group because of her/his/its religion, and the Establishment Clause prohibits it from aiding or favoring the same. It has also said that for the Free Exercise Clause, but not the Establishment Clause, to be violated, coercion must be present or threatened.

If the Clauses Have Different Meanings, Can They Be Reconciled?

The Court’s interpretation of the Religion Clauses has proven to be problematic, because it makes it difficult for courts to apply them in cases without creating conflict between the clauses. Is it possible for the government to avoid harming religion without aiding it, and vice versa? The answer depends on the kind of harm or aid that is prohibited—direct and intentional or indirect and unintentional. If it is the former, then conflict between the two clauses can be avoided, for there is no reason why the government’s not directly and intentionally harming religion means that it is necessarily aiding religion, and vice versa. According to this interpretation, what the two clauses require is government neutrality toward all religions and between religion and nonreligion, and this can be achieved if the government avoids directly legislating either for or against religion, any particular religion, or any person or group because of his/her/its religion.

On the other hand, if the Court were to hold that the Religion Clauses prohibit harm and aid that is indirect and unintentional as well as direct and intentional, then it becomes difficult if not impossible to reconcile the two clauses. For example, if the Free Exercise Clause is interpreted as prohibiting all government-imposed restraints or burdens on religion so that persons or groups do not have to obey valid, secular, generally applicable laws, provided they have a sincere religious reason for not doing so, then it can be argued that the government is favoring or giving special treatment to religious persons and groups, because nonreligious ones are not entitled to such exemptions. At times, however, this is how the Court has interpreted the Free Exercise Clause (see Sherbert v. Verner [1963] and Wisconsin v. Yoder [1971]). Similarly, if the Establishment Clause is interpreted as prohibiting all government aid to religion so that educational and welfare-type programs that are primarily secular in nature but sponsored and operated by religious organizations are precluded from receiving government funding, then it can be argued that the government is disfavoring or discriminating against religious organizations, because nonreligious organizations are allowed to receive the government funding. At times, however, this is how the Court has interpreted the Establishment Clause (see Lemon v. Kurtzman [1971] and Aguilar v. Felton [1985]).

Since approximately 1990, primarily to avoid interpreting the Religion Clauses in a way that would cause them to conflict with each other, the Court has adopted neutrality as the guiding principle to be followed when it decides cases arising under the Religion Clauses. In effect, it has said that it is only direct, intentional harm or aid that is prohibited by the free exercise and Establishment Clauses, respectively. In Employment Division, Dept. of Human Resources v. Smith (1990), therefore, the Court held that the Free Exercise Clause does not guarantee a right to religion-based exemptions from valid, secular, generally applicable laws that only indirectly and unintentionally harm the exercise of religion, and in Agostini v. Felton (1997) and Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), the Court upheld government funds going to parochial schools because the aid to religion was indirect and secondary.

Some scholars have criticized the Court's move to neutrality as the unifying principle of the Religion Clauses. Those who believe that the Free Exercise Clause guarantees a right to religion-based exemptions from valid, secular laws contend that the basic principle underlying and unifying both Religion Clauses is not neutrality but religious freedom. They argue that even indirect and unintentional government regulations of or burdens on the exercise of religion should be disallowed except in those cases when the government can provide "compelling" reasons for them. On the other hand, those who believe that the Establishment Clause prohibits even indirect and unintentional aid to religion contend that the basic principle underlying and unifying both Religion Clauses is separation of government and religion. They argue that government funding of church-run secular programs inevitably involves government control over and entanglement in religion.

The Court, however, is not likely to adopt either the freedom or separation interpretation of the Religion Clauses, even though theoretically either one could work to unify the clauses. The main problem with both is that as a practical matter there cannot be either complete religious freedom or complete separation of government and religion, and yet there is no workable test for determining where to "draw the line," that is, when to compromise either freedom or separation. In contrast, neutrality, which prohibits only direct, intentional harm or aid to religion, is relatively easy to apply and, thus, seems likely to remain as the dominant principle for reconciling the Religion Clauses.

ELLIS M. WEST

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil R. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Conkle, Daniel O., The Path of American Religious Liberty: From the Original Theology to Formal Neutrality and an Uncertain Future, Indiana Law Journal 75 (Winter 2000): 1–36.
- Kurland, Philip B. Religion and the Law: Of Church and State and the Supreme Court. Chicago: Aldine, 1962.
- Laycock, Douglas, Formal, Substantive, and Disaggregated Neutrality Toward Religion, DePaul Law Review 39 (1990): 993–1018.
- Sherry, Suzanna, Lee v. Weisman: Paradox Redux, Supreme Court Review 1992 (1993): 123–153.
- Smith, Steven D., The Rise and Fall of Religious Freedom in Constitutional Discourse, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 140 (1991): 149–240.
- . Foreordained Failure: The Quest for a Constitutional Principle of Religious Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Agostini v. Felton*, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)
- Aguilar v. Felton*, 473 U.S. 402 (1985)
- Employment Division, Dept. of Human Resources v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)

Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence

ESTATE OF THORNTON v. CALDOR, 472 U.S. 703 (1985)

Estate of Thornton v. Caldor is an important case because it limited the ability of states to require private employers to accommodate the religious beliefs of employees. In Estate of Thornton, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Connecticut statute that required private employers to allow employees to take their Sabbath day off regardless of which day that was. Some scholars consider Estate of Thornton to be part of a “one-two punch” impacting those whose religious beliefs or practices require them to refrain from work on the Sabbath. The first “punch” came in the early 1960s when the Supreme Court upheld “Sunday closing laws” against challenges under the Establishment Clause (McGowan v. Maryland [1961]), and under the Free Exercise Clause (Braunfeld v. Brown [1961]). These laws required businesses to close on Sunday, even though this could have a profound impact on religious minorities such as Jews and Seventh Day Adventists, who would also have to close their stores on Saturday, thus effectively closing those businesses for the entire weekend. In fact, the Connecticut law in question was part of its “Sunday closing law,” and was an attempt to accommodate those who would be forced to work on their Sabbath. The Connecticut Supreme Court struck down the general Sunday closing provisions of the law under the Connecticut Constitution, but the provision requiring employers to allow employees to take their Sabbath day off was not challenged in that case.

In an opinion by Chief Justice Burger, the Court applied the Lemon test and held that the Connecticut law violated the Establishment Clause. The Lemon test requires that a law have a secular purpose, a primary effect that neither advances or inhibits religion, and that the law not excessively entangle government and religion. The Court held the Connecticut law violated this test because the statute’s primary effect was to advance a “particular religious practice.” The Court pointed out that the law gave employees the absolute power to designate their Sabbath day, and to take off on that day if required by religious concerns. The Court also noted that the law had no exceptions based on employer necessity. Therefore, employees could not be penalized for taking their Sabbath day off even if doing so caused the employer significant economic harm, forced the employer to close down its business, or forced other workers, including those with greater seniority under a valid seniority system, to cover for employees who took their Sabbath day off. Moreover, only those who asserted religious reasons for taking the day off were protected under the law. Thus, other employees with a valid reason for taking the day off would not receive similar consideration under the law.

Many who have criticized this decision have done so because when combined with the “Sunday closing law” cases Estate of Thornton could lead to a regime where the dominant faith’s Sabbath is accommodated and arguably preferred by government, while government is prevented from requiring private entities to accommodate those who are negatively effected by the government preference. After Estate of Thornton, states cannot protect employees who are religiously compelled to take their Sabbath day off by requiring employers to allow them to do so. The critics suggest that in light of the “Sunday closing cases” this result favors mainstream Christianity.

FRANK S. RAVITCH

Cases and Statutes Cited

Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599 (1961)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961)

ESTELLE v. SMITH, 451 U.S. 454 (1980)

In this case, the defendant was charged with capital murder stemming from his participation in an armed robbery. The trial judge ordered a psychiatric exam to determine whether Estelle was competent to stand trial. After the defendant was tried and convicted, the doctor who conducted the pretrial examination testified for the state at the sentencing hearing on the issue of whether Estelle would be a future danger to society. Pursuant to Texas law, the jury answered the “future dangerousness” question and two other required questions in the affirmative, and the judge imposed the mandatory death penalty. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed. Justice Burger, writing an opinion in that all justices joined or concurred, held that the admission of the doctor’s testimony violated Estelle’s Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination. The defendant was not advised prior to the psychiatric examination that he had a right to remain silent, and that any statement he made could be used against him at a capital sentencing proceeding, as required by the famous case Miranda v. Arizona (1966). Moreover, Estelle was denied his Sixth Amendment right, as defense counsel was not notified that the competency examination would encompass the issue of future dangerousness, and the defendant had no opportunity to consult with his counsel in deciding whether to submit to the examination.

In the years since Estelle was rendered, it has been narrowed by two subsequent Supreme Court decisions. In Penry v. Johnson (2001), the Court held that where a defendant chooses to offer expert testimony regarding his mental condition at trial or sentencing, earlier unwarned and uncounseled statements made to a psychiatrist may be used against him. In Allen v. Illinois (1986), the Court held five to four that use of psychiatric examinations in proceedings to commit individuals found to be “sexually dangerous persons” is not prohibited by the Fifth Amendment, as the proceedings are civil not criminal.

SUSAN R. KLEIN

References and Further Reading

- Comment, The Right to Counsel During Court-Ordered Psychiatric Examinations of Criminal Defendants, Villanova University Law Review 26 (1980): 135.
 Cochran, Gregory R., Is the Shrink's Role Shrinking? The Ambiguity of Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 12.2 Concerning Government Psychiatric Testimony in Negating Cases, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 147 (1999): 1403.
 Wright, Charles. Federal Practice and Procedure. 3rd ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999, and 2003 pocket part.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Allen v. Illinois*, 478 U.S. 364 (1986)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
Penry v. Johnson, 532 U.S. 782 (2001)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment Reversed; Capital Punishment and Race; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

ESTELLE v. WILLIAMS, 425 U.S. 501 (1975)

Williams reinforced the concept that defendants must make timely objections; otherwise, any constitutional violations would be deemed harmless error. Williams was held in custody pending trial. On the day of trial, Williams asked for and was denied by the jail, his civilian clothes. Consequently, Williams was tried and convicted in clothes that were distinctly marked as prison clothes. Williams did not make an objection to wearing these clothes.

The Court (six to two) found that Williams's wearing prison clothes at trial was harmless error because he did not make a timely objection. The Court held that it would violate the Fourteenth Amendment if an accused were compelled to trial in prison clothes because the jurors could be biased against him. However, the accused must make an objection in a timely manner so that the trial judge may rule on the issue. In the instant case, it was the trial judge's practice to allow the accused to wear his civilian clothes. Because Williams had no defense to present at trial and the defense counsel referenced his prison attire at trial, it appeared that Williams wore his jailhouse clothes only to elicit jury sympathy. There was nothing in the record to show that Williams was forced to stand trial in these clothes or that there was any reason to excuse the defense from raising an objection.

Justices Marshall and Brennan dissented on the grounds that Williams's due process rights were not waived when he did not knowingly consent to being tried in his prison clothes.

AUDREY I-WEI HUANG

References and Further Reading

- Chapman v. California*, 386 U.S. 18 (1967).
 Fischer, Paul A. Annotation: Propriety and Prejudicial Effect of Compelling Accused to Wear Prison Clothing at Jury Trial—Federal Cases. American Law Reports, Federal Series 26 (2005): 535.
Hernandez v. Beto, 443 F. 2d 634 (Fifth Cir.), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 897 (1971).
Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. 337 (1970).
Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466 (1965).

See also Harmless Error; Substantive Due Process

ESTES, BILLIE SOL (1925–)

Billie Sol Estes, the subject of media-tainted trial, was born in the Panhandle of Texas in 1925 and reared in Abilene. He moved to Pecos in 1951 with the hopes of starting an agricultural business. By 1960, Estes had built a fortune through land and business purchases. To help amass his fortune Estes would befriend prominent politicians, most notably then-Senate majority leader, Lyndon Johnson of Texas, who would later become vice president and president of the United States. He would also befriend Johnson's presidential running mate, John F. Kennedy.

In 1961, Estes's cotton holdings became the subject of a Department of Agriculture investigation. In 1962, the Pecos Independent and Enterprise began publishing a series of stories detailing Estes's fraudulent business practices, which led to an indictment charging that he had created a multimillion-dollar scheme that illegally manipulated government cotton allotments. The indictment and pretrial maneuvers that followed garnered tremendous media attention due to the fact that Estes was a well-known Texas businessman who had close connections with prominent politicians; his pretrial hearing was carried live on television and radio.

During the trial under the rules of the Texas courts, cameras and still photographers were allowed in the courtroom to record the Estes trial, in which he was convicted of fraud for swindling hundreds of farmers. Estes sued the State of Texas, claiming that he did not receive a fair trial as a result of the publicity associated with his pretrial and trial.

The Supreme Court overturned his conviction in Estes v. Texas (1965) citing Estes's rights to due process were violated due to excessive publicity, and ruling that Estes should have a new trial. He was retried without cameras in the courtroom and convicted again of fraud and sentenced to prison. Sixteen years later the Court would overturn its Estes decision in Chandler v. Florida (1981).

BA-SHEN WELCH

References and Further Reading

Moore, Roy L. Mass Communication Law and Ethics. 2d ed. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 1999.
 Pecos Enterprise. Bill Sol's Back in Town. Pecos Enterprise Archives. <http://www.pecos.net/news/arch2002/012302p.html>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1965)
Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560 (1981)

EUGENIC STERILIZATION

The latter half of the nineteenth century witnessed great scientific advances in a number of fields, including biology. Charles Darwin's On the Origins of the Species by Means of Natural Selection and Gregor Mendel's experiments shed light on the hereditary transmission of characteristics, prompting consideration of how to use this knowledge to aid humanity.

In 1883, the English scientist Sir Francis Galton was the first to coin the phrase "eugenics," which means "good in birth" in Greek. Eugenics was concerned with applying principles of animal husbandry to humans, encouraging positive genetic traits and eliminating negative genetic traits by controlling who could breed and pass on their genes.

The scientific approach to human breeding found particular resonance in the Progressive movement in the United States. That movement was concerned with improving the conditions of the worst-off in society. Eugenics offered the promise that through the application of scientific principles, future generations of such unfortunates could avoid being born, improving the lot of all society. The rudimentary understanding of genetics at the time conceptualized such ills as pauperism, criminality, insanity, immorality, and low intelligence as negative hereditary characteristics that could be "bred out" of the bloodline. Progressive eugenicists sought to ensure that those possessing these characteristics would decline as a proportion of the population by encouraging or mandating the sterilization of people who displayed those characteristics.

While the ideas behind eugenics found favor across the world, the United States led the way in their practical application with Indiana becoming the first state to pass a law enabling the sterilization of persons for eugenic purposes in 1907. A further twenty-two states passed similar laws by 1926, and by 1940, thirty states had passed eugenic sterilization laws, with California and Virginia being particularly strong proponents. Most states provided for involuntary eugenic sterilization, whereby the state could forcibly sterilize a person found to be unfit to have children, because such offspring would be a similar burden on society.

The Supreme Court ruled involuntary eugenic sterilization laws constitutional in the case of Buck v. Bell (1927). The eight-to-one decision was announced with an opinion by Oliver Wendell Holmes declaring, "It is better for all the world, if instead of waiting to execute degenerate offspring for crime, or to let them starve for their imbecility, society can prevent those who are manifestly unfit from continuing their kind . . . Three generations of imbeciles are enough." In Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942), the Supreme Court limited the use of involuntary eugenic sterilization for habitual criminals.

For a number of years eugenics was widely accepted; it was taught in many of the nation's colleges, eugenicists took part in state fairs across the nation and a number of famous people supported eugenics, including Presidents Theodore Roosevelt and Calvin Coolidge; John Maynard Keynes, the noted economist; and Margaret Sanger, the founder of Planned Parenthood. The popularity of eugenics declined in the late 1930s, but involuntary eugenic sterilizations continued in the United States until 1979, by which time over 60,000 Americans had been sterilized.

The concern for the gene pool in the United States that was expressed through eugenic sterilization laws can also be seen in its miscegenation laws and the curtailment of immigration from Southern and Eastern Europe (whose immigrants were seen as particularly degenerate and a threat to future generations of Americans) in the Immigration Act of 1924.

The American eugenic sterilization laws formed the basis for similar laws across the world, starting in the Swiss canton of Vaud in 1928. Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Belgium, Austria, Norway, and Germany were among those countries to embrace eugenic sterilization laws a way of dealing with hereditary defects and controlling the growth of ethnic minorities. Despite the United Kingdom's early association with the eugenics movement, political opposition prevented the adoption of eugenic sterilization laws.

Eugenic sterilization was carried out most vigorously in Nazi Germany. Adolf Hitler cited the United States and its laws aimed at genetic purity as an example for the world in his book Mein Kampf, and there was much interaction between eugenicists in the United States and Germany until the late 1930s. Nazi Germany sterilized hundreds of thousands of people between 1933 and 1945. Between 1939 and 1941, the logic of eugenic sterilization was carried to its conclusion and over 70,000 people deemed to be a burden on the state were forcibly euthanized.

Despite the association of eugenics and eugenic sterilization with the Nazi regime, the United States and much of Northern Europe continued to carry out eugenic sterilizations for the remainder of the twentieth century, although many countries repealed these laws by the 1980s and 1990s. Japan did not begin its program of eugenic sterilization until after World War II, starting in 1948 and continuing until 1996.

State-mandated eugenic sterilization is no longer a current concern in the field of American civil rights and civil liberties. Many states have apologized for their prior actions and a return to eugenic sterilization programs seems unlikely. Instead, the concern is more focused on similar results being achieved through coercion.

One fear is that advances in DNA testing raise the possibility that genetic defects could be accurately identified and that information used to affect decisions about reproduction to ensure "designer babies." Fetuses possessing unfavorable genetic material could be aborted, or in vitro fertilization techniques used to ensure that only children with the couple's favored genetic characteristics are born.

State coercion is seen as a bigger concern for the reproductive freedom of individuals. Some have called for the state to restrict access to welfare payments for those unwilling to be sterilized or have other long-term birth control procedures such as implants. Others see the existence of federally funded voluntary sterilizations as promoting a program of eugenic sterilization. These sterilizations, in addition to those provided by a number of charities, are performed on the poor with disproportionately large numbers from ethnic minorities. The argument is that by funding sterilization instead of other means of birth control the state encourages individuals to undergo sterilization simply because they cannot afford other options.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- Kevles, Daniel J. In the Name of Eugenics: Genetics and the Uses of Human Heredity. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Klein, Wendy. Building a Better Race: Gender, Sexuality, and Eugenics from the Turn of the Century to the Baby Boom. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.
- Sofair, Andre N., and Lauris C. Kaldjian. "Eugenic Sterilization and a Qualified Nazi Analogy: The United States and Germany, 1930–1945." Annals of Internal Medicine 132 (2000): 312–9.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Buck v. Bell*, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)
- Skinner v. Oklahoma*, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)

EUTHANASIA

Euthanasia is ending a life before its natural end, motivated by a concern for the welfare of the killed person. It is this motivation that distinguishes euthanasia from simple homicide or suicide and it is sometimes called "mercy killing" for this reason.

Voluntary Euthanasia versus Involuntary Euthanasia

In cases of voluntary euthanasia, the persons killed made requests for their lives to be ended prematurely, often in cases of terminal illness. In cases of involuntary euthanasia, the persons killed expressed no such desire, and may have even expressed an opinion to the contrary. This may seem incongruous with the idea of euthanasia being motivated out of a concern for the welfare of the person, but in such cases the persons may be considered incapable of fully understanding their own best interests. The most extreme examples of involuntary euthanasia occurred in Nazi Germany when thousands of disabled people were killed by the state, although these killings were also motivated by the prevailing theory of eugenics.

Choosing to End One's Life

Ancient civilizations differed in their approaches towards people choosing to end their own life; some viewed it as taboo, others saw ending one's life to retain dignity as laudable. The Western tradition was most heavily influenced by Judeo-Christian views that suicide was against God's will, and these views were incorporated into laws. The American colonies followed the English tradition of viewing suicide as a crime, a position that continued until changes in the latter part of the twentieth century to encourage attempted suicides to seek medical attention.

For many theorists the right to privacy places some aspects of life beyond state regulation. These claims of privacy are most compelling when they concern intimate aspects of one's life and the control of one's own body (Griswold v. Connecticut [1965] and Roe v. Wade [1973]). Some extend this reasoning and argue that individuals should be able to decide when they want to end their lives by doing harm to that body; they argue that there is a right to die. Under this theory, laws preventing one from ending one's own life are unwarranted intrusions into a person's autonomy.

The Role of Medical Professionals in Euthanasia

Those seeking their own death may want assistance, either because their medical condition renders them incapable of taking their own life, or because they want to make sure that any attempt is both successful and as painless as possible. Medical professionals are uniquely placed in that they have both extensive contact with seriously ill people and the ability to hasten their death through refraining from treating them, or administering drugs to ensure a painless death. However, requests to assist a patient seeking death conflict with the Hippocratic oath sworn by all doctors to

"neither prescribe nor administer a lethal dose of medicine to any patient even if asked nor counsel any such thing."

Active versus Passive Euthanasia

Active euthanasia entails an intervention to bring about the death of the subject, frequently a lethal dose of medication; a doctor who assists in this violates the Hippocratic oath and such conduct is illegal in the United States. The 1980s and 1990s saw a determined effort by some states, particularly in the West, to make euthanasia easier, and in 1994 Oregon legalized physician-assisted suicide by referendum. However, due to court challenges it was not implemented until after a second referendum in 1997. The highest-profile euthanasia advocate was Dr. Jack Kevorkian, who assisted in many deaths and was later imprisoned in 1999. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not confer a right to physician-assisted suicide (Washington v. Glucksberg [1997]).

Internationally, there are only a few countries that explicitly permit physician-assisted suicide. Switzerland legalized euthanasia in 1947, but it was the legalization of physician-assisted suicide in the Netherlands (2000) and Belgium (2002) that reignited the international debate on euthanasia.

Passive euthanasia entails failing to take action that would otherwise save the life of the subject. There is considerable debate as to what falls within the scope of the passive category from complying with a "do not resuscitate" order, not providing life-saving medication, or even withholding food and water. It is considered to be legally, medically, and ethically sound to refrain from life-giving treatment if the patient so desires. In the United States, a person can refuse medical treatment, and actions that violate this constitute an assault, forming the legal and ethical justification for allowing passive euthanasia. The Supreme Court has ruled that the Due Process Clause does not extend this right to relatives of a patient incapable of making his or her wishes known (Cruzan v. Missouri [1990]). This has contributed to the rise of so called "living wills," documents drawn up in advance specifying under what conditions medical treatment should be withheld.

The active/passive distinction in euthanasia is considered to be extremely important from the standpoint of the Supreme Court and medical ethicists, although others maintain that this is a false distinction and that both are morally equivalent actions taken with the understanding that a hastened death will be the result. In addition, many question allowing someone to choose a potentially slow and painful death through refusing medical treatment, but denying them the chance to die quickly and relatively painlessly with medical assistance. The consequences of this distinction are felt most by people who, because of their condition, are incapable of quickly ending their own life, although the Supreme Court refused an Equal Protection Clause challenge to this distinction in Vacco v. Quill (1997).

Euthanasia is an extremely controversial topic in an aging society with the medical capacity to prolong life to an extent far greater than previously possible. Advocates cite the importance of allowing people to die with dignity, rather than to live on in pain, and to allow them to make their own decisions to end their own lives as peacefully and painlessly as possible. Those opposed to euthanasia are concerned that this would lead to the deaths of those who do not want to die, either through social pressure to cease being a burden on their families and request euthanasia, or the well-meaning but misguided carrying out involuntary euthanasia. As medical technology advances, the importance of this issue will increase, although the chances of resolution seem remote.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- Dworkin, Ronald. Life's Dominion: An Argument about Abortion, Euthanasia, and Individual Freedom. New York: Vintage, 1994.
- Kevorkian, Jack. Prescription Medicide: The Goodness of Planned Death. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1993.
- Minois, George. History of Suicide: Voluntary Death in Western Culture. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.
- Moreno, Jonathan, ed. Arguing Euthanasia: The Controversy over Mercy Killing, Assisted Suicide, and the "Right to Die". New York: Touchstone, 1995.
- Neeley, G. Steven. The Constitutional Right to Suicide: A Legal and Philosophical Examination. New York: Peter Lang, 1994.
- Quill, Timothy E. Death and Dignity: Making Choices and Taking Charge. New York: W.W. Norton & Company, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Dept. of Health*, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Vacco v. Quill*, 521 U.S. 793 (1997)
- Washington v. Glucksberg*, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)

See also Ballot Initiatives; Kevorkian, Jack; Oregon's Death with Dignity Act (1994); Penumbra; Privacy;

Privacy, Theories of; Reproductive Freedom; Substantive Due Process; Theories of Civil Liberties

EVERS, MEDGAR WILEY (1925–1963)

An African-American civil rights activist who fought racial violence in Mississippi, worked to secure voting rights, and coordinated movements leading to desegregation of state educational institutions and public accommodations, Medgar Wiley Evers was born in 1925 in Decatur, Mississippi.

During World War II, Evers served in the Army in England and France where he experienced nonsegregated institutions and formed friendships with whites. Upon returning to Mississippi, he challenged the Jim Crow voting system in 1946 by registering to vote, but he was prevented from voting. He completed high school and graduated in 1950 from Alcorn College, where he played an active role in student organizations and athletics.

Evers promoted the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) while working for an African-American insurance company. In 1954, he applied to the University of Mississippi law school. When his application was denied, he moved to Jackson to become the first Mississippi field secretary for the NAACP, the only full-time civil rights advocate in the state.

During the 1950s he investigated racial violence against African Americans, helping bring national attention to the murders of George Lee and Lamar Smith and to the attempted murder of Gus Courts—all shot for attempting to vote or actually voting. He helped investigate the murder of fourteen-year-old Emmett Till. He continued to investigate crimes and police brutality against African Americans in the 1960s. Aaron Henry summarized, "In most of these cases, we were not able to get punishment for guilty parties, but at least we got them into court and into the spotlight of public attention."

In the face of massive state resistance to Brown v. Board of Education, Evers encouraged action pressing for the integration of local schools, supported litigation that desegregated the University of Mississippi in 1962, and cooperated with Justice Department lawsuits that challenged state practices which denied voting rights to African Americans. He encouraged boycotts, demonstrations, and other activities aimed at desegregating public facilities.

Evers was convicted of criminal contempt for his criticism of the unjust conviction of Clyde Kennard. The reversal of Evers's conviction by the state supreme court in Evers v. State (Miss. 1961) signaled a modest but significant retreat from judicial suppression of political speech. This case illustrates the important connection between the protection of civil liberties and the struggle for black civil rights in the 1950s and 1960s.

In 1963, Evers was murdered by a white supremacist. Despite overwhelming evidence, two all-white juries failed to convict, seemingly confirming the view that no white man could be convicted of killing an African American in Mississippi. Evers's death galvanized public opinion, demonstrated the need for federal enforcement of civil rights, and motivated the adoption of new federal civil rights laws.

In 1994, Evers's killer was retried and finally convicted of murder. The result symbolized the change in attitudes towards racial violence, proved the value of criminal justice in promoting racial reconciliation, and inspired the reopening other cold cases from the civil rights era.

Evers married Myrlie Beasley in 1951 and had three children with her. After his death, she became a prominent spokesperson for civil rights, serving as chair and interim president of the NAACP.

MICHAEL H. HOFFHEIMER

References and Further Reading

- Bailey, Ronald. Remembering Medgar Evers. Oxford, MS: Heritage Publications, 1988.
- Brown, Jennie. Medgar Evers. Los Angeles: Melrose Square, 1994.
- DeLaughter, Bobby. Never Too Late: A Prosecutor's Story of Justice in the Medgar Evers Case. New York: Scribner, 2001.
- Evers, Medgar Wiley. The Autobiography of Medgar Evers: A Hero's Life and Legacy Revealed Through His Writings, Letters, and Speeches. Edited by Myrlie Evers-Williams and Manning Marable. New York: Harper Collins, 2005.
- Evers, Myrlie B. For Us the Living. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.
- Henry, Aaron, with Constance Curry. Aaron Henry: The Fire Ever Burning. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2000.
- Nossiter, Adam. Of Long Memory: Mississippi and the Murder of Medgar Evers. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1994.
- Voller, Maryanne. Ghosts of Mississippi: The Murder of Medgar Evers, The Trials of Byron de la Beckwith, and the Haunting of the New South. Boston: Little, Brown, 1995.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Evers v. State*, 131 So. 2d 653 (Miss. 1961)

See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Voting Rights (Compound)

EVERSON v. BOARD OF EDUCATION, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)

This landmark Supreme Court decision is important for two reasons. One, it held for the first time that the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment ("Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion . . .") is incorporated into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment ("[N]or shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law . . .") and, thus, applies to state governments as well as the federal government. Two, the Court's Everson opinion was the first to give an extensive, if not authoritative, interpretation of the Establishment Clause.

Facts, Issues, and Holdings

In 1941, New Jersey passed a statute authorizing local school districts to provide transportation to children going to either public or private schools. In turn, the Township of Ewing began reimbursing parents for money they spent on the public transportation of their children to either public or private schools. In Ewing, however, the only children who did not go to public schools went to Catholic schools, which taught them not only secular subjects, but the tenets and practices of Catholicism. A district taxpayer challenged the constitutionality of the state law on the grounds that it violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in two ways. First, the law authorized the taking of private property and spending it for a private, not public, purpose. Second, the law was one "respecting an establishment of religion," which, because it was prohibited by the First Amendment, was also prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment. By a five-to-four vote, the Court upheld the law.

Justice Hugo Black wrote the opinion for the majority. He rather easily disposed of the first argument that the law had a private rather than a public purpose. He said that the law's purpose was to protect the safety of the children by enabling them to "ride in public busses to and from schools rather than run the risk of traffic and other hazards incident to walking or 'hitchhiking.'" It did not matter, he said, that the public money went to individuals as reimbursement for what they had already spent. Subsidies and loans to private individuals and businesses that serve to promote a public good "have been commonplace practices in our state and national history."

As for whether the Establishment Clause applied to state and local governments via the Fourteenth Amendment, Black simply assumed that it did. All that he did to justify his assumption was cite a brief passage from Murdock v. Pennsylvania (1943) that said the Fourteenth Amendment had made the First Amendment “applicable to the states.”

More troublesome for Black was the issue of what the Establishment Clause prohibited. Although he quickly asserted that the Establishment Clause prohibited government from funding “any or all religions,” he noted that it was difficult to distinguish “between tax legislation which provides funds for the welfare of the general public and that which is designed to support institutions which teach religion.” Black even suggested that in deciding cases like this the Court had no margin for error—that the First Amendment required it, in effect, to walk a tightrope. Although the Establishment Clause does not allow tax funds to go to institutions that teach religious doctrines, the Free Exercise Clause, he said, disallows government’s excluding any persons, “because of their faith, or lack of it, from receiving the benefits of public welfare legislation.”

The main issue, therefore, was how to categorize the law. Was it a general welfare provision or a law that supported the teaching of religion? The Court majority concluded it was the former. Although Black conceded that the state’s providing free school transportation indirectly aided the church schools (and thus the teaching of religion), by causing some children, who otherwise would not do have done so, to attend those schools, he said the same could be said of the state’s providing police protection to children going to and from schools. Obviously, he said, the state was not required to remove general government services, such as police and fire protection, from church schools. Black concluded: “The State contributes no money to the schools. It does not support them. Its legislation . . . does no more than provide a general program to help parents get their children, regardless of their religion, safely and expeditiously to and from accredited schools.”

Justice Black’s History and Interpretation of the Establishment Clause

If Black had said only what was summarized above, the Everson decision might have caused hardly a ripple, but he did not. He felt obliged to give a definitive interpretation of the Establishment Clause. In an often-quoted passage, he said:

The “establishment of religion” clause of the First Amendment means at least this: Neither a state nor the Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another. Neither can force nor influence a person to go to or to remain away from church against his will or force him to profess a belief or disbelief in any religion. No person can be punished for entertaining or professing religious beliefs or disbeliefs, for church attendance or nonattendance. No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion. Neither a state nor the Federal Government can, openly or secretly, participate in the affairs of any religious organizations or groups and vice versa. In the words of Jefferson, the clause against establishment of religion by law was intended to erect “a wall of separation between Church and State.”

To justify this interpretation of the Establishment Clause, Black presented a lengthy account of its origin. He relied primarily on James Madison’s “Memorial and Remonstrance” and Thomas Jefferson’s “Virginia Statute of Religious Liberty,” both of which were opposed to a bill in Virginia that would have taxed persons for the purpose of supporting all Christian clergy. More specifically, Black wrote that the provisions of the First Amendment, in the drafting and adoption of which Madison and Jefferson played such leading roles, had the same objective and were intended to provide the same protection against government intrusion on religious liberty as the Virginia [Jefferson’s] statute.

Black, however, did not stop here. Aware that his “wall of separation” interpretation of the Establishment Clause was difficult to reconcile with the actual holding of the Court, he enunciated another “purpose of the First Amendment.” It “requires the state to be a neutral in its relations with groups of religious believers and nonbelievers; it does not require the state to be their adversary. State power is no more to be used so as to handicap religions, than it is to favor them.” Ultimately, then, Black justified the Everson decision on the grounds of neutrality, not separation.

Black’s opinion has been widely and sharply criticized by both scholars and justices on the Court. At the time, the dissenting opinions, written by Justices Robert Jackson and Wiley Rutledge, who wanted the law nullified, complained that the Court’s decision was simply inconsistent with Black’s interpretation of the Establishment Clause, especially with his assertion that “[n]o tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion.” They insisted that the New Jersey law breached the “wall of separation between Church and State.”

Since then, Black's opinion has been criticized for other reasons: for simply assuming that the Establishment Clause, even though it guarantees no "liberty" and may have been intended to protect state establishments of religion, was incorporated into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; for interpreting the Establishment Clause so broadly as to make the Free Exercise Clause superfluous; for saying that the clause prohibits not just aid to one religion, but aid to all religions; for saying that the clause prohibits religious organizations from "participating" in the affairs of government; for asserting without any evidence that it was the views of Virginians, especially Madison and Jefferson, that are reflected in the Religion Clauses; and for failing to present evidence from the drafting of the clauses by the First Congress.

Perhaps above all else, Black's opinion can be criticized for spawning what most scholars consider to be a series of confusing and inconsistent Court decisions based on the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment. By being indecisive and saying that the Religion Clauses require both separation of government and religion, and government neutrality between religion and nonreligion, Black gave the justices of the Court two different principles that for decades competed for dominance. In some decisions, separation prevailed; in others neutrality did. Eventually, however, the Court rejected the principle of separation in favor of the principle of neutrality.

ELLIS M. WEST

References and Further Reading

- Formicola, Jo R., and Hubert Morken, eds. Everson Revisited: Religion, Education, and the Law at the Crossroads. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1997.
- Kauper, Paul G., Everson v. Board of Education: A Product of the Judicial Will, Arizona Law Review 15 (1973): 307–326.
- Murray, John Courtney, Law or Prepossessions? Law and Contemporary Problems 14 (1949): 23–43.
- Sorauf, Frank J. The Wall of Separation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1976.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Murdock v. Pennsylvania*, 319 U.S. 105 (1943)
- Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom (1786), Statutes at Large 12 (1823): 84

See also Application of First Amendment to States; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; History and Its Role in Supreme Court Decision Making on Religion; Incorporation Doctrine; State Aid to Religious Schools

EX PARTE MILLIGAN, 71 U.S. 2 (1866)

The Milligan opinion, issued just after the Civil War ended, held that Lambdin Milligan's trial by military commission was unconstitutional. Vehemently denounced by Republicans who viewed it as a threat to military reconstruction in the South, and somewhat limited by its own facts and by subsequent cases, the opinion still stands as one of the Supreme Court's most important decisions on civil liberties and the limits of military authority over civilians.

Milligan, a lawyer practicing in southern Indiana, was an outspoken critic of both President Lincoln and Indiana's Republican Governor Oliver P. Morton. A Democrat who unsuccessfully sought his party's nomination for governor in 1860, Milligan opposed the war and infringements of civil liberties by state and federal officials. After 1862, Democrats controlled both houses of the Indiana legislature. State politics became extremely partisan as the 1864 presidential and gubernatorial elections drew near, and Democrats and Republicans alike formed secret societies to support their parties. Milligan's association with one such society, the Sons of Liberty, led to his subsequent arrest and trial by military commission.

The Sons of Liberty, founded in part to get out the vote for Democratic candidates, also made initial plans to free thousands of Confederate soldiers held in Illinois and other states; the group may have also accepted money from Confederate agents in Canada. In August 1864, federal officials arrested Milligan and a handful of others, charging them with conspiracy, affording aid and comfort to the enemy, and other offenses. The Indianapolis military trials lasted from September to December 1864, partially amid the electoral campaign. The commission found Milligan guilty and sentenced him to death. The precise extent of Milligan's involvement in the Sons of Liberty remains unclear.

Milligan and two others filed writs of habeas corpus with the federal court in Indianapolis, which certified the legal issues in the case to the Supreme Court. Milligan argued in part that military commissions had no power to try civilians like himself where the regular courts were open and functioning. The military trial meant that Milligan did not receive many constitutional protections afforded defendants tried by civilian courts, including the right to a jury of residents of Indiana and the right to be tried only for conduct that Congress had criminalized by law.

All nine justices agreed that the military commission that tried Milligan was unlawful, but they were deeply divided in their reasoning. The majority opinion, authored by Justice Davis, a longtime friend and political ally of Lincoln, reasoned broadly that neither Congress nor the president could authorize military trials of civilians, except in the actual theater of war where the regular courts were not functioning.

Chief Justice Chase, writing for the four-person concurrence, reasoned that Congress had not authorized the trial of Milligan; indeed, the Habeas Corpus Act of 1863 required that prisoners like Milligan had to be indicted by a grand jury or released. A grand jury had met just prior to Milligan's arrest, but had failed to indict him. This settled the matter for Chase, who thought the majority erred by considering whether Congress would have the power to authorize military commissions if it attempted to do so. Chase also believed that the majority erred in how it answered this hypothetical question: he reasoned that Congress would have the power to establish such commissions.

Justice Davis's famous opinion for the Court includes sweeping and often-cited language about the limits of government power during war. The opinion, however, met with immediate and vitriolic criticism from Republicans who charged that the Court's reasoning would have lost the war for the Union and that Congress's efforts at military reconstruction in the South would be fatally undermined. In 1868, the Court appeared ready to consider the constitutionality of military commissions authorized by reconstruction legislation in Ex parte McCardle. Congress, however, revoked the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court over this and similar habeas appeals, and the Court honored the revocation.

Twentieth-century commentators sometimes applauded Milligan as a vitally important civil liberties opinion. Others argued that it has had little practical effect, noting that the Court issued it only after Confederate troops had surrendered and the war was over. An American citizen tried by a military commission during World War II relied in part on Milligan to support his petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The Court rejected the petition and distinguished Milligan on the grounds that the World War II defendant had actually joined the Nazis, while Milligan was not part of the enemy armed forces and was not subject to the laws of war. The president's detention of "enemy combatants" in the United States following the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks has once again raised fundamental questions about civil liberties and military authority, and has focused new attention on Milligan.

INGRID BRUNK WUERTH

References and Further Reading

Fairman, Charles. History of the Supreme Court of the United States: Reconstruction and Reunion: 1864–1888. Vol. VI, Part I. New York: Macmillan Company, 1971.

Klement, Frank L. "The Indianapolis Treason Trials and Ex parte Milligan." In American Political Trials, edited by Michal R. Belknap. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981.

Rehnquist, William H. All the Laws but One. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.

Warren, Charles. The Supreme Court in United States History. Vol. 3, 1856–1918. Boston: Little, Brown, and Co., 1923.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. 506 (1869)

See also Military Tribunals; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism

EX PARTE VALLANDIGHAM, 28 F.CAS. 874 (1863)

This case deals with the conflict between free expression and military necessity during the course of war. It represents the struggle between free speech rights and the imperiled security of the Union.

On September 24, 1862, President Lincoln issued a proclamation suspending the writ of habeas corpus and declaring martial law. In March 1863, President Lincoln appointed General Ambrose Burnside to the post of Union commander of the Department of Ohio. Thereafter, General Burnside issued General Order No. 38, which announced that "[i]t must be distinctly understood that treason, expressed or implied, will not be tolerated in this department." General Burnside's issuance of General Order No. 38 resulted in what turned out to be the Civil War's most celebrated arrest and prosecution for disloyal speech.

In May 1863, Clement Vallandigham addressed a large meeting of citizens where he described the war as "wicked, cruel, and unnecessary;" characterized General Order No. 38 as a "base usurpation of arbitrary authority;" and contended that "the sooner the people informed the minions of the usurped power, that they will not submit to such restrictions upon their liberties, the better."

Based on the speech, Vallandigham was arrested and brought before a five-member military commission and charged with "[p]ublicly expressing in violation of General order No. 38 . . . sympathy for those in arms against the government of the United States, and declaring disloyal sentiments and opinions with the object and purpose of weakening the power of the government in its efforts to suppress an unlawful rebellion."

After a two-day trial, at which Vallandigham refused to plead because he contended that the tribunal had no lawful authority over a civilian, the commission found Vallandigham guilty as charged and sentenced him to confinement “in some fortress of the United States, . . . there to be kept during the war.” President Lincoln commuted the sentence a few days later, and Vallandigham was banished from military lines.

Vallandigham filed a petition for writ of habeas corpus arguing that his constitutional rights had been violated, including his right to due process of law, the right to be tried on the indictment of a grand jury, the right to a public trial by an impartial jury, the right to confront witnesses against him, and the right to have compulsory process for witnesses in his behalf. Judge Humphrey H. Leavitt denied Vallandigham’s petition, basing his decision on moral grounds rather than precedent.

Judge Leavitt explained that [t]he court cannot shut its eyes to the grave fact that war exists, involving the most eminent public danger, and threatening the subversion in destruction of the constitution itself. In my judgment, when the life of the republic is in peril, he misstates his duty and obligation as a patriot who is not willing to concede to the constitution such a capacity of adaptation to circumstances as may be necessary to meet a great emergency, and save the nation from hopeless ruin. Self-preservation is a paramount law.

Addressing the specific circumstances of this case, Judge Leavitt observed that “[a]rtful men, disguising their latent treason under hollow pretensions of devotion to the Union,” have been “striving to disseminate their pestilent heresies among the masses of the people.” Judge Leavitt found that General Burnside was reasonable in perceiving “the dangerous consequences of these disloyal efforts” and in resolving, “if possible, to suppress them,” because the “evil was one of alarming magnitude.” Judge Leavitt concluded by stating that those who criticized the government in time of crisis “must learn that they cannot stab its vitals with impunity.”

Ex parte Vallandigham raised basic civil liberty issues—the power of the military to try civilians and imprison or otherwise punish people for antiwar speech. Lest we not forget, without free speech, we would not have democracy.

PATRICK H. HAGGERTY

References and Further Reading

- Curtis, Michael Kent. Free Speech, “The People’s Darling Privilege”: Struggles for Freedom of Expression in American History. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2000.
- Klement, Frank L. The Limits of Dissent: Clement L. Vallandigham & The Civil War. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1970.

- Rehnquist, William H. All the Laws But One: Civil Liberties in Wartime. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.
- Vallandigham, James L. A Life of Clement L. Vallandigham. Baltimore: Turnbull Bros., 1872.

EX POST FACTO CLAUSE

Ex post facto laws are laws which apply to an event which occurred in the past. They are a form of retroactive legislation. Most are enacted as an attempt by a legislature to identify specifically one person or group of persons who are to be punished by the legislation. The U.S. Constitution prohibits such retroactive legislation in Article I, section 9, clause 3. While this is a constitutional provision that only applies to the federal government, a parallel provision in Article I, section 10, clause 1, applies to the states.

The twin constitutional provisions prohibiting ex post facto laws were limited in their application by the U.S. Supreme Court in the 1798 decision of Calder v. Bull (1798). The Court held that legislatures can not pass a law subjecting someone to a fine or period of imprisonment for an act that was not unlawful when it was done. This meant that the ex post facto provisions in the U.S. Constitution would apply only to penal and criminal statutes. In addition to limiting the application of the ex post facto provisions, Justice Samuel Chase suggested strongly that many types of retroactive legislation are generally unjust and as a general rule should be avoided.

In his opinion, Justice Chase wrote the authoritative formulation of the kinds of retroactive legislation that would fall within the Constitution’s prohibition of ex post facto legislation:

1st. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; and punishes such action. 2d. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was, when committed. 3d. Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment, than the law annexed to the crime, when committed. 4th Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less, or different testimony, than the law required at the time of the commission of the offence, in order to convict the offender.

The Supreme Court’s decision in Calder v. Bull reflected the ideas of many of this nation’s founders. Alexander Hamilton had written, for example, in The Federalist Papers Number 84 of a strong opposition to “[t]he creation of crimes after the commission of the fact, or, in other words, the subjecting of men to punishment for things which, when they were done, were breaches of no law . . .”

The essential character of all ex post facto legislation is its retroactive application. But within the meaning of the prohibition as defined in Calder v. Bull, not all retroactive legislation is barred by the Constitution's dual provisions. For example, laws that require the deportation of certain aliens for past conduct have been held as not penalizing a person for his or her past conduct. One such case is Marcello v. Bonds (1955) where an order deporting a resident alien was affirmed by the Supreme Court because of an earlier drug conviction. Other laws, such as those challenged in Kansas v. Hendricks (1997), which have changed the length or nature of the incarceration for certain convicted sexual offenders have been held to be civil in nature. Thus, the additional commitment to a mental health facility because the offender was determined to be a danger to self or to others has been upheld.

A provision enacted by the California legislature, which extended the statute of limitations for a crime beyond the one-year period for prosecution following the commitment of the crime, was found in Stogner v. California (2003) to violate the ex post facto barrier when the purpose was to revive a previously time-barred prosecution. The allegations in the Stogner prosecution were that the alleged sexual offenses had occurred more than twenty years prior to the revision of California's three-year statute of limitations. This distinction between civil and penal laws was also made in the decision in Smith v. Doe (2003) in the same U.S. Supreme Court term upholding the application of provisions of Alaska's "Megan's Law," which required convicted sex offenders to register with local police departments. The Supreme Court noted that the legislature intended to create a civil regulatory scheme and one that was not clearly punitive in nature.

Three considerations usually underlie any evaluation of enacted ex post facto laws. First, ex post facto laws are generally believed to violate the Constitution's separation of powers. The Constitution assigns to the executive and judicial branches the responsibility for handing out punishment against individuals found to have committed crimes. The legislative branch, by contrast, is expected to make laws of general application. Second, ex post facto laws may violate First Amendment principles if the intended punishment is seen to have a chilling effect on otherwise constitutionally protected speech or actions. And, third, ex post facto laws are generally unfair in that they fail to provide adequate notice to individuals that their actions may have criminal consequences.

JERRY E. STEPHENS

References and Further Reading

- Congressional Research Service. The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 2004.
- Monk, Linda R. The Words We Live By: Your Annotated Guide to the Constitution. New York: Hyperion, 2003.
- Rotunda, Ronald D., and John E. Nowak. Treatise on Constitutional Law: Substance and Procedure. 3rd ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Calder v. Bull*, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 386 (1798)
- Kansas v. Hendricks*, 521 U.S. 346 (1997)
- Marcello v. Bonds*, 349 U.S. 302 (1955)
- Smith v. Doe*, 538 U.S. 84 (2003)
- Stogner v. California*, 539 U.S. 607 (2003)

EXCLUSIONARY RULE

The exclusionary rule forbids the introduction of certain evidence in court, in an attempt to ensure that the state and federal governments do not violate individuals' constitutional rights. The rule applies to criminal trials and as a general matter forbids the use of evidence that was obtained as a result of a violation of the Fourth or Fifth Amendments in the government's case-in-chief, that is, in the part of the trial where the government presents its evidence of the defendant's guilt. Accordingly, if the police, on a wild hunch, break down a person's front door and discover drugs in the house, the drugs may not be used to convict the homeowner of drug possession.

There are several exceptions to this rule, however, which will be discussed in more detail below. The rule does not apply to civil proceedings and does not apply to pretrial or sentencing hearings in a criminal prosecution. Even at trial, if the defendant testifies falsely, the government can rebut the defendant's testimony by using the illegally obtained evidence. Furthermore, if the police obtain a warrant that is defective in some way, so that the resulting search is unconstitutional, the evidence found may still be admitted at trial in the prosecution's case-in-chief if the police were acting in reasonable good faith on the warrant.

The exclusionary rule ordinarily applies to ban the government from using not only the evidence that is found during an unconstitutional search, but also that evidence that is found because of that search. So, a search that turns up a lead to further evidence will result in suppressing both the lead and the additional evidence. But not all evidence that is found as a result of the unconstitutional action will be excluded. If the connection between the illegality and the evidence is too attenuated, or if the police would have found the evidence by legal means, then the exclusionary rule does not apply. Lastly, the exclusionary rule is an available remedy only for the individual whose person or property was searched or seized. If a search of a person turns up evidence of his friend's crime, the friend will usually be unable to have that evidence suppressed.

Arguments for and against the Exclusionary Rule

The Supreme Court has held since Weeks v. United States (1914) that the exclusionary rule bars the use in federal trials of evidence that was obtained by violating the Fourth Amendment, which prohibits "unreasonable searches and seizures." It was not until Mapp v. Ohio (1961), however, that the Supreme Court required states to use the exclusionary rule as well. The rule was originally based on two considerations. First, the Court wanted to deter police from violating the Constitution. If any evidence illegally seized by the police could not be used in the defendant's trial, then (the theory went) there would be no reason to commit the violation in the first place. Second, the Court thought it was wrong to involve the judicial process in the constitutional violation. That is, even though the judiciary did not commit the unreasonable search, the Court thought it improper that the Court take part in the constitutional violation by using its fruits. In later years this second justification has fallen out of favor and the courts now exclusively rely on the deterrence rationale, as the Supreme Court itself pointed out in Stone v. Powell (1976) and United States v. Janis (1976).

The rule remains controversial today because its effect is to make it more difficult to convict guilty criminal defendants. In the example in the first paragraph, there is no doubt that the homeowner whose house was unconstitutionally searched by police was guilty of drug possession. Justice Benjamin Cardozo, who was then a judge on the New York Court of Appeals, most famously stated the disadvantage of the exclusionary rule: "The criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered" (People v. Defore [1926]). Moreover, the exclusionary rule does nothing to compensate innocent persons for violations of their Fourth Amendment rights. An illegal search that turns up no evidence will never be subject to the exclusionary rule because there will be no trial, yet the rights of that innocent person were violated just as much as were the rights of the manifestly guilty person for whom the exclusionary rule is a get-out-of-jail-free card. Nevertheless, to the extent the exclusionary rule deters unlawful police conduct, there will be fewer violations of the Fourth Amendment rights of the innocent and the guilty, so perhaps the rights of the law-abiding are served in some way by the application of the rule to the nonlaw-abiding.

There are considerable instances when the rule does not deter police conduct. This can happen for several reasons. First, the officers may not know that their conduct violates the Constitution. They may think they are following the Fourth Amendment, but a judge may later disagree. In that instance, the exclusionary rule—like any penalty—will not deter a violation, for the officer will not know that he is subjecting himself to the penalty. Second, if the person whose property is searched is not prosecuted (or if the case is plea bargained), then the exclusionary rule never comes into play. The exclusionary rule then does nothing to protect the rights of persons who will not be prosecuted. As a result, whatever deterrent effect the exclusionary rule has is lessened because a certain portion of unconstitutional searches will not result in exclusion. Third, officers may not be deterred from committing violations if the exclusionary rule is applied months or years after the unconstitutional search, and the passage of time makes it hard for the officer to learn from his error, if he is ever told of the exclusion at all. Fourth, an officer bent on violating the Fourth Amendment may be able to lie in court and avoid the exclusionary rule that way, lessening the deterrent value of the rule.

On the other hand, police departments have become more conscious of the Fourth Amendment in the years since Mapp, and officers whose searches cannot yield convictions eventually feel some heat from the officials whom the voters expect to put criminals behind bars. Even as to the first objection—that officers cannot reasonably be expected to know the details of Fourth Amendment doctrine—there is vast disagreement. Several states have concluded that the exclusionary rule does deter officers, and if it causes officers to be cautious even when they are approaching the constitutional line, so much the better.

The Good Faith Exception

The Supreme Court has decided, however, that the police act "reasonably," and therefore there is no need to exclude evidence if the police were acting reasonably in good faith reliance on a warrant—even if that warrant is later determined to be invalid (United States v. Leon [1984]). If, for example, the police lack probable cause to obtain a search warrant, but they apply for the warrant anyway and a judge issues one, evidence found in that search will be admissible if the officers' reliance on the warrant was reasonable and in good faith. The Court has decided that police cannot be expected to second-guess judges, and if a judge finds that there is probable cause, the police should not be expected to doubt that determination.

EXCLUSIONARY RULE

There are, however, some important limitations on the use of the good faith exception. If the judge signs the warrant because he is deceived by the police, then the police are not acting in good faith and the exception does not apply. Also, if probable cause is so lacking, or if the warrant wholly fails to specify the place to be searched or the items to be seized such that no reasonable officer would believe that the warrant is valid, the exception will not apply.

Leon's good faith exception is merely one instance where illegally obtained evidence is admitted in court despite the exclusionary rule. Perhaps most significant, the exclusionary rule does not apply in civil cases, and even in criminal cases the rule applies only to trials. Accordingly, illegally obtained evidence may be introduced before grand juries or at sentencing hearings. The Supreme Court has explained that the exclusionary rule is most likely to achieve its deterrent objective in criminal trials (as the government is often tempted to violate the Fourth Amendment in the investigation of crimes), and that accordingly the rule need not be extended to cover other proceedings. Nevertheless, as critics have pointed out, if the integrity of the courts is thought to be undermined by the use of illegally obtained evidence (as Weeks maintained), the admission of such evidence in civil and criminal trials would equally undercut that interest.

Habeas Corpus

Habeas corpus proceedings—which are technically civil but often involve federal court review of state court criminal prosecutions—are somewhat more complicated. A defendant convicted in state court can bring an action for a writ of habeas corpus in federal court, which would require the state to justify its continued imprisonment of the criminal defendant. Ordinarily, if the federal court finds that the state conviction was obtained through a violation of the Constitution—for example, because the state failed to respect the defendant's request for a jury trial—the federal court would require the state to conduct a new trial or release the prisoner. Under Stone v. Powell, however, the result is different when the prisoner objects to his conviction based on a violation of the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule.

Suppose that a state tries a defendant for murder, and a key piece of evidence is the defendant's knife stained with the victim's blood. The police obtained that knife, however, by violating the Fourth Amendment—perhaps because they unreasonably failed to obtain a search warrant. Mapp makes the exclusionary rule applicable to the initial state trial. The state courts, however, believe that no warrant was necessary, so they allow the knife into evidence. After the defendant is convicted, he petitions for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that his constitutional rights were violated. Even if the federal court hearing his claim agrees that the police violated the Constitution, the defendant will not receive a new trial. Stone v. Powell concluded that the deterrent effect on the police of applying the exclusionary rule to habeas corpus proceedings simply does not justify the costs of setting convicted, guilty criminals free.

Even this rule, however, has limits. If the state gave the defendant no chance at the original trial to argue that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated, then he would be able to argue the violation on habeas review. And—although the Supreme Court has not yet decided this question—if the state court decision admitting the evidence was clearly and obviously wrong, the federal court might conclude that in effect the defendant was not given “an opportunity for a full and fair litigation of [his] Fourth Amendment claim,” requiring a new trial. As a general matter, however, a prisoner will not receive habeas relief if a state court wrongly admits unconstitutionally obtained evidence at his trial.

The Impeachment Exception

Furthermore, the exclusionary rule applies only to the prosecution's case-in-chief—that part of a criminal trial where the government sets forth its proof of the defendant's guilt. If the defendant takes the witness stand to testify, however, the prosecution can use unconstitutionally obtained evidence to “impeach” the defendant, that is, to demonstrate that the defendant's statements are untrue. The Court has reasoned that defendants should not be able to use the exclusionary rule to enable them to commit perjury (United States v. Havens [1980]). This impeachment exception, however, applies only when the defendant himself takes the stand. The Supreme Court held in James v. Illinois (1990) that the prosecutor may not use unconstitutionally obtained evidence to impeach the testimony of other defense witnesses.

Fruit of the Poisonous Tree

The exclusionary rule typically extends not only to the evidence found during an unconstitutional search, but also to evidence that is discovered because of the illegal search. Thus, if the police enter a house unconstitutionally and find drugs and a letter indicating where other drugs could be found, both the letter and the drugs at that house would be excluded because they were found during an unconstitutional search. But what if the police then go to the place referenced in the letter and find the other stash of drugs? Are those drugs admissible? The general answer is no, because those drugs are “fruit of the poisonous tree,” that is, they were found as the result of unconstitutional police action, and they too must be excluded.

Like all the other aspects of the exclusionary rule, however, this one has exceptions. First, if the police discover the evidence illegally but then their investigation takes them to the same evidence without violating the Constitution, they have established an “independent source” for the evidence—independent, that is, from the constitutional violation—and the evidence will be admitted (Murray v. United States [1988]). Second, if the police discover evidence unconstitutionally but can demonstrate that they would have discovered the same evidence had no constitutional violation occurred, the evidence will be admitted under the “inevitable discovery” exception (Nix v. Williams [1984]). Third, if the unconstitutional police action is so removed from the acquisition of the evidence that “the deterrent effect of the exclusionary rule no longer justifies its cost,” the attenuation doctrine serves to admit the evidence (Wong Sun v. United States [1963]). It is unclear when exactly a court will determine that there has been sufficient attenuation, but relevant factors include the amount of time elapsed between the unconstitutional action and the discovery of the evidence, and how flagrant the violation of the Constitution was. Additionally, if the suspect provided the evidence in a display of his own free will, or if the evidence consisted of another person’s testimony, a court is likely to find that the evidence was attenuated from the violation.

Although both the direct evidence traceable to a constitutional violation and the indirect “fruits” of that violation are ordinarily inadmissible in a trial of the person whose rights were violated, the exclusionary rule does not apply where the defendant is someone other than the person who was subject to an unconstitutional search or seizure. So, suppose the police unconstitutionally break in to A’s apartment, where they find drugs and a letter from B to A proposing a drug transaction. At trial, A will have the letter and the drugs suppressed because of the constitutional violation. B, however, will not be able to contest the admission of the evidence against him, because his rights were not violated; the police broke into A’s apartment and invaded A’s privacy, not B’s.

The Fifth Amendment Exclusionary Rule

Although most observers are familiar with the exclusionary rule’s applicability to Fourth Amendment violations, the rule applies also to violations of the compulsory Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment. In fact, while the text of the Fourth Amendment makes no explicit mention of exclusion, the Fifth Amendment contains an exclusionary rule that does not require judicial construction. That amendment provides that “[n]o person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.” Accordingly, where a court, the police, or another agency of government compels a statement by a criminal defendant—where the statement is made involuntarily because of the threat of criminal sanctions or physical harm, for example—that statement may not be admitted at the defendant’s trial for any purpose. The amendment presupposes that coerced statements are inherently unreliable, and therefore it would harm the truth-seeking process of trials for such evidence to be admitted.

More controversial has been the Supreme Court’s decision in Miranda v. Arizona (1966), in which compulsion would be presumed if the defendant were subjected to custodial interrogation and he were not provided the now-famous Miranda warnings. Under Miranda, then, voluntary statements are subject to the exclusionary rule. Because such voluntary statements are reliable, however, the Supreme Court has held that they will be excluded only from the prosecution’s case-in-chief. In other words, when the prosecution puts forward its evidence that the defendant committed a crime, that evidence cannot include the un-Mirandized statement. If the defendant takes the stand and testifies in his own defense, however, and makes statements contradicting the excluded statement, then the prosecution can make use of the un-Mirandized statement. The Supreme Court has held that excluding evidence from the prosecution’s case-in-chief is necessary to ensure that the police will not violate Miranda, but the Court is unwilling to apply the exclusionary rule to allow the defendant to lie on the stand, when the lie could be exposed by using the un-Mirandized statement.

A further controversy centers on the application of the exclusionary rule to evidence obtained as the result of a Miranda violation. Suppose a suspect is interrogated without Miranda warnings and makes a voluntary confession to a murder, in which he discloses the location of the murder weapon. The police then give the suspect the Miranda warnings and ask the suspect to repeat the confession, which he does. The first confession is excluded from the prosecution's case-in-chief.

The protections in the Bill of Rights are written in lofty terms, guaranteeing freedoms and invoking ideals that continue to inspire us. The exclusionary rule is both an attempt to realize those ideals and to take account of the practical necessities of investigating, prosecuting, and punishing crime. As a result, the doctrine is a hodgepodge of conflicting decisions and will remain so as long as the country continues to debate the price that it is willing to pay to protect its civil liberties.

MICHAEL DIMINO

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil Reed. The Constitution and Criminal Procedure: First Principles. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Amsterdam, Anthony G., Perspectives on the Fourth Amendment, Minnesota Law Review 58 (1974): 3:409–39.
- Dressler, Joshua Understanding Criminal Procedure. 3d ed. Newark, NJ: Matthew Bender & Co., 2002.
- Hall, John Wesley, Jr. Search and Seizure. Vol. 1, 3d ed. Charlottesville, VA: LEXIS Law Publishing, 2000.
- Kamisar, Yale, In Defense of the Search and Seizure Exclusionary Rule, Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 26 (2003): 1:119–40.
- LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. Vol. 1, 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2004.
- Stuntz, William J., The Virtues and Vices of the Exclusionary Rule, Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 20 (1997): 2:443–55.
- Whitebread, Charles H., and Christopher Slobogin. Criminal Procedure: An Analysis of Cases and Concepts. 4th ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- James v. Illinois*, 493 U.S. 307 (1990)
- Mapp v. Ohio*, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Murray v. United States*, 487 U.S. 533 (1988)
- Nix v. Williams*, 467 U.S. 431 (1984)
- People v. Defore*, 150 N.E. 585, 587 (N.Y. 1926)
- Stone v. Powell*, 428 U.S. 465, 485 (1976)
- United States v. Havens*, 446 U.S. 620 (1980)
- United States v. Janis*, 428 U.S. 433, 446 (1976)
- United States v. Leon*, 468 U.S. 897 (1984)
- Weeks v. United States*, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)
- Wong Sun v. United States*, 371 U.S. 471 (1963)

See also Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971); Search (General Definition); Seizure

EXEMPLARS

The Fifth Amendment provides that “no person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.” This restriction on government power, commonly known as the privilege against self-incrimination, is designed to protect individual autonomy by forcing the government to obtain evidence against a defendant through its own labors, rather than by “the cruel, simple expedient of compelling it from his own mouth.”

The classic example of the privilege against self-incrimination is the right to remain silent when questioned by government officials, established in the seminal case Miranda v. Arizona (1966). Questions about the scope of the privilege also commonly arise, however, when the prosecution attempts to compel a defendant to produce a sample of his handwriting, fingerprints, or similar kind of physical evidence. Such examples are collectively known as exemplars.

With few exceptions, courts have rejected claims that the compelled production of exemplars violates the privilege against self-incrimination. The privilege extends only to “testimonial” evidence—evidence that in some sense discloses the contents of the defendant’s mind—and the Supreme Court has consistently held that exemplars are not testimonial. The classic case in this regard is Schmerber v. California (1966), where the Court noted that the incriminating potential of a blood test results from chemical analysis, not from any testimony or otherwise communicative act on the part of the defendant.

Courts have permitted the compelled production of a wide variety of exemplars on the ground that they were nontestimonial and thus not protected by the privilege against self-incrimination, including examples of the defendant’s blood, fingerprints, footprints, DNA, handwriting, voice, urine, and breath.

Courts have also held that compelling a defendant to exhibit his body to an eyewitness in a manner that promotes identification is nontestimonial. Thus, defendants have been required to shave their beards and have their hair trimmed, reveal their teeth and tattoos, wear clothes and masks allegedly worn by the perpetrator, and re-enact the physical actions involved in a crime.

In addition to privilege challenges, defendants have also argued that the compelled production of exemplars violates the Fifth Amendment’s guarantee of due process and the Fourth Amendment’s right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Fourth Amendment challenges involving external physical features such as voice or hair regularly fail, on the ground that defendants have no reasonable expectation of privacy in those characteristics, because they are normally exposed to others in everyday life. Courts have held, however, that probable cause is required to compel the production of more physically intrusive exemplars such as blood or x-rays.

Due process challenges, although generally rejected, have occasionally succeeded when a voice exemplar or crime re-enactment was so suggestive of the defendant's guilt that it effectively undermined the defendant's presumption of innocence. It is impermissible, for example, to require a defendant to "put on a ski mask, wave a toy gun, and shout 'give me your money or I'm going to blow you up.'"

KEVIN JON HELLER

References and Further Reading

- Connor, Michael A., The Constitutional Framework Limiting Compelled Voice Exemplars: Exploration of the Current Constitutional Boundaries of Governmental Power over a Criminal Defendant, San Diego Law Review 33 (1996): 1:349–83.
- Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Fifth Amendment: The Right Against Self-Incrimination. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- United States v. Olvera*, 30 F.3d 1195 (1994).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Schmerber v. California*, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)
- See also Due Process; Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)

EXEMPTIONS FOR RELIGION CONTAINED IN REGULATORY STATUTES

Discussions of the relation of religion and secular law of the United States often center on constitutional controversies arising out of the Free Exercise and Establishment Clauses of the First Amendment. That narrow focus, however, overlooks the practical and conceptual importance of the thousands of ways in which subconstitutional sources of law such as statutes and common law rules also play a defining role in mapping out the boundaries of civil and religious authority. This entry discusses, in particular, the many federal and state statutes that explicitly provide religious institutions and religiously motivated individuals with exemptions from otherwise applicable secular law. Such statutes seek, variously, to accommodate religious conscience, recognize the relevance of religious norms, minimize intrusion into religious life, acknowledge religious diversity, adjust regulatory regimes to take religious facts into account, or simply oblige religious interest groups. Exemption statutes have been criticized on various grounds, and sometimes pose particular difficulties, although courts have generally indicated that they are not unconstitutional simply for setting out distinctive legal treatment for religion and religious persons. In any event, their existence and variety are vital features of the legal landscape of religion in the United States whose practical significance and larger normative meaning need to be appreciated and understood.

This entry does not attempt an exhaustive account of statutory exemptions. It does try to provide a framework for considering a range of examples, and to suggest how such provisions illuminate the law's effort to understand and accommodate the normative force of religious life.

Statutory religion-based exemptions can be categorized in a variety of ways. Some create specific exemptions; others create general regimes of exemption. Some accommodate minority religious beliefs; others protect religious self-governance. Some demonstrate a willingness to put aside state interests; others further state interests in the face of the fact of religious diversity.

The oldest and most common form of statutory religion-based exemptions are specific exceptions from otherwise applicable legal norms. As Michael McConnell pointed out in an important study, several of the original American colonies exempted members of certain dissenting faiths from oath requirements, military conscription, and—ironically—assessments to support an established church. Since those early years, as religious diversity in the United States has exploded, and as the degree and scope of governmental regulation have grown even more dramatically, the number of exemption statutes and the range of issues they cover, have grown proportionately. A merely illustrative sampling of such provisions might include, for example, statutes exempting persons with contrary religious beliefs from immunization requirements, exemptions from certain drug laws and certain forms of alcohol regulation, exemption from autopsy requirements, qualified exemptions for Christian Scientists to employ spiritual healers rather than doctors under certain circumstances, qualified exemption of persons whose religions forbid acquiring insurance from the rule requiring automobile owners to obtain liability insurance, exemptions for persons whose religion forbids the taking of photographs from the requirement that they have a photograph on their driver's license, a federal statute allowing military personnel in uniform to wear items of religious apparel under certain conditions, qualified exemptions from certain mandatory autopsy requirements, exemptions of religiously motivated students from certain parts of an otherwise required public school curriculum, exemptions of certain religious believers (such as the Amish) from certain otherwise mandatory provisions of the building codes, and qualified exemptions of certain religious employers from otherwise applicable requirements that their prescription benefit plans cover contraceptives.

All the statutes just listed detail accommodations for religion in particular contexts. A very different category of more recent statutes dating from the 1990s, such as the federal Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and similar legislation in at least eleven states, set out instead a general, abstract, standard for drawing the boundaries between secular and religious authority across the whole legal domain. These statutes have a distinct quasiconstitutional coloration, and their history is intertwined with the modern development of the constitutional law of religion.

For many years, the courts have grappled with the question of whether the constitutional protection of free exercise includes any sort of fundamental right to be exempt from laws that directly conflict with religious norms. In Reynolds v. United States, its 1879 decision upholding laws against polygamy, the Supreme Court answered “no.” Beginning in 1963, however, with Sherbert v. Verner, the Supreme Court held in a line of cases that the Free Exercise Clause guaranteed religious believers a prima facie right to be exempt from laws that directly conflicted with the demands of their faith unless the government could demonstrate that its law was the least restrictive means to further a compelling state interest. Then, in 1990, in Employment Division v. Smith, the Court all but overruled this line of cases. It held, subject to some important qualifications, that the Free Exercise Clause could not be used to challenge laws that were otherwise “neutral” and “generally applicable.” RFRA and its state counterparts sought, in effect, to reinstate the Sherbert test as a statutory rather than constitutional entitlement. In City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), the Supreme Court struck down, as beyond the Congress’s powers under section five of the Fourteenth Amendment, the federal RFRA’s application to state laws. But the statute remains applicable to federal laws, and the State RFRA’s remain in force as well.

Like most analytic divides, the distinction between specific and general exemption statutes is often a matter of degree. Thus, for example, some exemption statutes are so detailed as to actually name the religions to which they apply, although most do not. Meanwhile, in the wake of Flores, Congress enacted the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), which mandated a compelling interest test in two specified albeit still broad categories of state laws, subject to a set of jurisdictional predicates that had been absent in the original RFRA. RLUIPA, which might be described as situated somewhere between the “specific” and “general” paradigms of exemption statutes, survived at least one Establishment Clause challenge in Cutter v. Wilkinson (2005).

The statutes discussed so far—whether at the specific or general end of the spectrum—still have in common the goal of accommodating the demands of religious norms that happen to come into conflict with the demands of certain secular laws. Such exemptions, by their terms, only apply to persons, usually in minority faith traditions, for whom such a conflict exists. A whole other category of exemption statutes has a quite different goal: to minimize, more broadly, the intrusion of the state into the self-government of religious communities. These institutional autonomy statutes stand out from other exemption statutes in at least two respects. To begin with, they generally protect churches and other religious institutions rather than individuals. More important, they generally apply with equal force to all religious communities, and do not depend on the existence of a particular conflict between secular law and religious belief. Examples of such institutional autonomy provisions include: exemptions of certain religious organizations from the reach of certain civil rights laws, whether or not the discrimination at issue is religiously motivated; exemption of churches from certain of the reporting and oversight provisions in the Internal Revenue Code and certain state statutes; and special provisions for churches in state charitable corporation laws.

Again, the distinction outlined here often blurs at the edges. For example, the statutory clergy–penitent privilege as enacted in the various states applies across the board, both to faith traditions that include something like a “seal of confession” and to those that do not. In a sense, then, the imperative to protect the distinctive religious practice of certain faiths has expanded, by analogy, to establish a principle protecting against undue intrusion into the religious communications of all faiths. Nevertheless, the conscientious element has not disappeared entirely: in some states, the question of whether the “penitent” can waive the privilege turns on whether revealing the confidence would violate the tenets of the clergyman’s faith.

A final, more subtle, way of categorizing exemption statutes goes to the relation between the exemption and the underlying legal norm to which the exemption applies. In many cases, exemptions clearly reflect a willingness to compromise or limit the reach of an underlying legal norm, and to do so in favor of religious rights. In other cases, though, the relation between the exemption and the underlying norm is more complicated. For example, many state marriage statutes, while ordinarily requiring marriages to be solemnized by a single, licensed celebrant, make an exception for marriages conducted in faith traditions such as the Society of Friends (Quakers) in whose marriage rituals there is no such officiant. Such provisions, however, do not really compromise the state's policy that marriages be entered into with some formality and deliberation, but instead effectuate that policy in the face of the diverse ways in which religious communities organize their formal and deliberative rituals.

The most interesting cases, of course, are those in which it is not entirely apparent how an exemption relates conceptually to the underlying legal norm. For example, the federal Humane Slaughter Act purports on its face to spell out two equivalent and equally acceptable modes of animal slaughter, either by rendering the animal unconscious before killing it, or "by slaughtering in accordance with the ritual requirements of the Jewish faith or any other religious faith that prescribes a method of slaughter whereby the animal suffers loss of consciousness by anemia of the brain" This textual equivalence reflects the fact that Jewish and similar methods of slaughter were themselves designed to be humane. A puzzle remains, however, why, if the two methods are truly equivalent, permission for the second would be limited to the "ritual" context.

The number, breadth, and variety of religious exemptions contained in federal and state statutes suggests some important conclusions about the place of religion in the American legal imagination. Over the years, some commentators have suggested that the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment bar any or at least most classifications based on religion. Indeed, there is a strain of discomfort with apparent religious discrimination that goes back to colonial times and continues in the Supreme Court's emphasis on the principle of "neutrality" in both its Free Exercise and Establishment Clause cases. In a small number of cases, lower courts have held exemption statutes unconstitutional when they are drafted so as to protect only certain named religions or only "recognized religions." More famously, the Supreme Court, in its conscientious exemption decisions in the 1960s, stretched the language of the law to encompass persons whose beliefs played a role in their lives functionally equivalent to that of religion, and suggested that a more literal reading would pose problems under the Establishment Clause. Nevertheless, beyond these few counter-instances, statutory religion-based exemptions have generally been upheld, and the Supreme Court has made clear, in cases such as Corporation of the Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos (1987) and Cutter v. Wilkinson, and even in its decision in Employment Division v. Smith, that legislatures are entitled to go beyond formal equality and neutrality to take into account the distinctive normative dilemmas facing adherents of certain faiths and the unique character of religion and religious communities more generally.

Beyond the concern for equality and neutrality, however, lies a deeper jurisprudential puzzle. In Reynolds v. United States, the Court held not only that the Free Exercise Clause did not protect religious polygamists from the enforcement of antibigamy statutes, but that recognizing such a right would "in effect . . . permit every citizen to become a law unto himself." Some 110 years later, in Smith, the Court quoted this language approvingly and went on to state that recognizing a right to religion-based exemptions in the Free Exercise Clause would create a "constitutional anomaly." These statements suggest that a general doctrine of constitutionally required religion-based exemptions, particularly those that depend on the religious beliefs of specific claimants, would not only be wrong in the Court's view, but would violate the rule of law itself. The puzzle, of course, is why exemptions violate the rule of law if required by courts as a constitutional right, but not if enacted by legislatures as a statutory entitlement. The tension here might reflect problems with the Court's Free Exercise doctrine. It might also, however, suggest a particular legislative capacity, not only to respect religious conscience but to recognize, in an almost political sense, the diversity and juridical dignity of nonstate normative perspectives.

To underscore this point, consider one last example: the New Jersey Declaration of Death Act requires that individuals be declared dead if they have "sustained irreversible cessation of all functions of the entire brain," but makes an exception for persons whose religious beliefs would require the more traditional cardiorespiratory definition of death. The question arises whose rights this provision is protecting. In a sense, it cannot be the individual in question, since the state would otherwise consider him or her dead. Nor is it even the person's next of kin, since it is his or her religious views and not theirs that are dispositive. The answer might be that the state is deferring, not so much to the rights of an individual, but to the legitimacy of a normative system alongside its own.

PERRY DANE

References and Further Reading

Dane, Perry, 'Omalous' Autonomy, Brigham Young University Law Review 2004 (2004): 5:1715.

- Kurland, Philip B. Religion and the Law: Of Church and State and the Supreme Court. Chicago: Aldine, 1962.
- Lupu, Ira C., Reconstructing the Establishment Clause: The Case Against Discretionary Accommodation of Religion, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 140 (1991): 555, 580–609.
- McConnell, Michael W., The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, Harvard Law Review 103 (1990): 1409–1517.
- Newsom, Michael deHaven, Some Kind of Religious Freedom: National Prohibition and the Volstead Act's Exemption for the Religious Use of Wine, Brooklyn Law Review 70 (2005): 739.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
- Corporation of the Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. Amos*, 483 U.S. 327, 340 (1987)
- Cutter v. Wilkinson*, 125 S.Ct. 2113 (2005)
- Employment Division, Dept. of Human Resources v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Humane Slaughter Act, 7 U.S.C. 1901–1906
- New Jersey Declaration of Death Act, N.J. Stat. sec. 26:6A-5 (2006)
- Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 42 U.S.C. 2000bb to 2000bb-4
- Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42 U.S.C. 2000cc to 2000cc-5
- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145, 167 (1879)
- Sherbert v. Verner*, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)

See also Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Religious Freedom in the Military; Religious Freedom Restoration Act; Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000

EXPATRIATION

Expatriation is the voluntary relinquishment of nationality and allegiance. In this context, nationality is more or less synonymous with citizenship, and allegiance means the multifaceted bond joining citizen and state. Not surprisingly for a country born in rebellion, the United States has always recognized a right of allegiance transfer on the part of those becoming Americans. However, it was not until after passage of the Fourteenth Amendment that Congress first acknowledged the right of Americans to forsake U.S. citizenship.

Thereafter, the critical question became whether the government might unilaterally strip nationality, as a punishment or otherwise. Beginning with the act of March 3, 1865, Congress asserted authority to treat certain actions (desertion and draft evasion) as evidence of an American's intent to abandon U.S. allegiance. In the Expatriation Act of 1907, Congress made loss of American nationality the automatic consequence of either naturalization elsewhere or a pledge of foreign allegiance. In the same statute, Congress declared that whenever a naturalized American returned to his or her homeland and resided there for two years it proved an intent to abandon U.S. nationality, and that any American woman forfeited her nationality by marrying a foreigner. Shortly thereafter, a native Californian who had married a British subject permanently residing in California was refused registration as a California voter on the grounds that she was no longer a U.S. citizen. Her appeal of that judgment failed when the U.S. Supreme Court in Mackenzie v. Hare (1915) accepted that Congress could make marriage to a foreigner an irrefutable presumption of the bride's expatriating intent. Congress repealed the provision for denationalization by marriage in 1922, but in the Nationality Act of 1940, added to the list of acts evidencing expatriation voting in a foreign election, service in the armed forces or government of a foreign power, and treason against the United States. Then, in the Expatriation Act of 1954, Congress added attempting by force to overthrow the government of the United States, advocating such an attempt, and participating in a seditious conspiracy. Four years later, in Perez v. Brownell (1958), the Supreme Court upheld the denationalization of a native Texan who had admitted sojourning in Mexico to avoid military service, and, while there, voting in political elections. That he denied any intention of renouncing his American nationality was immaterial. By the mid-twentieth century, therefore, Congress was confident that the Constitution allowed it to unilaterally denationalize, and the Supreme Court agreed.

But the Court soon changed its mind, declaring in Trop v. Dulles (1958) that, even if Congress had the power to denationalize, it could not do so as a sanction for wartime desertion without violating the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments. A decade later, in Afroyim v. Rusk (1967), the Court held unconstitutional the government's refusal to renew a naturalized American's U.S. passport because he had voted in an Israeli election. Overruling Perez, the Court struck down the relevant section of the Nationality Act on the grounds that for all those "born or naturalized in the United States," nationality is conferred by the Constitution itself and cannot be revoked by ordinary legislation. In 1980, the Court ruled in Vance v. Terrazas (1980) that, to establish expatriation, the government had to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that an American specifically intended to forsake U.S. nationality. Under the Constitution today, therefore, expatriation is the only lawful form of denationalization, and an American's intention in this regard cannot be established simply by the drawing by Congress of an inference from an act, however incompatible Congress might find that act with continued allegiance.

Only those born in the United States and those, who having first immigrated to the United States have completed the process of naturalization, are citizens in the constitutional sense of Afroyim and Terranzas. Children born abroad to American citizens, for example, enjoy American nationality not as a constitutional right but as the consequence of an act of Congress. Whether such "statutory" Americans are also constitutionally protected from involuntary denationalization remains an open question.

JOHN PAUL JONES

References and Further Reading

- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Theories of Loss of Citizenship, University of Michigan Law Review 84 (1986): 1471.
 Boudin, Leonard B., Involuntary Loss of American Nationality, Harvard Law Review 73 (1960): 1510.
 Gordon, Charles, The Citizen and the State: Power of Congress to Expatriate American Citizens, Georgetown Law Journal 53 (1965): 315.
 Jones, J.P., Limiting Congressional Denationalization after Afroyim, University of San Diego Law Review 17 (1979): 121.
 Roche, John. P., The Loss of American Citizenship—The Development of Statutory Expatriation, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 99 (1950): 25.
 U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel. Survey of the Law of Expatriation (June 12, 2002). <http://www.usdoj.gov/olc/expatriation.htm>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Afroyim v. Rusk*, 387 U.S. 253 (1967)
Mackenzie v. Hare, 239 U.S. 299 (1915)
Perez v. Brownell, 356 U.S. 44 (1958)
Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 66 (1958)
Vance v. Terranzas, 444 U.S. 252 (1980)

See also Citizenship

EXTRADITION

Extradition is the process through which an individual held by one country is transferred to another country to face criminal prosecution or serve a criminal sentence. In the United States, extradition is possible only pursuant to a valid extradition treaty; in the absence of such a treaty, the government has neither the right to demand extradition of an individual from a country nor the right or obligation to extradite an individual to that country. The United States has valid extradition treaties with most countries; notable exceptions include Afghanistan, Russia, Saudi Arabia, and China.

There are two substantive requirements for extradition. First, the offense for which extradition is requested must be an extraditable offense under the relevant treaty. Most extradition treaties include an exhaustive list of extraditable offenses. Others provide that all offenses of a certain severity—those that qualify as felonies, for example—are extraditable.

Second, the offense for which extradition is sought must be criminal under the laws of both the United States and the other country. This "dual criminality" requirement is designed to ensure that extradition is granted only for offenses that are considered serious by both countries.

Even if these requirements are met, there are a number of exceptions to extradition. The most controversial is what is known as the "political offense" exception, which prohibits the United States and its extradition partners from extraditing individuals whose offenses were either directed specifically at the government, such as treason and espionage, or involved a common crime like murder that was "so connected with a political act that the entire offense is regarded as political." Courts have used the political offense exception, for example, to refuse to extradite members of the Irish Republican Army (IRA) to the United Kingdom.

The nature of the applicable punishment can also serve as a ground for denying extradition. A number of treaties preclude extradition for offenses for which the requesting country can impose the death penalty. Such a provision permitted France to refuse to extradite Ira Einhorn, the "Unicorn Killer," to the United States until U.S. authorities promised not to execute him if convicted. (He was finally extradited to the United States in July 2001 to face trial for a 1977 murder.)

Individuals in the United States for whom extradition is sought are entitled to a hearing before a neutral magistrate. The magistrate's only responsibility, however, is to determine whether the charged offense is extraditable under the relevant treaty and, if it is, whether there is probable cause to believe the individual committed the offense. The extradition hearing is not a full trial; the normal rules of evidence do not apply, and the individual does not have an absolute right to confront the witnesses against him, call his own witnesses, or even introduce evidence that contradicts the prosecution's evidence. Moreover, the magistrate cannot take into account the treatment that the individual will receive in the requesting country.

If the magistrate determines that the individual is extraditable, the secretary of state retains the authority to deny extradition, and can deny extradition on humanitarian grounds. If the magistrate determines that the individual is not extraditable, however, the secretary cannot reverse the magistrate's decision.

KEVIN JON HELLER

References and Further Reading

- Bassiouni, M. Cherif. International Extradition: United States Law and Practice. New York: Oceana Publications, 2002.
- Bush, Jonathan A., How Did We Get Here? Foreign Abduction After Alvarez-Machain, Stanford Law Review 45 (1993): 3:939–83.

EXTREMIST GROUPS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

The people of this nation have a great deal to be proud of and to celebrate. At holiday celebrations, the media is ready with hyperbolic words that praise this nation. And why not? The spectacular rise from a barely occupied wilderness to the most powerful nation on Earth in a remarkably short period of time is amazing and worthy of praise.

This was to be a nation built on the labor of many races and a variety of religions; a county that can build anything and everything; who believed in capitalism and not in kings; a nation that votes and accepts change through elections. All of these qualities and more are part of the American national heritage. Less known and not celebrated is this fact: since the formation of colonies, this nation has demonstrated a streak of intolerance, xenophobia, and violence that continues to this time. It can be argued that at every stage of American development, one finds examples of extremist groups in operation.

An example can be seen in religious groups or splinter groups who demonstrate fanaticism. During the 176 years of colonial status, there were instances of violence and extreme measures taken in most colonies against Catholics, Jews, Quakers, and within competing Protestant sects. Before 1692, there were forty-four witchcraft trials and during 1692, there were three hangings in Massachusetts alone. As the fanaticism died down, some 150 prisoners accused of witchcraft were released by the end of the year. One difference between European witchcraft and colonial practices was that in Europe, those found guilty of alleged heresy were burned at the stake, while colonials found guilty of being witches or possessed of the devil, were hung.

Examples of religious intolerance during the colonial period included the banishment of Roger Williams because he rejected the right of civil authorities to legislate in matters of conscience. He and his followers had to flee the Massachusetts Colony or risk persecution. From the Salem witch trials through Mormon battles to exist in a hostile religious climate, one finds terror and violence used against various religious groups.

Beyond extremist groups that took violent action against small, generally vulnerable religious persons and groups, there were extremist groups who persecuted people because of their race. The history of the Ku Klux Klan after the Civil War demonstrates the use of murder, lynching, torture, and other extreme measures to prevent black people from exercising their newly found freedoms.

Even the passage into constitutional law of three amendments initially aimed at empowering blacks could not stop the overwhelming power of extremist groups in the South from having their way. The Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution (as well as additional specific laws) did not stop extremist groups from using terror and acts of violence against blacks, Asians, and Native Americans.

Another manifestation of extremists was the vigilante movement that appeared mainly in the last decades of the nineteenth century and into the early twentieth century. They claimed that the regular justice system was not working to their liking (too slow, too sympathetic to defendants). This led various extremist groups of vigilantes to hold their own "courts" and mete out punishments (including death) to those caught in their net.

In all of these instances of extremist acts, there is a continuing question that seems to be insoluble: what should a nation, through its representatives, its executive, and its system of law do when confronted by one or more organizations that reject the sovereignty of the nation over them? The challenge thrown up by extremists groups is to assert that the national government had failed to adequately act to protect its citizens. Note that this was before September 11, 2001. The obverse can also be seen in hate groups that refuse to admit that the government has any right to control their lives, tax them, or educate them. Frequently the message was bundled with one of racial hatred and religious violence. It was and still is a classic case of safety versus freedom. How much freedom are we (as a nation) willing to give up for safety?

This nation, as is true of many others in the early twenty-first century, has to cope with a new enemy: terrorists. These terrorists come from extremist groups that differ from the long line of earlier extremists in that they seek to win their goals through fear—paralyzing fear of violence emanating from religious, political, and cultural extremists willing to destroy themselves in order to destroy the lives of masses of people and public institutions. They are religious, political, and cultural fanatics beyond anything this and other nations have seen in modern times. They pose a continuing threat to the relatively open boundaries of Western democracies, and they are able to hide behind the existence of their fellow countrymen, who while they may have no involvement in these extremist plans with deadly aims, carry the color of skin and difference in religion as makers of a potential enemy. To date, there have been few instances of actively branding the innocent as an answer to how to identify the truly radical and dangerous. The question is how long will this be the case?

Because so much has changed since September 11, 2001, the need to confront how the nation and its leadership should deal with extremists is crucial.

The existence of extremist groups currently demands that our nation continually evaluate how we should react to these killers and terrorists. Are these murderers entitled to enter the American justice system? Should they be given the protection of the rights under First Amendment and other amendments? All of these issues present the ultimate issue of how we preserve our freedoms at the same time as we effectively protect our citizens and the safety of our national infrastructure.

One clue as to how to deal with extremists is to study the history of extremists in this country. In that history we note that in the twentieth century, extremists organized around leaders who preached hatred of minorities and encouraged the formation of militia-type members. They claimed that their enemy (among others) was the federal government, considered to be under “Zionist control.” One response of these hate groups included moving to relatively open and empty territory, such as in Montana and Utah, where they could practice their beliefs and claim their right to challenge the right of any government over them. The 1980s and 1990s were times of concern in law enforcement circles that extremist groups also targeted violence against law officers and judges.

Three major incidents occurred that explain changes in extremist groups compared to before 9/11/01: the Ruby Ridge shootout, the Waco standoff, and the Oklahoma City bombing of a federal building in 1995; 168 people were killed in the Oklahoma bombing.

September 11 overwhelmed all instances of domestic violence until that time except the earlier bombing of the Twin Towers in 1993, which introduced foreign terrorists. Three thousand people were killed as a result of the Twin Towers attack in Manhattan. This crime was committed by Muslim extremist groups. This terrible event created a demarcation point in what has turned out to be a war against extremist groups by the government. Military action in Afghanistan and Iraq followed. What was announced as a war to overthrow the dictatorship became a terrorist plan of destruction against the U.S. presence in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Compare 9/11/01 to what happened in Ruby Ridge, Utah. In brief, a warrant had been issued to be served by the U.S. Marshals Service upon a resident in this area. Armed with what have been called illegal “shoot-to-kill” orders, a firefight took place as the occupants attempted to resist the service of the federal warrant, leaving two dead. Although the ties of those involved to radical causes and groups was less than clearly established, the killings became the rallying cry for extremists who, for religious, political, or racial hate reasons used what happened as proof that the federal government was out to destroy their extremist group.

Three years after Ruby Ridge, in 1995, two American citizens, Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols, plotted the destruction of the Alfred R. Murrah federal building as revenge for the events of Waco; the plot climaxed in an act of terror on the second anniversary of Waco. Both McVeigh and Nichols were followers of extremist groups. Until 9/11/01, the McVeigh and Nichols action was the deadliest attack on American soil. McVeigh believed that his act of destruction of lives and property would be the opening call for all rightwing extremist organizations to rise up in revolution against the national government.

Preceding McVeigh were other “lone-wolf” actors including William Krar, a white supremacist who was arrested having in his possession enough sodium cyanide to kill 6,000 people. Another was Eric Rudolph, a domestic terrorist who killed people in an abortion clinic and at the 1996 summer Olympics.

One of the results of the Oklahoma bombing was actually a decline in domestic terrorists, “lone wolves,” or extremist organizations. But those who study these movements warned what while the number of those involved in rightwing (as well as leftwing extremist groups) have diminished, the hard-core believers are still there. They point to neo-Nazis, white supremacists, and Christian identity groups that are still functioning. They advise that while the number of militia groups has dropped from 900 (prior to Oklahoma bombing) to 150, homegrown haters and hate groups are still there—and dangerous.

Since 9/11/01, we are a different nation. To gain an appreciation of this assertion, consider the following.

The presence of extremists in groups and in “lone-wolf” attacks has been a part of American culture since colonial days. There has been an apparent relationship between the openness of American society and the extremes of totalitarian extremism. The use of violence by extremists is a method of taking control into one’s own hands, and has been directed to the production of fear: Where will they strike next?

The nineteenth and twentieth centuries contained many forms of extremism. Until 9/11/01, these forms of extremism have come from white, Protestant individuals and groups and were intended to implant fear into minority groups—or as a control device to keep blacks and other racial or religious minorities from asserting their constitutional rights.

The national government has from time to time used extremist tactics to attack those who were considered dangerous. Examples are the destruction of the Industrial Workers of the World (Wobblies); the use of troops to break strikes; and the first red scare (1918–1920) and the second (1946–1957) that played on the paranoia regarding communists or leftists as dangerous to the existence of the country.

Extremism is found in the left as well as the right in the political spectrum. John Brown fits into the category of leading extremists. Certain groups of environmentalists and animal rights groups can be seen as current extremists of the left.

The planning to destroy large numbers of people and a country’s economy takes advantage of the openness of borders as well as public transportation. Most of the planning can take place thousands of miles away from the targets.

The ability to kill people and harm a nation’s infrastructure with little chance to catch or to stop the terrorist act is a reality because members of the extremist group frequently intend to kill themselves as a sacrifice to the “cause.”

Until 9/11/01, most people in the United States neither understood nor cared about the Muslim religion. Certain Muslim extremists hate Western nations and particularly the United States, believing that this nation has and will continue to corrupt and weaken their culture. They also believe that the aim of the United States and their allies is to conquer Muslim nations for their oil.

Not one nation openly supports the Muslim fanatics; instead, bands of these fighters “float” from one nation to another. They seem to have an endless number of men, women, and children ready to sacrifice their lives for their religious cause. This is a technique that the United States and its allies have not seen prior to 9/11/01.

Brutalities such as beheading are used against anyone they consider an enemy, and at times for no valid reason but to promote fear in countries where such behavior is neither understood nor acceptable. Some countries have already bent to the will of fanatic groups to avoid the relentless war being waged, thus rejecting American leadership in the war against fanatics.

In the words of Benjamin Franklin, “They that give up essential liberty in order to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety.” This statement may no longer be entirely valid. Certainly it is subject to challenge: a little “temporary safety” in the sense Franklin made this statement is no longer possible in today’s world. Oceans, mountain ranges, densely populated cities and industrial areas, as well as buildings of every kind have proven to be no barrier to terrorists.

There has been (thus far) an absence of suicides in domestic extremist groups but there seems to be no feasible way of providing the safety that Franklin addressed, especially if airlines, ships, trains, shopping malls, among many other possibilities, may become effective targets for suicidal terrorists. The slide down the slippery slope of restricting liberties seems to afford at least the appearance of “doing something” to respond effectively to the threat posed by these extremists.

The red scares that followed World Wars I and II yielded legislation aimed at ensuring the loyalty of its citizens. Action was taken against those whose beliefs were not orthodox. Aliens were shipped out of the country. Criminal legal procedures were taken against alleged subversives.

With the collapse of Soviet Russia, the cold war seemed to yield a period of peaceful times; 9/11/01 shattered that peace. Terrorists were actually trained in this country to fly large aircraft, and turned that skill into opportunities for death and destruction.

Looking back at the red scare years, there was not a single instance of any communist having a cache of arms, military training, bombing, or attempt to use suicide terrorists on targets. What they were most guilty of was their beliefs. On the other hand, such rightwing groups as the National Alliance, Aryan Nations, and Creativity Movement were frequently trained in armed conduct. They gathered weapons with the goal of creating some sort of revolution. They carried out armed actions; between 1995 and 2005, fifteen law enforcement officers were killed by these antigovernment fanatic groups. Still, however, there was no realistic chance that they would even successfully mount an attempt to kill masses of people or disrupt the nation. When threats became possible, they came from outside the nation.

The response of the administration that came in the wake of the successful killing of some 3,000 people as well as destroying the Twin Towers, was to rush through Congress with little or no dissent, a law commonly called the USA Patriotic Act. The basic idea was to give law enforcement agencies powerful tools with which to respond to the terrorist act of 9/11/01, and to stop further acts of violence against this nation.

As the act rushed through Congress, there was little thought given to the civil rights issues involved, although there was a section of the law that expressed the sense that all Americans, including Arab Americans, must be protected.

The heart of the act was to direct and authorize actions against those who might attempt attacks on Americans and the American infrastructure. To a significant extent, the Patriot Act set aside restrictions as to what the federal government could do that the government could not do since 1976. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) has used bugging devices, letter opening, invasion of offices and homes, infiltration of domestic organizations, and many other illegal or extralegal acts. Hoover died in 1972 and there followed a wide-ranging congressional committee whose work revealed abuse of power by Hoover and his FBI. These restrictions, coming out of a congressional committee's work, allowed the government to once again use these powers and techniques. Additionally, this means that the FBI can monitor groups and public meetings, and the Internet. The FBI could even send undercover agents to suspected houses of worship.

As of this writing, the effectiveness of those operating under the umbrella of the Patriot Act remains to be seen. That the act (most of it permanent as of early 2006) raises important issues of infringement of civil rights seems evident. Secret trials, hidden detainees, torture, and profiling are intended to break the will of those who seek to sway history through terror. In the case of aliens alleged to be terrorists, it appears that no concern for their civil rights limits our government. Intrusions and detentions are the price these people pay as the nation continually seeks out its enemies. Only time will answer the question of whether the nation has gone too far to ensure its safety against extremists. Perhaps the times have been so catastrophic in scope that the Patriot Act as well as other measures will justify the curtailment of civil rights and liberties. The march of history will eventually answer.

ARTHUR J. SABIN

EYEWITNESS IDENTIFICATION

Police investigation often entails interviewing those who were eyewitnesses to an offense, attaining a description of the culprit, and then later presenting a suspect or suspects to the eyewitness in a lineup or other identification procedure. Lineups, also known as identification parades in Britain, involve a corporeal identification procedure where persons appear before the witness. In a lineup, the witness reviews those who have been assembled and determines whether the culprit is among them. In a photo spread, a noncorporeal identification procedure, an array of photos is placed before the witness. In a show-up identification procedure, which may be corporeal or noncorporeal, the witness is presented with a single individual rather than several, and thus has no others to select from or compare. During a lineup or show-up, persons may be asked to move about or speak so that the eyewitness may use memory of action or speech as well as appearance to make an identification.

Many social scientists and judges believe that erroneous identification testimony is one of the leading causes of wrongful convictions. All eyewitness identification procedures are tests of recognition memory, seeking a match between the memory of the perpetrator and the person presented. Eyewitness identification actually engages three tasks: perception of the original perpetrator, storage in memory, and retrieval from memory. Psychologists studying the fallibility of each task have made suggestions to improve the reliability of eyewitness identification. Error may arise when the witness selects an individual who is the best match, even if that match is not perfect. A sequential lineup presenting one person at a time and attaining a yes or no decision for each minimizes the likelihood of such comparative or relative judgments, and is recommended by the American Psychology/Law Society (AP/LS). Informing the eyewitness that the perpetrator may not be present further reduces comparative judgment. As police conducting the identification procedure may communicate their own view that they have apprehended the right person and pressure the witness, the AP/LS also recommends a double-blind procedure where those administering the procedure are not aware which person is the suspect.

Since 1967, the Supreme Court has overseen procedures in an effort to reduce unreliability and the likelihood of convicting the innocent. Motions to suppress or exclude possibly mistaken eyewitness identification testimony rely on varying constitutional arguments. If an illegal detention or arrest violating the defendant's Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable seizure preceded the identification procedure, testimony regarding the out-of-court procedure will be excluded as a fruit of the poisonous tree, and possibly also the in-court identification (United States v. Crews [1980]). Lineup participants who are ordered to repeat the words used by the culprit during the crime are not denied their Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination as this is not a testimonial communication (United States v. Wade [1967]). However, the Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel does attach when a defendant appears in a lineup after the criminal prosecution has begun, and denial of counsel will require exclusion of some identification testimony (Wade). When suggestive procedures of any type create a substantial likelihood of misidentification, due process will require exclusion of all identification testimony from the witness (Manson v. Brathwaite [1977]).

MARGERY M. KOOSSED

References and Further Reading

- Borchard, E.M. Convicting the Innocent: Sixty-Five Actual Errors of Criminal Justice. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1932.
- Gross, Samuel H., Loss of Innocence: Eyewitness Identification and Proof of Guilt, Journal of Legal Studies 16 (1987): 395–493.
- Judges, Donald P., Two Cheers for the Department of Justice's Eyewitness Evidence: A Guide for Law Enforcement, Arkansas Law Review 53 (2000): 231–297.
- Koosed, Margery M., The Proposed Innocence Protection Act Won't—Unless It Also Curbs Mistaken Eyewitness Identifications, Ohio State Law Journal 63 (2002): 263–314.
- Rattner, Arye, Convicted but Innocent: Wrongful Convictions and the Criminal Justice System, Law and Human Behavior 12 (1988): 283–93.
- U.S. Department of Justice. Eyewitness Evidence: A Guide for Law Enforcement (1999). <http://www.ncjrs.org/txtfiles1/nij/178240.txt>.
- Wells, Gary L., Mark Small, Steven Penrod, Roy S. Mullan, Solomon M. Fulero, and C.A.E. Brimacombe, Eyewitness Identification Procedures: Recommendations for Lineups and Photospreads, Law and Human Behavior 22 (1998): 603–647.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Manson v. Brathwaite*, 430 U.S. 98 (1977)
United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. 463 (1980)
United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)

See also Due Process; Lineups; Right to Counsel

F

FAIR CREDIT REPORTING ACT, 84 STAT. 1127 (1970)

The collection, compilation, and dissemination of consumer credit information in reports (“consumer reports”) is not a recent development. The first credit reporting agency (CRA), Retail Credit Company, began compiling consumer reports as early as 1899. Today, the consumer credit reporting industry is dominated by three major companies, Experian, Equifax (the descendant of Retail Credit Company), and Trans Union. Together, these three CRAs hold records on more than 200 million consumers and provide crucial economic information to lenders, retailers, and employers in millions of transactions every day. Indeed, it is difficult, if not impossible, to imagine our economy without them or the thousands of others.

Despite the obvious importance and value of CRAs, they also have the potential to affect the privacy and livelihood of millions of Americans. Over time, poor collection and dissemination practices by CRAs resulted in real dangers to individual privacy. By the 1960s, consumer reports not only tracked credit history but many also included personal information, including sexual orientation, drinking habits, and even cleanliness. Compounding these problems were the lax disclosure practices many CRAs used—making consumer reports available to almost anyone willing to pay a fee. In addition, many of these consumer reports were highly inaccurate—containing obsolete, incomplete, or even fraudulent data. Finally, CRAs policies made it virtually impossible for consumer to see or correct their own consumer reports.

Out of this mess Congress passed the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA) of 1970. Congress’ intent in passing FCRA was to address the most important problems associated with CRAs’ past practices. In particular, FCRA addressed the two major areas of abuse: (1) dissemination of consumer reports to unauthorized parties and (2) creation of inaccurate, false, incomplete, or obsolete consumer reports. In addressing these problems, FCRA created a complex regulatory framework that imposes obligations on CRAs and provides rights and remedies to consumers. This important legislation, therefore, represents the first attempt by Congress to protect individual privacy from the intrusive and, at times, abusive practices of private industry.

FCRA created a very broad definition of CRA, encompassing any entity that regularly prepares and disseminates consumer reports. As a result, bill collection agencies, cable companies, banks, and even universities have been held to be CRAs. Congress also insisted on a broad definition of consumer report—defining it to include any report that “touches” on an individual’s creditworthiness, credit standing, credit capacity, character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or modes of living.

Under FCRA, CRAs are required to enact “reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy” in consumer report information. Among the steps CRAs must take are: (1) removing inaccurate or obsolete data on notice or discovery; (2) informing consumers of adverse actions taken as a result of a consumer report; (3) allowing consumers to challenge the accuracy, currency, or completeness of information contained in consumer reports; and (4) removing or changing challenged data that cannot be confirmed within a reasonable period of time. Finally, CRAs are prohibited from disclosing consumer reports for anything other than a “permissible purpose.” Permissible purposes include, among others, requests for reports to employers (with consent), as part of an application for credit, or to allow financial institutions to review the creditworthiness of current customers.

CRAs are also required to make consumer reports available to consumers for review and correction. Prior to 2003, the provision of reports was only required in two circumstances: (1) on request and for a fee or (2) when an adverse action has been taken based on the report. In 2003, Congress amended FCRA with passage of the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act (FACTA). Among the many changes made to FCRA, this latest amendment now requires all the three major CRAs to provide a copy of a consumer’s report, without fee, once a year on request.

Unlike many privacy and consumer protection laws, FCRA authorizes private lawsuits. Injured consumers may sue for economic and punitive damages. Criminal prosecutions may be brought against both CRAs and those who fraudulently obtain consumer reports. These robust remedial provisions have led many individuals to sue CRAs and users of consumer reports for damages caused by inaccurate information and unauthorized disclosures. In addition, the Federal Trade Commission has been active in enforcing FCRA’s provisions—mostly recently obtaining a $2.5 million settlement from the major CRAs based on their sale of consumer reports to advertisers and marketers (Trans Union v. FTC [2001]).

In the decades since its passage, FCRA has required various amendments to capture the current practices and capabilities of CRAs. The most fundamental change in consumer reports has been the creation of “credit scores.” Credit scores (using proprietary formulas created by CRAs) have become more important for assessing the creditworthiness of consumers than the consumer reports on which they are based. Yet FCRA, in its original formulation, does not govern credit scores. In 2003, Congress amended FCRA to require disclosure of credit scores, including explanations of their use, for a fee. As consumer reports become increasingly important in a credit-rich and electronic market, we may assume that FCRA will be amended again. Indeed, FCRA has recently been amended by the USA Patriot Act to give law enforcement greater access to credit and financial information.

DOUGLAS J. SYLVESTER

References and Further Reading

- Cate, Fred H., et al. Financial Privacy, Consumer Prosperity, and the Public Good. Washington D.C.: Brookings Institution Press, 2003.
 FTC Commentary on FCRA, 16 C.F.R. Part 600.
 Maurer, Virginia G., Common Law Defamation and the Fair Credit Reporting Act. Georgetown Law Journal 72 (1983): 95–134.
 Smith, H. J. Managing Privacy: Information Technology and Corporate America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
 Westin, Alan F. Privacy and Freedom. New York: Atheneum, 1967.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Fair and Accurate Credit Transaction Act of Dec. 4, 2003, 111 Stat. 1952
 Fair Credit Reporting Act of Oct. 26, 1970, c. 41, 84 Stat. 1127
Trans Union v. FTC, 245 F.3d 809 (D.C. Cir. 2001), cert. denied, 536 U.S. 915 (2002)
 Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism (“USA PATRIOT Act”), Act of Oct. 26, 2001, 115 Stat. 272

See also Congressional Protection of Privacy; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Privacy; Terrorism and Civil Liberties

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT AND RELIGION

Religious institutions usually are subject to laws of general applicability. A particularly contentious situation involves the interplay between one such generally applicable law, the federal Fair Labor Standards Act, providing minimum wage and overtime premium pay to employees, and religiously affiliated institutions operating as employers of largely secular enterprises. The government and/or the employees contend that the employees are entitled to the FLSA rights and protections. Meanwhile, the religiously affiliated employer contends that the workers are volunteers, or, because the enterprise is related to the social justice ministry of the religion, its employment practices are exempt from the FLSA by First Amendment separation of church and state and free exercise principles.

The landmark United States Supreme Court decision governing these disputes is Tony and Susan Alamo Found. v. Secretary of Labor.

In Tony and Susan Alamo Found., the Supreme Court unanimously affirmed the decision of the Eighth Circuit that the Fair Labor Standards Act, the federal minimum wage law, protected persons used in the commercial enterprises of religious foundations.

This particular application of federal wage law did not violate the free exercise rights of the employees and did not constitute excessive entanglements of the government with the religious foundation. Because the Foundation had thoroughly involved itself in operating business commercial enterprises, it had effectively deprived itself of the mantle of religious exemption and immunity from compliance as an employer with the federal minimum wage law.

The Alamo Foundation was a nonprofit religious organization. Its proclaimed mission was Christian evangelism and active corporal works of mercy to disadvantaged persons. The Foundation derived its income from operating a variety of commercial businesses, including service stations, retail clothing and grocery outlets, hog farms, roofing and electrical construction companies, a record-keeping company, a motel, and companies engaged in the production and distribution of candy. These businesses were staffed largely by the Foundation's unpaid associates. They received clothing, room, and board but no cash wages in return for their services.

Other than its peculiar nonwage practices, for all practical purposes the Foundation was substantially equivalent, in its day-to-day operations, with other secular employers. The fact that the workers of the religious foundation considered themselves charitable volunteers serving their religion, and not employees within the meaning of the FLSA, was not determinative.

The Court deemphasized the free exercise elements of the case and, instead, highlighted the federal wage law issues because of the pervasive commercial nature of the Foundation's various business enterprises.

The free exercise clause of the First Amendment does not require an exemption from a governmental program unless, at a minimum, inclusion in the program actually burdens the freedom to exercise religious rights. Application of the FLSA to the foundation workers who were engaged in commercial ventures did not violate the workers' free exercise rights under the First Amendment, because they remained free to donate their FLSA-mandated wages back to the Alamo Foundation.

Religious organizations do not have carte blanche to exploit persons employed in their commercial ventures. Free exercise claims by those persons, disavowing their labor law and employment rights, are properly unavailing. The Court implicitly recognized the potential coercive influence of religious institutions on their employees, pressuring the workers to assert positions contrary to their legal rights.

Since the Court's Alamo decision in 1985, several federal circuit courts of appeals have issued decisions in full accord with the Alamo precedent.

In Reich v. Shiloh True Light Church of Christ, the court determined that children younger than the age of sixteen employed in the commercial enterprises of a religious institution as part of their religious belief that they should receive vocational training are covered employees under the FLSA. Church youth participated in the Shiloh Vocational Training Program, through which they performed various construction projects. In turn, customers paid the Church for the services performed. Children younger than the age of sixteen did not receive wages for their work. Instead, they received lump sum payments that the Church characterized as gifts. In these situations where free labor is for the supposed benefit of the worker, the general test applied by the courts is whether the employer or the employee is the primary beneficiary of the free labor. Because the Church was the primary beneficiary of the labor, the children were in fact employees and thus entitled to the protections of the FLSA.

Applicability of the FLSA often arises in religiously affiliated schools. Dole v. Shenandoah Baptist Church involved application of the FLSA to lay faculty at the Roanoke Valley Christian Schools operated by the Shenandoah Baptist Church. The Church asserted that application of the FLSA would violate both the free exercise and establishment clauses of the First Amendment. The court disagreed, holding that the FLSA applies to church run schools that are enterprises within the meaning of the FLSA. Any minimal free exercise burden was justified by the compelling government interest in enforcing the minimum wage and equal pay provisions of the FLSA. Likewise, in DeArment v. Harvey, a church-operated private religious school was subject to the FLSA. The school used a unique learning technique composed of a self-study program for the students. A supervisor and class monitor assisted the students in their studies. The students themselves were responsible for independent learning, whereas the supervisors graded papers, answered students' questions, conducted prayer services, and counseled students. Both the supervisor and the class monitors were required to be born again Christians, and these employees considered their work an integral component of their personal ministry. However, despite the contention that their employment was part of their religious ideology, the Court applied Shenandoah, holding that the FLSA applied to both the class monitors and supervisors. The ministerial exemption of the FLSA is narrowly limited in its application. Clearly, this exception includes ordained clergy, as well as employees essential to carry out particular religious rituals.

In light of the narrow applicability of the ministerial exception, religious organizations engaged in commercial enterprises will usually be deemed employers of employees subject to the FLSA.

DAVID L. GREGORY

References and Further Reading

- Gregory, David L., The First Amendment Religion Clauses and Labor and Employment Law in the Supreme Court, 1984 Term, New York Law School Law Review 31 (1986): 1.
- Miller, Scott D., Revitalizing the FLSA, Hofstra Labor and Employment Law Journal 19 (2001): 1.
- Rowan, Regan C., Solving the Bluish Collar Problem: An Analysis of the DOL's Modernization of the Exemptions to the Fair Labor Standards Act, U. Pennsylvania Journal of Labor and Employment Law 7 (2004): 119.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- DeArment v. Harvey*, 932 F.2d 721 (8th Cir. 1991)
- Dole v. Shenandoah Baptist Church*, 899 F.2d 1389 (4th Cir.) cert denied, 498 U.S. 846 (1990)
- Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 USC 201 et. seq.
- The First Amendment of the United States Constitution
- Reich v. Shiloh True Light Church of Christ*, 85 F.2d 6161 (4th Cir. 1996)
- Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor*, 105 S. Ct. 1953 (1985)

See also Exemptions for Religion Contained in Regulatory Statutes; Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor, 471 U.S. 290 (1985)

FAIR USE DOCTRINE AND FIRST AMENDMENT

A certain tension exists between copyright law and first amendment values. Copyright law has a particularly broad sweep today. It extends to books, creative literature, visual art, photographs, videos, sound recordings, and computer programs. Copyright protection also extends to the "derivative" forms of this work, including translations, performances, and digital reproductions. Even noncommercial use of copyrighted work can be illegal, as when copyrighted music is downloaded on one's home computer.

Conventional wisdom has it that copyright law resolves any first amendment concerns by recognizing two limitations. First, the Copyright Act denies protection to "ideas," "concepts," facts, or "principles" per se and instead protects only their "expression." Second, potential infringers are permitted to make "fair use" of copyrighted material. Because of these two limitations, the first amendment seldom plays a role in suits for copyright infringement. As Justice Ruth Ginsburg has written, existing copyright law contains "built-in free speech safeguards."

The fair use doctrine has been recognized by courts for more than 160 years, although it was not codified by Congress until 1976. The Copyright Act currently permits the fair use of copyrighted work "for purposes such as criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching...scholarship, or research." When determining whether a defendant has engaged in fair use of copyrighted work, courts consider four statutory factors. They consider (1) the purpose and character of the defendant's use, including whether the use is commercial or nonprofit; (2) the nature of the copyrighted work; (3) the amount of copyrighted work that has been used; and (4) the effect of the defendant's use on the existing or potential market value of the work. The Supreme Court has emphasized that all these factors are to be weighed together and that no bright-line test exists for achieving this "sensitive balancing of interests."

In recent years, the Court has shown greatest solicitude for "transformative" use of copyrighted work when applying the fair use doctrine. The transformation standard focuses on the extent to which the alleged infringer "adds something new, with a further purpose or different character, altering the first with new expression, meaning, or message." This transformative use of copyrighted material, although not necessary to a fair use defense, lies "at the heart of the fair use doctrine's guarantee of breathing space within the confines of copyright." When the alleged infringer "transforms" copyrighted work, even the infringer's commercial exploitation of the transformed product is unlikely to negate the fair use defense. For example, in Campbell v. Acuff-Rose Music, Inc., the Court found that the rap group "2 Live Crew" had engaged in protected fair use when it parodied the classic Roy Orbison song, "Oh, Pretty Woman" and profited by both recording and performing its parody.

Current law thus achieves a compromise between copyright and First Amendment values. Whether it is a sound compromise is a matter of debate. Professor Rebecca Tushnet, writing in the Yale Law Journal, has recently argued that the fair use doctrine protects only one version of first amendment values—a version that esteems the alleged infringer's transformative expression—while ignoring a version that recognizes the value of nontransformative uses like copying. In particular, the fair use doctrine's emphasis on transformative expression is said to ignore the interest of the public audience in gaining greater access to valued expression. It remains to be seen whether alternative versions of a compromise between copyright and first amendment values, like Tushnet's, will ultimately gain traction in Congress or the courts.

MICHAEL S. FINCH

References and Further Reading

- Boorstyn, Neil. Boorstyn on Copyright. 2nd Ed., Vol. 1, 12-4-12-38. 2000.
- Goldstein, Paul. Copyright. 2nd Ed., Vol. 2, 10:1-10:71. Supp., 2005.
- Leval, Pierre N., Toward a Fair Use Standard, Harvard Law Review 103 (1990): 1105.
- Tushnet, Rebecca, Copy This Essay: How Fair Use Doctrine Harms Free Speech and How Copying Serves It, Yale Law Journal 114 (2004): 535.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Campbell v. Acuff-Rose Music, Inc.*, 510 U.S. 569 (1994)
- Eldred v. Ashcroft*, 537 U.S. 186 (2003)
- Copyright Act of 1976, 17 U.S.C. §§ 102, 107

FAIRNESS DOCTRINE

The fairness doctrine was developed by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to ensure fairness and balance in broadcasters' coverage of controversial public issues. Because radio and television broadcasters enjoy a governmental license to use part of the "scarce" broadcast spectrum, they must act in the public interest. The fairness doctrine is one means by which the FCC attempted historically to serve the public interest. The fairness doctrine existed in some form from 1949 until the late 1980s, when it was repealed by the FCC. It had greatest influence between 1962 and 1976.

The fairness doctrine took specific form in rules such as the "personal attack" rule and the "political editorializing" rules that were challenged in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission. Under the personal-attack rule, when a person involved in an issue of public interest was attacked during a broadcast, the station was obligated to give him an opportunity to respond. Under the political-editorializing rule, when a political candidate was endorsed in an editorial, his opponent had the right to respond.

In Red Lion, the Supreme Court upheld these rules and the fairness doctrine. The Court rejected claims (1) that the FCC lacked statutory authority to implement the fairness doctrine, and (2) that the doctrine infringed broadcaster's first amendment rights. Responding to the first amendment challenge, the Court observed:

Because of the scarcity of radio frequencies, the Government is permitted to put restraints on licensees in favor of others whose views should be expressed on this unique medium. But the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount.

This view of government's need to regulate broadcast fairness because of medium scarcity has not weathered well over time. In 1985, the FCC released a report concluding that the fairness doctrine did not promote the public interest, that it "chilled" broadcast speech, and that it was effectively obsolescent. Since then, attempts to reinstate some form of the fairness doctrine have failed politically, with greatest opposition coming from members of the Republican Party.

MICHAEL FINCH

References and Further Reading

- Krattenmaker, Thomas, and Lucas Powe, The Fairness Doctrine Today: A Constitutional Curiosity and an Impossible Dream, Duke Law Journal 1985 (1982): 151.
- Logan, Charles, Jr., Getting Beyond Scarcity: A New Paradigm for Assessing the Constitutionality of Broadcast Regulation, California Law Review 85 (1997): 1687.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Communications Act of 1934, as amended 47 U.S.C. § 301 et seq.
- Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission*, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)

FALSE CONFESSIONS

One of the most compelling forms of evidence in a criminal trial is a confession of the crime by the accused. This evidence is so compelling because most people believe it highly unlikely that someone would confess to a crime they did not commit, especially a serious crime. Although intuitively appealing, this common belief has been disproved by many recent studies. Not only do individuals falsely confess, they sometimes do so without outside justification—such as the desire to protect someone else—and they confess to very serious crimes, including capital murder. In fact, false confessions are one of the three most commonly cited factors in death penalty cases that have been reversed or resulted in an executive pardon due to the defendant's actual innocence.

There are many reasons why an individual might falsely confess. Some individuals falsely confess due to outside justifications such as protecting another individual. However, mentally coercive police interrogation techniques are the more common cause of false confessions in cases that have been overturned. Although these techniques are designed to elicit genuine confessions, they also risk encouraging false confessions, especially when dealing with juveniles or mentally challenged suspects. Typical techniques include isolating the suspect from others and encouraging a confession through the use of deception and mental coercion. In response to these interrogation techniques, some individuals actually come to believe that they committed the crime. Others succumb to the pressure of the interrogation and falsely confess due to a highly suggestible or compliant mental state. Although the mentally retarded and individuals with subaverage intelligence are most at risk for falsely confessing, most individuals who have been proven to have falsely confessed are of average intelligence.

Most of the false conviction studies that have been conducted have focused mainly or exclusively on individuals who have falsely confessed to murder and been sentenced to death. Some of these individuals have come within minutes of execution before receiving reprieves that eventually led to their exoneration. As a result of these and other jurisdictional studies, a handful of states—including Alaska, Illinois, Minnesota, and Wisconsin—have instituted legislative or judicial requirements that police interrogation sessions be videotaped as a prerequisite to admission of statements at trial. Some jurisdictions apply the requirement only to juvenile cases or interrogation of murder suspects, but others apply it to all criminal cases, and some police departments require videotaping as a matter in internal policy. Although not generally required, the most effective use of videotaping is to record the entire interrogation along with the statement itself. This technique provides an objective and complete record for courts and attorneys to review to determine the reliability of statements.

False confessions have many negative effects—most notably on the wrongfully convicted defendant—but also on the victims of the crime and society, who are still vulnerable to the commission of further criminal acts by the actual perpetrator, and the criminal justice system itself, which relies on the faith of the people for its effectiveness.

JUDITH M. BARGER

References and Further Reading

- Drizin, Steven A., and Richard A. Leo, The Problem of False Confessions in the Post-DNA World, North Carolina Law Review 82 (2004): 891.
- Gross, Samuel R., et al., Exonerations in the United States, 1989 through 2003, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 95 (2005): 523.
- White, Welsh, False Confessions and the Constitution: Safeguards Against Untrustworthy Confessions, Harvard C. R.-C.L. Law Review 32 (1997): 105.
- Wisconsin v. Jerrell, 699 N.W.2d 110 (2005).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Minnesota v. Scales, 518 N.W.2d 587 (1994)
- Stephan v. Alaska, 711 P.2d 1156 (1985)

FALSE LIGHT INVASION OF PRIVACY

The tort of false light invasion of privacy has been recognized in the majority of American states and codified in Section 652E of The Second Restatement of Torts. It protects the interest of individuals in not being placed before the public in an embarrassing, humiliating, or otherwise objectionable false light. Whether this interest is properly characterized as a dignitary or a reputational interest is a matter of dispute among courts and commentators.

Although the false light tort closely resembles and substantially overlaps with the tort of defamation, its scope differs. Whereas defamation is limited to derogatory statements that significantly impair a person's community standing or associational opportunities, even a non-disparaging statement is actionable as an invasion of privacy if the false light is of a kind that would be—as the Restatement puts it—“highly offensive to a reasonable person.” Thus, there can be liability even if the false light is laudatory, as when a star athlete who served honorably but uneventfully in the military is falsely depicted as a war hero, or when a hostage victim is falsely described as bravely resisting her brutal captors.

The First Amendment limits the availability of false light actions, but the precise nature of this limitation is uncertain. In 1967, in Time, Inc. v. Hill, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the rule of New York Times v. Sullivan—which requires public official plaintiffs in defamation cases to prove that the defamatory falsehood was published “with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not”—applies as well in false light cases. However, it is uncertain whether the holding of Hill survives the Court's subsequent ruling in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. that private figure defamation plaintiffs need only prove negligence. This issue was left unresolved in Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co., the Supreme Court's only other false light decision. Some lower courts continue to adhere to Hill, whereas others permit private figure false light plaintiffs to recover on a showing of negligence.

Early predictions that the false light tort would ultimately supplant the older tort of defamation have not been fulfilled. Some courts, including the highest courts of several states, have rejected the tort altogether, whereas a number of others have limited its scope in various ways. Academic commentary on the tort has been predominantly critical, with some writers urging its outright abolition and others recommending that it be confined to nondefamatory falsehoods. Chief among the reasons for judicial and academic resistance is the danger, which is exacerbated by the tort's uncertain boundaries, of a chilling effect on constitutionally protected speech. There is also concern that the false light tort adds unnecessary complexity to defamation litigation, that it may enable plaintiffs to circumvent various speech-protective rules that have traditionally restricted recovery for defamation, and that the harm caused by a non-defamatory falsehood is seldom serious enough to warrant legal remedy.

MICHAEL MADOW

References and Further Reading

- Keeton, W. Page, et al. Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing, 1984.
 Prosser, William L., Privacy, California Law Review 48 (1960): 3:383–423.
 Schwartz, Gary T., Explaining and Justifying a Limited Tort of False Light Invasion of Privacy, Case Western Reserve Law Review 41, No. 3 (1991): 885–919.
 Warren, Samuel D., and Brandeis, Louis D., The Right to Privacy, Harvard Law Review 4 (1890): 5:193–220.
 Zimmerman, Diane L., False Light Invasion of Privacy: The Light That Failed, New York University Law Review 64 (1989): 2:364–453.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co.*, 419 U.S. 245 (1974)
Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1974)
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967)
Restatement (Second) of Torts § 652E (1976)

See also Appropriation of Name or Likeness; Defamation and Free Speech; Invasion of Privacy and Free Speech; Right of Privacy

FALWELL, JERRY (1933–)

Jerry Falwell was born in Lynchburg, Virginia. In 1952, he became a “born again” Christian and earned a Divinity degree from Baptist Bible College in Springfield, Missouri. After his graduation, Falwell returned to Lynchburg and married Macel Pate, with whom he has three children. In 1956, Falwell established the Thomas Road Baptist Church in Lynchburg, which grew quickly. Soon after, he began to preach on television and in 1971, Falwell founded Liberty University in Lynchburg.

In 1976, Falwell staged a series of rallies calling for moral renewal and opposing the U.S. Supreme Court ruling on prayer in public schools, homosexuality, pornography, abortion, and the Equal Rights Amendment. In 1979, Falwell founded Moral Majority Incorporated, a secular group that lobbied for moral values. The Moral Majority played a large role in the election of President Ronald Reagan in 1980 and supported George Bush's run in 1988. Falwell disbanded the organization in 1989.

With the publication of a parody in the November 1983 issue of Hustler Magazine, Falwell was thrust into a major debate on the First Amendment. The parody was an advertisement for Campari Liqueur that contained Falwell's name and picture. In the advertisement, Falwell purportedly describes his “first time,” intoxicated, in an outhouse, with his mother. The advertisement did contain a disclaimer reading “ad parody—not to be taken seriously” and in the table of contents, the advertisement is listed as “Fiction; Ad and Personality Parody.” Still outraged by what he believed was an obscene, false, and vulgar piece, Falwell filed suit against Larry Flynt, the publisher of Hustler Magazine, and Flynt Distributing Company for libel, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. At trial, the court dismissed the invasion of privacy claim, and the jury ruled against him on the libel count, because they did not believe the advertisement could be reasonably understood as conveying actual facts or events. However, Falwell did prevail on the count of intentional infliction of emotional distress and was awarded $200,000.

On appeal, the court upheld the ruling that the First Amendment did not shield Flynt and Hustler from liability. However, Flynt and Hustler appealed that decision, and on February 24, 1988, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the appellate court's decision as inconsistent with the First Amendment. The Supreme Court reasoned that public figures cannot recover under intentional infliction of emotional distress for such a publication unless they can show that the publication contained a “false statement of fact” that “was made with ‘actual malice.’” Because the jury held that the advertisement parody was not reasonably believable, Falwell could not meet his burden of proof.

Falwell continues to provoke controversy because of his willingness to address controversial issues and speak candidly about his beliefs. He frequently speaks out against homosexuality, pornography, abortion, and communism and in support of family, morality, human life, voluntary prayer, and the teaching of creationism in schools. Although criticized for not respecting the division between church and state, Falwell continues to believe that there is a place for God in government.

MARY K. MANKUS

References and Further Reading

- D'Souza, Dinesh. Falwell Before the Millennium: A Critical Biography. Chicago: Regnery Gateway, 1984.
Falwell, Jerry. Falwell: An Autobiography. Lynchburg, Virginia: Liberty House Publishers, 1997.
Hustler Magazine and Larry C. Flynt v. Jerry Falwell, 485 U.S. 46; 108 S.Ct. 876 (1988).
Smolla, Rodney. Jerry Falwell v. Larry Flynt: The First Amendment on Trial. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1990.

See also Abortion; Equal Rights Amendment; Flynt, Larry; Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988); Prayer in Public Schools

FAMILY UNITY FOR NONCITIZENS

Family unity for noncitizens originates primarily from family-sponsored immigration, which is one of the mainstays of the federal immigration law system. Recognizing the importance of the family unit, family reunification has been a significant policy of the immigration law system since the early twentieth century. After 1952, when the Immigration and Nationality Act was enacted, the immigration law system contains a comprehensive family-based set of preferences, specifying which noncitizen family members can be reunited with their relatives who are either U.S. citizens or noncitizens who are legal permanent residents of the United States (LPRs). Noncitizens who are parents, spouses, or minor children of adult U.S. citizens are admitted as immediate relatives and are not subject to quotas or waits, only the administrative processing times.

Same sex partners and unmarried cohabitants are not eligible for family-sponsored immigration as spouses. Family unity for noncitizens does not include the right to reunite in the United States with a U.S. citizen spouse if the couple was married abroad and the noncitizen spouse is denied the right to enter the country. Thus, noncitizen families do not enjoy the same level of constitutional protection for the fundamental family unit as recognized by the U.S. Supreme Court in the case of U.S. citizens.

The family-based preferences are limited to the following: first, the unmarried adult sons and daughters of U.S. citizens; second, the spouses or unmarried children of LPRs; third, the married sons and daughters of U.S. citizens, and the fourth and final preference is for brothers and sisters of adult U.S. citizens. There are lengthy waits during which noncitizen families abroad are separated from their U.S.-based relatives, depending on when a visa will become available in each preference category under congressionally mandated quotas and country limits. No other noncitizen relatives are allowed to enter the United States under family-based immigration.

Children of noncitizens born in the United States acquire U.S. citizenship at birth but cannot file a family-sponsored immigration petition for their noncitizen parents until they reach the age of 21. Thus, if a noncitizen parent is subject to removal from the United States, the fact that the noncitizen parent has a U.S. citizen child does not prevent the removal of the parent to his or her country of origin. Scholars have argued that such a child's citizenship should be valued as much as the citizenship of an adult, yet the fact remains that a U.S. citizen child does not have the right to reside in the United States with his or her parents if they are removable noncitizens. International law grants broader rights to family unity than those granted in domestic immigration law in such situations. At least one lower court has ruled that when the non-citizen father of a U.S. citizen child is about to be removed from the United States, the U.S. government must take into account customary international law regarding family unity and consider the best interests of the child.

MARÍA PABÓN LÓPEZ

References and Further Reading

- Legomsky, Stephen H. Immigration and Refugee Law and Policy. New York: Foundation Press, 2005.
Jastram, Kate (2003). Family unity, in Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, and Vincent Chetail, eds. Migration and International Legal Norms. The Hague: T.M.C. Asser Press, pp. 185–201.
Romero, Victor C. Alienated: Immigrant Rights, the Constitution, and Equality in America. New York: New York University Press, 2005.
———. Asians, Gay Marriage, and Immigration: Family Unification at a Crossroads, Indiana International & Comparative Law Review 15 (2005) 2:337–347.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adams v. Howerton*, 673 F.2d. 1036 (9th Cir. 1982)
Beharry v. Reno, 183 F. Supp. 2d 584 (E.D. N.Y. 2002), vacated on other grounds sub nom, Beharry v. Ashcroft, 329 F.3d 51 (2nd Cir. 2003) (NO. 02-2171), as amended (Jul 24, 2003)
Immigration and Nationality Act, P.L. 82-414, 66 Stat. 163 (June 27, 1952), as amended Hermina Sague v. U.S., 416 F. Supp. 217 (D.P.R. 1976)
Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)
INA § 201 (b)(2)(A)(i), codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1151 (b)(2)(A)(i) (2000)
INA § 203 (a), (d), codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1153(a), (d) (2000)

FAMILY VALUES MOVEMENT

The family values movement is actually a very loose alliance of different organizations united by the belief that government has a duty to protect both the traditional American family and the moral foundations of society. The central tenet of the various groups that make up the family values movement is that the state has not just a role but a duty to promote a particular type of morality for the good of all its citizens.

There are two main views as to how the state gets its duty to protect morality. Some value morality extrinsically: immorality corrupts every aspect of society and so morality must be promoted to protect all members of society from that corruption. Others see morality as something that's intrinsically important; actions that violate this morality are simply wrong and ought to be stopped. This view is particularly prevalent among more religious groups whose morality rests on Judeo-Christian ethics and other theological justifications. This second position has attracted criticism for ignoring the establishment clause of the First Amendment.

Although the family values movement is often thought of as beginning in the 1980s, it can trace its origin to the reactions against the shift in American politics away from its traditional, broadly conformist, White Anglo-Saxon Protestant roots that began in the 1950s. These changes were aimed at the creation of a secular, pluralistic society that not only understood and fostered differences in life choices between citizens but also protected the rights of its minorities to act without fear of reprisal from the majority. Mass-based social groups began to push against the traditional constraints placed on their members, particularly feminists striving for equality in the workplace, and homosexual rights groups campaigning against state discrimination such as policies preventing homosexuals from working for the federal government.

The impetus for the many of these policy changes came from the courts in a series of decisions that favored the autonomy of the individual over the interests of the state in promoting a particular morality.

Some of these decisions were centered on the right to make choices over their behavior within the privacy of their homes. One example of this would be Stanley v. Georgia, which recognized a "right to satisfy emotional needs in the privacy of [one's] own house" that precluded the state from banning the possession of pornography.

Others were centered on the right of the individual to make decisions about their body and intimate aspects of their lives. One example of this would be Roe v. Wade, where the Court recognized the importance of a woman's right to choose to have an abortion.

Others were aimed at protecting the rights of minorities from discrimination by the majority motivated by animus and moral differences. An example of this would be Romer v. Evans, where the Court struck down a state constitutional amendment prohibiting laws that would protect homosexuals from discrimination.

The family values movement saw these decisions as dangerous and worked in the courts and the legislatures to protect the role of the state in advancing and defending a particular idea of morality to protect society. They achieved many successes in the electoral realm, especially in the southern states, only to have many laws later overturned by the courts. They regarded the interventions of the court as undemocratic intrusions on the ability of the majority to protect their society.

The family values movement thinks that reformers, including the courts, fail to see that some apparently private acts actually have wide-ranging consequences for all of society. Permitting the use of pornography degrades all women, desensitizes the public to sex, and leads to increased sexual violence. Allowing the use of contraceptives decouples sex from reproduction and promotes sex outside of marriage. Abortion involves the termination of another life and can lead to decreased regard for all human life.

The movement is often characterized as being "right wing," religious, and Republican, and some of its most high-profile groups have included the Moral Majority, the Christian Coalition, Concerned Women for America, and the Family Research Council.

The socially conservative views of the movement attract religious groups from across the wider political spectrum. The movement is most associated with the Republican Party, because that party has actively courted them by pursuing family-based moral policies for some time. This link with the movement was most active and important in the 1980s when President Ronald Reagan placed traditional family values at the core of his political philosophy.

The political power of the family values movement has declined since the 1980s, but it remains active through its many organizations. They have not given up attempts to overturn the developments of the last few decades and continue to fight a rearguard action in the face of further socially liberal reforms. At the start of the twenty-first century, the most heated battles involve the expansion of the term marriage to cover same sex unions. This opposition is even more intense when children are involved, and they see same sex adoption as not only giving official recognition to deviant behavior but also potentially affecting the child's sexual orientation by growing up in a home where homosexual behavior is the norm.

Although the culture wars fought by the family values movement show no sign of abating, their political victories of the movement have tended to be either short lived (as Bowers v. Hardwick gave way to Lawrence v. Texas) or merely limiting the scope of their defeat (as New York v. Ferber qualified Stanley). Their opponents have been far more successful in challenging the status quo and have radically transformed American society over the past few decades. It seems unlikely that these opponents will win completely, but their advances show no sign of slowing, and it remains to be seen whether the movement can force a retrenchment of traditional family values in American politics.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- Formicola, Jo Renee, and Hubert Morken, eds. Religious Leaders and Faith-based Politics : Ten Profiles. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, 2001.
- Hunter, James D. Culture Wars: The Struggle to Define America. New York: Basic Books, 1991.
- Kaplan, Esther. "The Religious Right's Sense of Siege is Fueling a Resurgence." The Nation July 5, 2004.
- Lawler, Michael G. "Family: American and Christian." America August 12, 1995.
- Walsh, Andrew D. Religion, Economics, and Public Policy: Ironies, Tragedies, and Absurdities of the Contemporary Culture Wars. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2000.
- Yarnold, Barbara M., ed. The Role of Religious Organizations in Social Movements. New York: Praeger Publishers, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
- New York v. Ferber*, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Roemer v. Evans*, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)
- Stanley v. Georgia*, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)

See also Abortion; Abortion Laws and the Establishment Clause; Abortion Protest Cases; Bible in American Law; Birth Control; Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986); Boy Scouts of America v. Dale 530 U.S. 640 (2000); Child Pornography; Defense of Marriage Act; Gay and Lesbian Rights; Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Homosexuality and Immigration; Marriage, History of; Same-Sex Marriage Legalization; Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969); Right of Privacy; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003); New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)

FCC v. LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS, 468 U.S. 364 (1984)

The writers of the Constitution safeguarded the individual right to freedom of speech with the First Amendment, which forbids Congress from making laws abridging freedom of the press. But does the First Amendment also protect television broadcasters, even those established by law and publicly funded? FCC v. League of Women Voters (League) is important in shaping the answer: broadcasters, even publicly owned, are protected by the First Amendment.

Educational stations, organized and funded under Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 (PBA), were banned by the PBA from editorializing. A station operator, joined by the League of Women Voters, challenged the ban in a lawsuit against the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), the Regulatory Agency responsible for Broadcast Regulation.

In League, the Supreme Court upheld the district court decision that the ban on editorializing violated the First Amendment. The First Amendment rights of broadcasters cannot be taken away, even though they owe their creation and funding to law. The holding relied on the finding in Red Lion v. FCC, that broadcasters enjoy the broad First Amendment rights of journalists, limited only as required to accommodate the physical limitations of broadcast spectrum. Finding the right to editorialize fundamental, the Supreme Court suggested that FCC regulations of content on the basis of spectrum scarcity should be closely reviewed. This standard of review was subsequently applied to overrule the Fairness Doctrine, regulations requiring broadcasters to present both sides of an issue.

As a result of the decision in League, restrictions on broadcast content are subject to strict scrutiny. Few governmental restrictions remain on television broadcast content. Most important are indecency, as confirmed by the Supreme Court in FCC v. Pacifica, and right of response for presidential candidates, specified in the Communications Act of 1934. The particulars of these restrictions are subject to continuing challenge and debate.

KATHLEEN HAWKINS BERKOWE

References and Further Reading

- Carter, T. Barton, Marc A. Franklin, and Jay B. Wright. The First Amendment and the Fifth Estate: Regulation of Electronic Mass Media. 2nd Ed. Westbury, New York: Foundation Press, 1989.
- Corn-Revere, Robert L., et al. Modern Communication Law. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.
- Russomanno, Joseph. Speaking Our Minds: Conversations with the People Behind Landmark First Amendment

Cases. Mahwah: NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

CBS, Inc. v. FCC, 453 U.S. 367 (1981)
FCC v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364 (1984)
FCC v. Pacifica, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 453 U.S. 367 (1981)
 The Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, Pub. L. 90-129, 81 Stat. 365, 47 U.S.C. 390 et seq., 47 U.S.C. 399

See also Broadcast Regulation; Fairness Doctrine; FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978); Federal Communications Commission; Government Speech; Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 453 U.S. 367 (1969)

FCC v. PACIFICA FOUNDATION, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)

George Carlin, a comedian, recorded a famous monologue in which he riffed on “7 Dirty Words”—slang words he claimed could never be uttered on radio or television. Carlin’s thesis was proved correct one day when Pacifica’s New York radio station broadcast a recording of the monologue during an afternoon program addressing contemporary attitudes on language. A parent driving with his child complained to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). The FCC found Pacifica had violated “indecent” rules applicable to public broadcasters. Pacifica appealed to the Supreme Court.

The Court found that the First Amendment permits different standards to be applied to the broadcast media, as opposed to print or other public spaces such as taverns. The earlier Cohen decision, for example, had overturned the conviction of a war protestor wearing a jacket emblazoned with the words, “F the Draft,” holding that the government could not sanction offensive words used in public speech because of the risk of censoring ideas.

The key features of broadcasting distinguishing it from other modes of communication reflected the Court’s desire to shield “captive audience” members from offensive communications, particularly in the privacy of the home and in other settings in which children might be present. Unlike other contexts in which unwilling listeners may avoid offensive language, on-air listeners cannot so easily predict whether a given program will contain offensive language. The Court also thought that parents could not realistically monitor broadcasts for indecent language to protect children.

JOHN NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971).
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).
Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)
 18 U.S.C. § 1464 (1976)

See also Broadcast Regulation; Captive Audiences and Free Speech; Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971); Federal Communications Commission; Public Vulgarity and Free Speech

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

The Federal Communications Commission (FCC), a Regulatory Agency established by Congress, implements Broadcast Regulation, Cable Television Regulation, and regulates telecommunications services, and common carriers under the Communications Act of 1934, the Telecommunications Act of 1996, and others.

Guided by the public interest standard, the FCC sets technical standards and operating regulations and monitors and enforces compliance. It assigns broadcast licenses for the television and radio spectrum. Decisions of the five FCC commissioners, appointed by the President, are appealed to federal courts.

FCC regulations affecting broadcast content have provoked challenges that they and the underlying laws abridge the right to free speech under the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution (First Amendment). As confirmed in Red Lion v. FCC, the FCC preserves broadcasters’ First Amendment protections as journalists while administering laws that permissibly affect content such as the Communications Act’s requirement that broadcasters offer equal time to federal candidates. As special situations justifying the regulations change, the FCC has overturned policies such as the Fairness Doctrine, requiring balanced views in broadcast content.

While FCC regulation of indecency is permissible, as confirmed by the Supreme Court in FCC v. Pacifica, the FCC is required to regulate speech of new technologies in the face of successful challenges to underlying legislation such as the Communications Decency Act. The FCC regulates obscenity, a form of Unprotected Speech; however, the definitions and standards are the subject of continuing challenges.

The FCC’s Equal Opportunity rules, adopted in 1969 under the public interest standard, required broadcasters to hire minorities and women in proportion to the local population. Federal courts rejected the rules as unconstitutional race-based qualifications violating the equal protection clause of the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

A federal court in Prometheus Radio Project v. FCC found that limits on cross-ownership of broadcast and cable stations in the same markets may survive First and Fifth Amendment challenges. It remanded the case to the FCC to develop permissible regulations.

Aware that improper regulation can be challenged as a government taking of property under the Fifth Amendment, the FCC has interpreted current laws narrowly as inapplicable to new media and new technologies. The FCC determined that Internet access offered by cable companies is not a regulated telecommunications service, a decision upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court in National Cable & Telecommunications Association v. Brand X Internet.

The FCC is the arbiter of first resort balancing First and Fifth Amendment rights against regulations and underlying laws in the areas of mass communications. As technologies continue to develop, the FCC will continue its pivotal role in developing Constitutional law.

KATHLEEN HAWKINS BERKOWE

References and Further Reading

- Abernathy, Kathleen Q., The Role of the Federal Communications Commission on the Path from the Vast Wasteland to the Fertile Plain, Federal Communications Law Journal 55 (2003): May:435.
- Botein, Michael, and Douglas H. Ginsburg. The Regulation of the Electronic Mass Media: Law and Policy for Radio, Television, Cable and the New Video Technologies. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.
- Carter, T. Barton, Marc A. Franklin, and Jay B. Wright. The First Amendment and the Fifth Estate: Regulation of Electronic Mass Media. 2nd Ed. Westbury, NY: Foundation Press, 1989.
- Communications Law and Policy Resources, maintained by Justin Brown, Assistant Professor, College of Journalism and Communications, University of Florida, <http://www.jou.ufl.edu/faculty/jbrown/lawandpolicy.htm> (accessed September 1, 2005).
- Corn-Revere, Robert L., et al. Modern Communication Law, Practitioner's Edition. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.
- Creech, Kenneth C. Electronic Media Law and Regulation. Boston, MA: Focal Press, 1996.
- Einstein, Mara. Media Diversity: Economics, Ownership and the FCC. Mahwah, N.J.: L. Erlbaum Associates, 2004.
- The Federal Communications Commission website. <http://www.fcc.gov> (accessed September 1, 2005).

Cases and Statutes Cited

The Communications Act of 1934, Act June 19, 1934, ch. 652, 48 Stat. 1064, 47 U.S.C. Sec. 151 et seq.

The Communications Decency Act, Pub. L. 104-104, Title V, Sec. 501, Feb 8, 1996, 110 Stat. 133

FCC v. Pacifica, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)

FCC v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364 (1984)

Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod v. FCC, 141 F.3d 344 (D.C. Cir. 1998)

Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)

Prometheus Radio Project v. FCC, ___ F. 3d ___ (3rd Cir. 2003), cert. den. June 13, 2005, 545 U.S. ___

The Telecommunications Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-104

See also Affirmative Action; Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Bill of Rights: Structure; Broadcast Regulation; Cable Television Regulation; Communications Decency Act (1996); Fairness Doctrine; FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984); Government Speech; Red Lion Broadcasting v. FCC, 453 U.S. 367 (1981)

FEDERALIZATION OF CRIMINAL LAW

Since it first adopted a statute with criminal penalties under the alleged authority of the Commerce Clause in 1884, Congress has increasingly been asserting the power to legislate police powers, first on interstate shipments, later within state territory. Most such legislation has claimed authority under ever-broader constructions of the Commerce Clause and the Necessary and Proper Clause, which have been extended to include almost anything. This criminal legislation would have been deemed unconstitutional in the Founding Era.

The original meaning of “commerce among the states” seems to have been limited to tangible commodities the title and possession of which are transferred from a party outside a state to a party within that state. It did not include services, information, energy, or primary production such as mining, farming, hunting, or fishing. Nor did it include manufacturing, transport, possession, use, or disposal, or the activities of the transacting parties, or anything that might have a “substantial effect” on such transactions.

Furthermore, the original meaning of the power to “regulate” did not include the power to prohibit, or to impose criminal penalties, but only civil penalties, such as fines or confiscation.

The original Constitution delegated authority to the central government to punish as crimes, committed on state territory, only a limited number of subjects: (1) treason (Art. III Sec. 3 Cl. 2); (2) counterfeiting (Art. I Sec. 8 Cl. 6); (3) piracy or felonies on the high seas; (4) offenses against the “laws of nations” (Art. I Sec. 8 Cl. 10); or (5) violations of discipline by military or militia personnel (Art. I Sec. 8 Cl. 14).

This was confirmed in the constitutional ratifying conventions, and again in the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798, authored by Thomas Jefferson, although he omitted the last one in that document.

There have been no subsequent amendments to expand the criminal powers of Congress, other than the Thirteenth (slavery), Fourteenth (violations of rights by state agents), Fifteenth (denial of vote to former slaves), Eighteenth (alcohol prohibition, repealed by Twenty-first), Nineteenth (denial of vote to women), and Twenty-sixth Amendments (denial of vote to those aged 18 or older).

The process has been driven by perceived problems that evoked public demand for solutions, combined with diminished public understanding, from generation to generation, of what is and is not constitutional, and declining public devotion to the strict enforcement of the Constitution.

U.S. criminal statutes that exceeded the bounds asserted by the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798 did occasionally get adopted between 1798 and 1884, but only in minor ways. They were seldom enforced and were not subjected to the test of appellate review until 1906.

The next significant piece of legislation was the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890, which imposed criminal penalties on monopolistic combinations but was sustained by a 1908 precedent enforcing it not against industrialists but against a call for a boycott by a labor union.

The next significant precedent was in 1911, in which criminal penalties were sustained for violation of regulations by the Secretary of Agriculture, not for regulation of interstate commerce but of grazing rights on federal lands, even though exclusive jurisdiction over them had not been ceded to Congress by a state legislature under U.S. Const. Art. I Sec. 8 Cl. 17. This was also significant in that it breached the non-delegation doctrine that legislative powers could not be delegated to administrative agencies.

The Necessary and Proper Clause was extended by a key 1914 precedent that it may be necessary to regulate “purely” intrastate activities so that the regulation of interstate activities might be fully effectuated. When written, the commerce clause was only intended to authorize what might be required to make the effort to exercise a delegated power, not whatever might be convenient to attain an outcome for which the power might be exercised. This represented a major departure from the original understanding of what a delegated power is.

In 1917 the U.S. Supreme Court sustained a conviction under a 1910 statute forbidding transport of women across state lines for sexual purposes. This was the first exercise of a “police power” against immoral behavior, and it also introduced the notion that the U.S. government acquired criminal jurisdiction over offenses that involve crossing a state line.

In 1919, the Court sustained a conviction under a 1916 act, a precedent that Congress has criminal jurisdiction over fraud that influences or obstructs interstate commerce. In 1920, there was a precedent that extended “commerce” to include communications, including noncommercial communications, across state lines. In 1925 came a precedent that Congress can exercise a police power by regulating interstate commerce to the extent of forbidding and punishing the use of such commerce as an agency to promote immorality, dishonesty, or the spread of any evil or harm to the people of other states from the state of origin.

The key precedent came in 1942, when the conviction was sustained of a farmer for consuming his own grain, subject to price and production controls, as having a “substantial effect” on interstate commerce. Most federal criminal legislation since then cites this precedent for its authority, including federal criminal drug control statutes, a statute against murdering federal agents, gun control legislation, and more than 4000 other distinct penal provisions.

More federal criminal legislation gets introduced and adopted each session of Congress, with little effective opposition on constitutional grounds. Congress now sees no limit on its powers, other than a few rights expressly protected by the Constitution. From an understanding that “all powers not delegated are prohibited,” they have gone to a position that they have “all powers not expressly prohibited,” contrary to the Ninth and Tenth Amendments.

It should be noted, however, that none of the precedents or any legislation has actually sought to extend the definition of “commerce.” It is all based on ever-broader extensions of the necessary and proper clause, with only tenuous connections to “commerce” as such. From an original understanding of “necessary and proper” to include only the power to make a limited effort to whatever power might be convenient to obtain a desired result.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- Elliot, Jonathan. (1836). “The Debates in the Several Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution.” <http://www.constitution.org/elliott.htm>.
- Meese, Edwin III, chair. “The Federalization of Criminal Law.” Report of Task Force of the American Bar Association. http://www.nacdl.org/public.nsf/legislation/overcriminalization/\$FILE/fedcrimlaw2.pdf.
- Meese, Edwin III and Rhett DeHart. “How Washington Subverts Your Local Sheriff.” Policy Review, January-February 1996, Number 75; <http://www.policyreview.org/jan96/meese.html>.

Randolph, J. W., ed. "The Virginia Report." Richmond: 1850. Includes writings of Thomas Jefferson and James Madison, the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798 and 1799, and the Virginia Resolution of 1798. <http://www.constitution.org/rf/vr.htm>.

FEINER v. NEW YORK, 340 U.S. 315 (1951)

Irving Feiner was an undergraduate student at Syracuse University in 1949. As a member of the Young Progressive Party, he had participated in the Party's decision to invite John Rogge, a past Assistant Attorney General of the United States and a member of the American Progressive Party, to give a speech to be held in public school about what he, and the Progressives, thought was the unfair conviction of several young blacks in a New Jersey courtroom. The mayor was enraged about this invitation, as was the chapter of the Syracuse American Legion, and the mayor orchestrated a denial of the permit for Rogge to speak in the school auditorium.

Feiner, and his associates from the Progressives, arranged to have Rogge speak in a private hotel in Syracuse. To publicize this new venue and to advertise some of the themes they expected Rogge to emphasize, Feiner held a street corner rally in downtown Syracuse. Standing on a box and using a microphone, Feiner condemned the Mayor, the local political system, and the American Legion. Quoting from the subsequent trial court record (and Feiner disputed some of these contentions), the judge found that specifically Feiner said: "Mayor Costello is a champagne-sipping bum; he does not speak for the Negro people... The 15th Ward is run by corrupt politicians, and there are horse rooms [betting parlors] operating there.... President Truman is a bum.... Mayor O'Dwyer [of Syracuse] is a Nazi Gestapo.... The Negroes don't have equal rights; they should rise up in arms and fight for their rights." A crowd of approximately seventy-five to eighty (the police estimate accepted by the trial judge; twenty-five to thirty were estimated by the defense) gathered on the street corner to hear Feiner's comments. Some in the crowd voiced approval; other objected, some vociferously. Passersby on the sidewalk might also have had their paths partially blocked by the crowd. The police alleged that one spectator (never a witness during trial however) shouted to them: "If you don't get that son of a bitch off, I will go over and get him off there myself." The police judged that the situation was becoming dangerous and asked Feiner to stop speaking. When he ignored them, they asked him to step down from the box and informed him that he was under arrest for disorderly conduct.

Feiner's arrest was upheld in the local court, and he was sentenced to thirty days in jail. The case was appealed (unsuccessfully for Feiner) to two New York courts and finally to the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court in a six to three decision in 1951 also upheld the trial court's decision reasoning that police should have discretion to decide when a local rally was becoming a danger to the community. The Court stressed that Feiner was not arrested for the political content of his speech but for the effects his words were having on the crowd, and the Court thought that the police could legitimately conclude that a disturbance or breach of the peace was imminent. The dissenting justices, in addition to calling into question the "factual" record the trial judge had sustained, also questioned the premise of the majority Supreme Court decision. Specifically, they thought that the police, rather than ask Feiner to stop speaking in the face of a potentially hostile audience, should have asked—insisted that the crowd move aside and allow pedestrians to pass and should have informed any one in the crowd threatening the speaker that this kind of threat was unacceptable, and that if a threat was serious, it could lead to the spectator's arrest. In the dissenters' view, the majority deferred too much to both the police and trial judge version of the events, but even if the view of the police and judge was accepted for the sake of the argument, Feiner's right to speak nonetheless should have been upheld by the majority. The decision, the dissenters maintained, gave the police too much discretion to decide when a speaker's words were likely to lead to a breach of the peace and did not make the dissenters sufficiently responsible for those in a crowd threatening a speaker.

Feiner had been expelled from Syracuse shortly after the trial court's decision but was free on bail pending the final resolution of the case. After the Supreme Court's decision was announced, Feiner served his thirty days in jail.

The Feiner case has become known as the case that supported what has been called the "heckler's veto." The police could legitimately conclude—here by the crowd's demeanor in general, by the "get the son-of-a-bitch" comment in particular—that continued speech would result in a breach of peace.

And so the legal history ends, but the question that remains is "whatever happened to Irving Feiner," what happened to this idealistic student arrested because the courts decided to defer to local police assessments of the consequences of his words. Several years ago, with the help of my students, we tracked Irving Feiner to his home outside of New York City. It was wonderful to learn that he had had a relatively successful business career, ultimately was reaccepted into Syracuse and earned his college degree, and now stands as a kind of icon for “doing the right thing.” He has spoken at several law schools about the case and is an annual speaker in my undergraduate class at Rutgers. Still the fighter for principled issues, two pieces of Irving Feiner’s take on Feiner are important to include in this entry. First, he notes that his “take up arms” comments were referring to what he had experienced in post-war France, when thousands of citizens walked down the Champs-Elysee “arm in arm” to insist on greater social justice. Second, he thinks the recollection of calling Truman a “bum” was incorrect. Noting that he knows his own rhetorical style, he now invariably tells his audience that he would never have used the word “bum” but instead would have said something more colorful, something that included a reference to Truman’s relationship to his mother!

MILTON HEUMANN

References and Further Reading

- Barker, Lucius, and Twiley Barker, Jr. Civil Cases and Commentaries Liberties and The Constitution. 4th Ed. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1982, pp. 17–28.
- Cushman, Robert. Cases in Civil Liberties. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1968.
- Heumann, Milton. Interview with Irving Feiner. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University, March 2005.
- Konvitz, Milton. Bill of Rights Reader. 5th Ed. Revised, Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1973.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Feiner v. New York 340 U.S. 315 (1951)

See also Captive Audiences and Free Speech; Fighting Words and Free Speech; Heckler’s Veto Problem in Free Speech

FELON DISENFRANCHISEMENT

Felon disenfranchisement refers to the practice of restricting the voting rights of those convicted of felony-level crimes. The loss of voting rights is a Collateral Consequence of a felony conviction. Almost every state in the United States bars felons from voting for some amount of time. States vary, however, in the classes of felons disenfranchised and the duration of disenfranchisement.

In general, states follow one of four disenfranchisement schemes: (1) disenfranchising prisoners; (2) disenfranchising prisoners and parolees; (3) disenfranchising prisoners, parolees, and probationers; or (4) disenfranchising prisoners, parolees, and probationers, and former felons who have completed their sentences. In the first three categories, voting rights are usually restored automatically on completion of prison, parole, or probation. In the last category, however, persons wishing to vote must receive a pardon or clemency from the state. Some states make further distinctions by restoring rights automatically only to first-time offenders or to those convicted of nonviolent crimes, while requiring recidivists and violent offenders to receive a pardon or clemency. The United States is unusual in restricting the voting rights of non-incarcerated felons, because almost no other democratic nation does so.

Origins and Development of Felon Disenfranchisement Laws in the United States

The practice of limiting the citizenship rights of criminals has ancient origins, and some form of disenfranchisement has been practiced in the United States since colonial times. Earlier forms of disenfranchisement, however, were limited both in scope and duration, because laws typically barred from voting only those convicted of specific crimes and only for a limited time. It was not until the 1800s that states began disenfranchising entire classes of felons without regard to the underlying crime. By 1850, eleven states disenfranchised felons, all of which imposed indefinite disenfranchisement that typically required a gubernatorial or legislative pardon to regain voting rights. The 1860s and 1870s were a period of significant change, during which seventeen states added a felon disenfranchisement law.

Because this period coincided with the end of the Civil War and the passage of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, which expanded both definitions of citizenship and the right to vote, many assert that felon disenfranchisement laws are linked to racial conflict. This theory stresses that states used felon disenfranchisement laws as a tool to suppress the voting power of African Americans. Research has found a link between the proportion of African Americans in a state’s prison population and passage of a felon disenfranchisement law. Competing views, however, stress that the laws are race-neutral, and any disparate impact is an incidental effect.

Another period of marked change occurred nearly a century later. During the 1960s and 1970s, many states liberalized their disenfranchisement laws, typically by providing for automatic restoration of rights on completion of sentence. This trend toward expanding the voting rights of felons continued throughout the rest of the century, although a few states implemented new restrictions on felon voting rights.

Constitutional Challenges to Felon Disenfranchisement

Although voting attained and confirmed its status as a fundamental right through a series of decisions by the Warren Court, felon disenfranchisement laws are treated differently than other Voting Rights cases. Most challenges to the laws have been unsuccessful. In 1974, the Supreme Court upheld the practice of felon disenfranchisement. In Richardson v. Ramirez, the Court interpreted disenfranchisement as an “affirmative sanction” of Section Two of the Fourteenth Amendment, which reduced congressional representation of states disenfranchising males, unless that disenfranchisement was for “rebellion or other crimes.” Thus, while other restrictions on the right to vote are subjected to judicial “strict scrutiny” under which states must demonstrate a compelling state interest served through narrowly tailored means, felon disenfranchisement laws have not been held to this standard.

In addition to general challenges, others claim that felon disenfranchisement denies the right to vote based on race. In 1985, in Hunter v. Underwood, the Supreme Court invalidated an Alabama disenfranchisement law based on an impermissible intent to racially discriminate. Race-based challenges focus on the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, as well as the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Despite the disproportionate impact of felon disenfranchisement on African Americans, courts have rejected these claims in the absence of establishing a clear discriminatory intent.

The Impact of Felon Disenfranchisement Laws

Although the size of the disenfranchised population varies by state, the laws collectively have a large impact in the United States. In the 2000 presidential election, nearly 4.7 million people—about 2.3 percent of the voting-age population—were disenfranchised because of a felony conviction. Of this group, 1.8 million people were African Americans, representing more than seven percent of the African-American voting-age population.

The size of the disenfranchised population also holds the potential to change the outcomes of closely contested elections, particularly in states with laws that ban voting beyond completion of sentence. Because of the demographic characteristics of disenfranchised felons, these voting restrictions seem to have provided a small but consistent advantage to Republican candidates in several U.S. Senate and presidential elections.

Despite the prevalence of laws disenfranchising felons across the United States, the restrictions do not enjoy widespread popular support. One national poll indicated that eighty percent of Americans approve of permitting felons to vote after they have completed their sentences, whereas sixty percent approved of allowing felons on probation and parole to vote. Incarcerated felons, however, receive less support, with only one-third believing that prisoners should be permitted to vote.

Conclusion

Felon disenfranchisement laws restrict the voting rights of those convicted of felonies. Although the laws in their contemporary form did not take shape until the mid- to late-nineteenth century, nearly all states eventually adopted a law prohibiting certain classes of felons from voting. Although state laws vary, the laws collectively disenfranchise millions and likely hold the power to change elections. Despite the breadth of felon disenfranchisement laws and their disproportionate impact on African Americans, courts have generally upheld their constitutionality as a restriction on the right to vote.

ANGELA BEHRENS and CHRISTOPHER UGGEN

References and Further Reading

- Allard, Patricia, and Marc Mauer. Regaining the Vote: An Assessment of Activity Relating to Felon Disenfranchisement Laws. Washington, D.C.: The Sentencing Project, 1999.
- Behrens, Angela, Christopher Uggen, and Jeff Manza. “Ballot Manipulation and the ‘Menace of Negro Domination’: Racial Threat and Felon Disenfranchisement in United States, 1850-2002.” American Journal of Sociology 109 (2003): 3:559–605.
- Chin, Gabriel J., Rehabilitating Unconstitutional Statutes: An Analysis of Cotton v. Fordice, 157 F.3d 388 (5th Cir. 1998), University of Cincinnati Law Review 71 (2002): 2:421–455.
- Clegg, Roger, Who Should Vote? Texas Review of Law and Politics 6 (2001): 1:159–178.
- Demleitner, Nora V., Continuing Payment on One’s Debt to Society: The German Model of Felon Disenfranchisement as an Alternative, Minnesota Law Review 84 (2000): 4:753–804.
- Ewald, Alec C., ‘Civil Death’: The Ideological Paradox of Criminal Disenfranchisement Law in the United States, University of Wisconsin Law Review 2002 (2002):5:1045–1137.
- Fellner, Jamie, and Marc Mauer. Losing the Vote: The Impact of Felony Disenfranchisement Laws in the United - States*. Washington, D.C.: Human Rights Watch and The Sentencing Project, 1998.

- Fletcher, George, Disenfranchisement as Punishment: Reflections on Racial Uses of Infamia, UCLA Law Review 46 (1999): 6:1895–1908.
- Hench, Virginia, The Death of Voting Rights: The Legal Disenfranchisement of Minority Voters, Case Western Law Review 48 (1998): 4:727–798.
- Itzkowitz, Howard, and Lauren Oldak, Restoring the Ex-Offender's Right to Vote: Background and Developments, American Criminal Law Review 11 (1973): 3:721–770.
- Keyssar, Alexander. The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States. New York: Basic Books, 2000.
- Manza, Jeff, Clem Brooks, and Christopher Uggen. “Civil Death or Civil Rights? Public Attitudes Toward Felon Disenfranchisement in the United States.” Public Opinion Quarterly 68 (forthcoming 2004).
- Shapiro, Andrew, Challenging Criminal Disenfranchisement under the Voting Rights Act: A New Strategy, Yale Law Journal 103 (1993): 2:537–566.
- Uggen, Christopher, and Jeff Manza. “Democratic Contraction? The Political Consequences of Felon Disenfranchisement in the United States.” American Sociological Review 67 (2002): 6:777–803.
- United States Department of Justice, Office of the Pardon Attorney. Civil Disabilities of Convicted Felons: A State-by-State Survey. Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Hunter v. Underwood*, 471 U.S. 222 (1985)
Richardson v. Ramirez, 418 U.S. 533 (1974)
 Voting Rights Act of 1965, Act of Aug. 6, 1965, 79 Stat. 437, codified at 42 U.S.C. § 1973

See also Collateral Consequences; Fourteenth Amendment; Voting Rights; Voting Rights Act of 1965; Warren Court

FIALLO v. BELL, 430 U.S. 787 (1977)

Under U.S. immigration law, biological mothers who are citizens or lawful permanent residents may petition their nonmarital offspring to enter the country; similarly, nonmarital children may petition their biological mothers. Biological fathers do not enjoy the same privileges with respect to their nonmarital children. In Fiallo, three sets of fathers and unwed children challenged the law as unconstitutional. The Court ruled in the government's favor, holding that Congress's plenary power over the admission of non-citizens precluded the judiciary from second-guessing the legislature's reasons for enacting the law. Citing precedent, the Court noted that immigration laws are closely connected with the political branches' conduct of foreign affairs. Writing for the majority, Justice Powell opined that Congress enacts many laws that draw distinctions between U.S. citizen and noncitizen—based on age, for example—that, while they may seem arbitrary, are rational. Specifically, he surmised that Congress might have perceived family ties between the biological father and nonmarital child to be less close than those between mother and child. Likewise, Congress may have been concerned about the difficulty in proving paternity in many cases. Powell rejected the argument that the Court more closely scrutinize this law, finding that the effects on U.S. citizens and lawful permanent residents, the gender and illegitimacy discrimination alleged, and the absence of a national security concern did not warrant less deferential judicial review. Although criticized for its deference to Congress, Fiallo v. Bell has long been recognized as a key case to support the government's plenary power over immigration.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

- Satinoff, Debra L., Sex-Based Discrimination in U.S. Immigration Law: The High Court's Lost Opportunity to Bridge the Gap Between What We Say and What We Do, American University Law Review 47 (1998): 1353–1392.

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Citizenship; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Illegitimacy and Immigration; Sex and Immigration

FIELD, STEPHEN J. (1816–1899)

One of the most colorful individuals to ever serve on the Supreme Court, Stephen J. Field led major shift in constitutional jurisprudence. He pioneered a broad reading of the Fourteenth Amendment in an effort to define and preserve liberty, and especially economic freedom, by restraining the power of government.

Field was born in Haddam, Connecticut, the sixth child of a Congregationalist minister. Although Field never shared his father's religious commitment, a strong sense of moral certitude permeated his judicial opinions. Reared in Connecticut, Field spent two and a half years in present-day Turkey before beginning study at Williams College. Field graduated first in his class at Williams in 1837. Thereafter, he moved to New York City to study law with his brother, David Dudley Field, a prominent attorney and legal reformer. Field practiced law with his brother in New York City until 1848. A year later he moved to California, where gold had been recently discovered. Field, however, had no intention of prospecting for gold. Rather, he saw the gold rush as a chance to begin a law practice. After brief service as alcalde (an office combining functions of mayor and judge) of Marysville and as a member of the California legislature, Field unsuccessfully sought election to the U.S. Senate. He then developed a lucrative private practice of law in Marysville until he was elected as a Democrat to the California Supreme Court in 1857. The Court heard a large number of disputes over land ownership, and Field helped to develop a consistent body of law in this area. On the outbreak of the Civil War, Field was a Union loyalist.

In 1863, Congress revamped the structure of the federal judiciary and created a new spot on the U.S. Supreme Court for a justice who would have responsibility for the isolated Pacific Coast federal judicial circuit. President Abraham Lincoln was anxious to name a Californian for political and geographical reasons, and he selected Field in part to strengthen California's attachment to the Union. Easily confirmed by the Senate, Field served as a justice for thirty-four years and ranks second among justices for longevity of service.

Although Field generally voted to uphold the actions of the Lincoln administration in the Civil War, he soon demonstrated a libertarian bent. Field joined the opinion in Ex Parte Milligan (1866), which invalidated the trial of civilians by the military when civil courts were open. Writing for the Court, Field struck down Civil War loyalty oaths in Cummings v. Missouri (1867) and Ex Parte Garland (1867). He reasoned that such oaths, designed to keep ex-Confederates out of public offices and certain professions, constituted unconstitutional bills of attainder and ex post facto laws. Field also consistently voted to curtail the confiscation of property owned by Confederate supporters. He authored a number of opinions that held particular confiscations under the Second Confiscation Act to be invalid.

Anti-Chinese sentiments on the West Coast produced numerous laws discriminating against Chinese immigrants. Although not fully consistent in cases involving Chinese immigrants, Field was often sympathetic to their plight. In Ah Kow v. Nunan (1879), decided by Field on the federal circuit bench, he invalidated the San Francisco queue ordinance intended to harass the Chinese as discriminatory class legislation barred by the Fourteenth Amendment.

Field is best known for a series of dissenting opinions in which he asserted that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment placed substantive, as well as procedural, checks on state authority. In the Slaughterhouse Cases (1873), for example, Field argued in dissent that the Amendment protected the rights of persons to engage in lawful occupations. Field, again in dissent, amplified his views in Munn v. Illinois (1877), a case involving state-imposed rate regulation. He vigorously assailed the notion that government could control the right of owners to charge for the use of their property absent special circumstances. Field also broadly defined liberty as more than freedom from restraint, and as encompassing the right to pursue ordinary trades. During the 1880s Field's views gradually gained ascendancy on the Supreme Court.

Property and liberty were closely linked in Field's jurisprudence. He was primarily concerned to safeguard economic liberties of individuals against state-imposed regulations. In his view, governmental power could not be legitimately used to interfere in the market or redistribute wealth. Voting with the majority in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. (1895) to invalidate the 1894 income tax, Field expressed concern that the levy constituted class legislation, because it imposed burdens based on wealth. In Allgeyer v. Louisiana (1897), decided at the end of Field's tenure on the bench, the Court built on his theory that the due process clause Fourteenth Amendment protected the right to pursue lawful callings to recognize the right to make contracts without unreasonable state interference.

Field, however, was never a doctrinaire laissez-fairest or a one-sided champion of business interests. He recognized that states had the authority under the police power to protect the health and safety of their residents. In Missouri Pacific Railway Company v. Humes (1885), for instance, he spoke for the Court in an opinion upholding state railroad fencing laws as a means to prevent accidents. Similarly, Field was often supportive of claims of injured industrial workers. He validated state laws that abrogated the fellow-servant rule for railroad employees in Missouri Pacific Railway Company v. Mackey (1888). Field also believed that states possessed wide power to promote public morals. He readily sustained laws regulating the sale of alcoholic beverages and controlling lotteries. Writing for the Court in Davis v. Beason (1890), he affirmed a territorial law that denied suffrage to those who belonged to a group advocating polygamy and concluded that the First Amendment protected religious beliefs but not conduct.

Field's emphasis on the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as a vehicle to protect property rights and limit government influenced Supreme Court decisions for decades after his retirement. In 1937, however, the Court abandoned the due process review of economic legislation and fashioned a dichotomy between property rights and other personal liberties. Nonetheless, the justices continue to invoke substantive due process to safeguard noneconomic interests, a development that partially reflects Field's jurisprudence.

JAMES W. ELY, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Ely, James W., Jr. The Chief Justiceship of Melville W. Fuller, 1888–1910. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.
- Field, Stephen J. Personal Reminiscences of Early Days in California. 1877 Reprint, New York: Da Capo Press, 1968.
- Kens, Paul. Justice Stephen Field: Shaping Liberty from the Gold Rush to the Gilded Age. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1997.
- McCurdy, Charles W. “Justice Field and the Jurisprudence of Government-Business Relations: Some Parameters of Laissez-Faire Constitutionalism.” Journal of American History 61 (1975): 970–1005.
- Swisher, Carl Brent. Stephen J. Field: Craftsman of the Law. Washington: Brookings Institute, 1930. Reprint: Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ah Kow v. Nunan*, 12 F. Cases 252 (C.C.C. Cal. 1879)
- Allgeyer v. Louisiana*, 165 U.S. 578 (1897)
- Cummings v. Missouri*, 71 U.S. 277 (1867)
- Davis v. Beason*, 133 U.S. 333 (1890)
- Garland, Ex Parte*, 71 U.S. 333 (1867)
- Milligan, Ex Parte*, 71 U.S. 2 (1866)
- Missouri Pacific Railway Company v. Humes*, 115 U.S. 512 (1885)
- Missouri Pacific Railway Company v. Mackey*, 127 U.S. 205 (1888)
- Munn v. Illinois*, 94 U.S. 113 (1877)
- Pollock v. Farmers’ Loan and Trust Co.*, 157 U.S. 429 (1895)
- Slaughterhouse Cases*, 83 U.S. 36 (1873)

FIGHTING WORDS AND FREE SPEECH

The Supreme Court has held that some speech is not deserving of First Amendment protection—including obscenity, defamation, and fighting words—so that government can regulate it. The Court first articulated the fighting words doctrine in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), upholding a statute that prohibited the use of “offensive, derisive or annoying” language. The Chaplinsky decision defined fighting words as “those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace,” and concluded that statements such as those uttered by Chaplinsky—he called a city marshal a “damned racketeer” and “a damned Fascist”—were of so little value that government could ban them to preserve order and morality. Although the Court continues to reaffirm the fighting words doctrine, it has not upheld any convictions for using fighting words since Chaplinsky. In subsequent cases, the Court has either held that the speech in question does not meet the definition of fighting words or concluded that the statute at issue could be construed to be overbroad or underinclusive.

The Court has subsequently narrowed the definition of fighting words to those that are likely to provoke immediate retaliatory violence. In Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949), the Court clarified that speech does not lose First Amendment protection merely because it causes anger. Terminiello’s speech enraged a large audience by criticizing various political and racial groups, but the Court held that it was protected unless it was “shown likely to produce a clear and present danger of a serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance, or unrest.” Similarly, in Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576 (1969), the Court held that the mere offensiveness of speech does not strip it of constitutional protection. Street was convicted of violating a New York state flag desecration statute because, in response to hearing about the murder of civil rights leader James Meredith, he burnt an American flag and said “If they let that happen to Meredith, we don’t need an American flag.” The Court reversed Street’s conviction because, although contemptuous, his speech was not “so inherently inflammatory as to come within that small class of ‘fighting words’ which are ‘likely to provoke the average person to retaliation, and thereby cause a breach of the peace.’”

The Court further narrowed the definition of fighting words and expanded protection for offensive speech in Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971). Cohen, a Vietnam War protester, was convicted of disturbing the peace for wearing a jacket bearing the words “Fuck the Draft.” The Court held that the words on Cohen’s jacket were not fighting words, because they were not directed at an individual and so were not “personally abusive epithets which, when addressed to the ordinary citizen, are, as a matter of common knowledge, inherently likely to provoke violent reaction.” The Court also recognized that both the emotive and the cognitive impact of Cohen’s expression were deserving of First Amendment protection.

In more recent years, the Court has overturned convictions for using fighting words on the grounds that the statutes prohibiting them were constitutionally overbroad. In Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972), the Court cautioned that states must narrowly regulate fighting words so as not to chill protected speech. The Gooding court struck down a Georgia statute prohibiting “opprobrious words or abusive language, tending to cause a breach of the peace” because it concluded that the law had been broadly construed to proscribe speech that would not cause an immediate violent response. Similarly, in Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 415 U.S. 130 (1974), the Court struck down an ordinance that made it illegal for “any person wantonly to curse or revile or to use obscene or opprobrious language toward or with reference to any member of the city police while in the actual performance of his duty,” concluding that the statute could be construed to prohibit offensive, but constitutionally protected, speech. Indeed, in City of Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451 (1987), the Court reasoned that the fighting words doctrine “might require a narrower application in cases involving words addressed to a police officer, because ‘a properly trained officer may reasonably be expected to exercise a higher degree of restraint than the average citizen, and thus be less likely to respond belligerently to fighting words.’”

In its most recent fighting words case, the Court recognized for the first time that fighting words are not “entirely invisible to the Constitution.” In R.A. V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992), the Court struck down as underinclusive a St. Paul, Minnesota, ordinance prohibiting the display of a symbol one has reason to know “arouses anger, alarm or resentment in others on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender.” The defendants were charged with burning a cross on an African-American family’s lawn. Justice Scalia’s majority opinion reasoned that government regulation of fighting words cannot be based on hostility or favoritism toward any constitutionally protected message those words contain. Accordingly, even though the ordinance regulated only unprotected speech, it violated the First Amendment for the city to draw a content-based distinction between subsets of fighting words. Four concurring justices, disagreeing with the majority rationale, argued that the ordinance was constitutionally overbroad, because it prohibited expression that “causes only hurt feelings, offense, or resentment.”

DENISE C. MORGAN

References and Further Reading

- Greenwalt, Kent. Fighting Words: Individuals, Communities, and Liberties of Speech. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995.
- Hill Collins, Patricia. Fighting Words: Black Women and the Search for Justice. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1998.
- Note, The Demise Of The Chaplinsky Fighting Words Doctrine: An Argument For Its Interment, Harvard Law Review 106 (1993): 5:1129–1146.

FIRST AMENDMENT AND PACS

The Political Action Committee, or PAC, is a type of “separate segregated fund” that allows corporations and business entities, long barred from giving directly to candidates for office, to make political contributions. Although some labor organizations and unions had been using PACs before 1971, their legality was questionable. The Federal Election Campaign Act, known as FECA, of that year established rules legalizing and governing PACs. Since that time, PACs have proliferated and have become a primary and, at times, controversial vehicle for candidate financing.

As Congress has progressively strengthened campaign finance regulations over time, PACs have been at the center of the debate over the legality of restricting political giving in light of the Constitutional protection of free speech. Opponents of regulation argue that political contributions amount to political speech and, therefore, merit First Amendment protection from Congressional infringement. Proponents of reform, by contrast, suggest that large campaign contributions such as those from PACs exert undue influence on the political process, whereas regulation of such contributions does not necessarily constitute a check on free speech.

While recognizing that campaign contributions were equivalent to speech and that statutes limiting them would have to withstand strict scrutiny, the Supreme Court affirmed the constitutionality of certain restrictions on political giving in the seminal case Buckley v. Valeo (1976). However, the Court later struck down as unconstitutional a provision of FECA which made it illegal for PACs to spend more than $1,000 in “independent expenditures” in Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee (1985). The Supreme Court recognized that speech does not lose constitutional protection merely because it originates from a corporation or union. However, the most recent major campaign finance reform bill, the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (2002), has placed additional restrictions on PAC giving. The legislation, which was tested before the Supreme Court in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (2003), affects inter alia caps on PAC giving, PAC coordination with candidate committees, and, of course, the main object of the legislation, soft money.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Lowenstein, Daniel H., and Richard L. Hasen, eds. Election Law: Cases and Materials. 3rd Ed. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2004, pp. 717–750.
- Morgan, Anne M. (Note), Election Law: Limitations on Independent PACs Held Unconstitutional, Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee, 105 S. Ct. 1459 (1985), Marquette Law Review 69 1985–1986:143.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)
Federal Election Commission v. National Political Action Committee, 470 U.S. 480 (1985)
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 540 U.S. 93 (2003)

FISHER v. UNITED STATES, 425 U.S. 391 (1976)

Taxpayers being investigated by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) provided workpapers prepared by their accountant to their attorney, and the IRS then served a summons on the attorney to obtain the personal records of the clients. While the attorney could not assert the Fifth Amendment Self-Incrimination Privilege on behalf of the client, the Supreme Court found that if the documents would have been protected by the Fifth Amendment in the hands of the taxpayers, then the attorney–client privilege would protect them when the attorney holds the records.

The Court rejected the argument that the Fifth Amendment protects the contents of voluntarily produced documents, largely overturning its 1886 holding in Boyd v. United States. The Court changed the Fifth Amendment analysis by holding that the Self-Incrimination Privilege does apply to an individual's act of production in response to a subpoena in a grand jury investigation, which can communicate information about the existence, possession, and authenticity of the records.

A recipient of a grand jury subpoena or an IRS summons may not resist production in every case, however, if the government can show that it will not gain any information from the individual's act of production because the existence, possession, and authenticity of the records is a foregone conclusion. The act of production issue is highly fact-specific and depends on the types of records sought and the scope of the government's knowledge about them. Fisher makes clear that the content of the records is not protected by the Self-Incrimination Privilege.

PETER J. HENNING

References and Further Reading

Allen, Ronald J., and M. Kristin Mace, The Self-Incrimination Clause Explained and Its Future Predicted, Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology 94 (2004): 2:243–293.
 LaFare, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 2nd Ed. Vol. 3, St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 1999, pp. 248–254.
 Reitz, Kevin J., Clients, Lawyers and the Fifth Amendment: The Need for a Projected Privilege, Duke Law Journal 41 (1991): 3:572–660.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)

See also Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886); Grand Jury Investigation and Indictment; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

FLAG BURNING

The American flag is a powerful symbol that evokes strong emotions in many citizens. As a result, few methods of political protest are as offensive—or as potentially effective at attracting public attention—as flag burning. Although incidents of flag burning in the United States are relatively rare, law-makers have enacted flag-desecration statutes and even proposed a federal constitutional amendment that would prohibit flag burning. Supporters of these efforts believe they are necessary to preserve the flag as a cherished emblem of national unity. Opponents argue that flag burning constitutes a means of expressing dissent that is, and must remain, fully protected by the First Amendment. In a pair of cases decided in 1989 and 1990, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the First Amendment protects flag burning as a type of Symbolic Speech. Since then, proposals for a flag-desecration amendment to the Constitution have been introduced frequently in Congress, but so far none has gathered the two-thirds support in the Senate needed for passage.

Is Flag Burning “Speech”?

The First Amendment ensures the right to free speech; it does not prohibit the government from regulating behavior. Flag burning certainly communicates a message, but it does so through an act and without the necessity of words. Could the government therefore treat flag burning as illegal conduct, rather than as protected expression?

The Supreme Court dodged the question when it first emerged in the 1960s in Street v. New York (1969). In that case, decorated war veteran Sydney Street burned a flag on a Brooklyn street corner after learning that civil rights activist James Meredith had been shot by a sniper in Mississippi. Street told the gathered crowd, “We don’t need no damn flag,” and explained to a police officer that “If they let that happen to Meredith we don’t need an American flag.” Street was convicted under a New York statute that criminalized flag desecration, as well as the expression of contemptuous words about the flag.

Although the Supreme Court overturned Street's conviction on First Amendment grounds, the decision rested on the conclusion that Street had been punished for his offensive language, rather than for his act of flag burning.

In related contexts, however, the Court had already recognized that expressive conduct could qualify as speech entitled to a measure of First Amendment protection. For example, in Stromberg v. California (1931), the Court overturned a woman's conviction under a California law that prohibited public use or display of a red flag "as a sign, symbol or emblem of opposition to organized government," noting that the ban interfered with free political discussion. And in a famous case involving a war protestor who burned his draft card, United States v. O'Brien (1968), the Court outlined a test for determining when government regulation is justified in symbolic speech cases. According to that test, the First Amendment requires that government regulation of symbolic speech be content neutral and narrowly tailored to achieve a valid government interest that is unrelated to the suppression of expression.

Does all behavior that communicates an idea, therefore, constitute speech protected by the First Amendment? Not necessarily. According to the Court in Spence v. Washington (1974), expressive conduct will only qualify as symbolic speech if an "intent to convey a particular message was present, and...the likelihood was great that the message would be understood by those who viewed it."

Texas v. Johnson

The Supreme Court finally addressed the flag-burning issue in Texas v. Johnson (1989), holding by a five-to-four vote that Gregory Johnson's conviction under a Texas flag desecration statute violated the First Amendment. Johnson had burned an American flag at the 1984 Republican National Convention in Dallas as part of a public protest against Reagan Administration policies and had been tried, convicted, and sentenced to one year in jail and a $2,000 fine. The statute prohibited any physical mistreatment of the flag "that the actor knows will seriously offend one or more persons likely to observe or discover his action."

Writing for the majority, Justice William Brennan began by confirming that Johnson's act qualified as symbolic speech under the First Amendment, noting that flag burning in this context clearly conveyed a particular political message. Justice Brennan then looked to see whether the state could justify its prohibition against flag burning in a content-neutral way.

The state made two arguments to support Johnson's conviction: first, that it was necessary to avert a breach of the peace; and second, that it preserved the flag's unique symbolic value.

With respect to the first argument, Justice Brennan noted that although several onlookers had been offended by Johnson's conduct, no breach of the peace had occurred or had been threatened. According to the Court, the state may not prohibit offensive speech by merely asserting that such speech presents a risk of violence. Nor could the state say that Johnson's conduct fell within the First Amendment exception for Fighting Words, because no bystander could have reasonably regarded Johnson's act as "a direct personal insult or an invitation to exchange fisticuffs."

As for the asserted state interest in safeguarding the flag's value as a national symbol, Justice Brennan concluded that this interest was not content neutral. The Texas flag desecration statute contained an exception that allowed worn, dirty, or torn flags to be burned as a proper method of disposal. Therefore, while the statute allowed respectful, "patriotic" flag burning, it prohibited flag burning as an expression of political protest. "If there is a bedrock principle underlying the First Amendment," Justice Brennan wrote, "it is that the Government may not prohibit the expression of an idea simply because society finds the idea itself offensive or disagreeable."

The Aftermath

The Court's decision in Texas v. Johnson touched off what one newspaper termed "a firestorm of indignation" that ultimately resulted in Congressional passage of the federal Flag Protection Act of 1989. The law attempted to prohibit flag desecration in a content-neutral manner by banning all physical harm to the flag (except that caused by disposing of old or soiled flags) regardless of the conduct's effect on bystanders. Nevertheless, the Court in United States v. Eichman (1990) struck down the law in a five-to-four decision. Again writing for the majority, Justice Brennan concluded that the federal law violated the First Amendment because it proscribed expression "out of concern for its likely communicative impact." In other words, the statute was content based because it criminalized only those acts that demonstrated disrespect for the flag. "Punishing desecration of the flag dilutes the very freedom that makes this emblem so revered, and worth revering," he wrote. Justice John Paul Stevens authored the dissent, in which he argued that the statute was content neutral, because it prohibited all flag desecration no matter what the actor's intended message.

Since the Court's decision in Eichman, the House of Representatives approved a Constitutional amendment in 1995, 1997, 1999, 2001, and 2003 that would have allowed Congress or the states to criminalize "physical desecration of the flag." To date, this proposed amendment has always been defeated in the Senate. Supporters of the amendment argue that the flag is a unique national symbol that deserves special protection against mistreatment or disrespect. Flag burning, according to this view, adds nothing meaningful to the marketplace of ideas and, therefore, has no value as speech. Critics respond that a nation founded on principles of liberty must safeguard its citizens' right to express dissent—even when that expression takes a form that the majority finds offensive. Critics also object to the possible wide array of legislative interpretations under the amendment regarding what constitutes either "desecration" or "the flag."

NICOLE B. CÁSAREZ

References and Further Reading

- Goldstein, Robert Justin. Flag Burning and Free Speech: The Case of Texas v. Johnson. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2000.
- Greenawalt, Kent. O'er the Land of the Free: Flag Burning as Speech, UCLA Law Review 37 (1990): 925–947.
- Smolla, Rodney A. Free Speech in an Open Society. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., 1992.
- Van Alstyne, William W. Freedom of speech and the flag anti-desecration amendment: antinomies of constitutional choice, in Rodgers, Raymond S., ed. Free Speech Yearbook, Vol. 29. Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1991, pp. 96–105.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Spence v. Washington*, 418 U.S. 405 (1974)
- Street v. New York*, 394 U.S. 576 (1969)
- Stromberg v. California*, 283 U.S. 359 (1931)
- Texas v. Johnson*, 491 U.S. 397 (1989)
- United States v. Eichman*, 496 U.S. 310 (1990)
- United States v. O'Brien*, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

See also Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Draft Card Burning; Fighting Words and Free Speech; Symbolic Speech

FLAG SALUTE CASES

In 1935, Jehovah's Witnesses in Germany refused to salute the Nazi flag. Ultimately, more than 10,000 German Jehovah's Witnesses would be sent to concentration camps for their affront to Nazi authorities. In 1935, the leader of the Jehovah's Witnesses in America declared that followers of the faith "do not 'Heil Hitler' nor any other creature." He found scriptural support for this position by arguing that saluting the flag was a form of idolatry. After this speech, American Jehovah's Witnesses refused to take part in flag saluting ceremonies. After this change in their religious practice, Jehovah's Witnesses began to face disciplinary actions in public schools across America. In Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940), the Court upheld the school district's attempt to force students to salute the flag. In West Virginia State Board of Education, v. Barnette (1943) the court reversed course, siding with the claims of religious freedom made by the Jehovah's Witnesses.

Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940)

This case resulted from the refusal of twelve-year-old Lillian Gobitis and her ten-year-old brother William to say the pledge of allegiance in the public schools of Minersville, Pennsylvania. The father of these children, Walter Gobitis, had grown up in Minersville and was raised in a Roman Catholic family and of course saluted the flag as a child. In 1931, Gobitis became a Jehovah's Witness, a faith that regularly denounced the Catholic Church and the Pope. At the time Lillian was eight and William was six. The Gobitis children continued to salute the flag until November 1935, when members of their faith across the nation ceased to salute the flag.

In a more cosmopolitan community, the refusal of the Gobitis children to salute the flag might have gone unnoticed. But, neither Gobitis nor his faith was popular in Minersville, where eighty percent of the population was Roman Catholic. Rather than ignoring what was neither an act of defiance nor a disruption in the schools, the school board adopted a regulation allowing for the expulsion of any students who would not salute the flag. Gobitis then sent his children to a private Jehovah's Witness school.

Eighteen months later, Gobitis sued the school district. The case was first heard by Judge Albert B. Maris, a recent Roosevelt appointee to the federal court. As a Quaker, Maris was probably more sympathetic to the Jehovah's Witnesses than most Americans. Although he had a distinguished military record during World War I, as a member of a faith long persecuted for its pacifism, Maris, doubtless understood the nature of prejudice and religious persecution that the Jehovah's Witnesses faced.

During the trial, the school superintendent was openly hostile toward the Gobitis children and the Jehovah's Witnesses, asserting that the children were “indoctrinated,” thereby implying that their actions were not based on sincerely held religious beliefs. Judge Maris rejected Roudabush’s contentions. Judge Maris asserted that “To permit public officers to determine whether the views of individuals sincerely held and their acts sincerely undertaken on religious grounds are in fact based on convictions religious in character would sound the death knell of religious liberty.” Maris refused to sustain “such a pernicious and alien doctrine” and reminded the school officials that Pennsylvania itself had been founded “as a haven for all those persecuted for conscience’ sake.” Judge Maris found that “although undoubtedly adopted from patriotic motives,” the flag salute requirement “appears to have become in this case a means for the persecution of children for conscience’ sake.” He noted that “religious intolerance is again rearing its ugly head in other parts of the world” and thus it was of “utmost importance that the liberties guaranteed to our citizens by the fundamental law be preserved from all encroachment.” While not central to his decision, Maris’s point placed the controversy over the Jehovah’s Witnesses in the context of the rise of Nazism, preparation for World War II, and eventually American involvement in the War. In part the cases involving the Jehovah’s Witnesses raised important questions about how much dissent a democracy can allow at a time of crisis and international conflict. Maris took the position that such dissent was vital to the democracy and part of its ultimate strength. The Minersville School Board took the position that national unity required submission to the will of the majority, especially on issues involving outward displays of patriotism. This argument would reemerge among before the Supreme Court in both Gobitis and Barnette.

Having concluded that the flag salute requirement was motivated by a desire to provide “a means for the persecution of children for conscience’ sake,” Maris ordered the children readmitted to the public schools, and a unanimous panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals affirmed this decision. Minersville school officials did not plan to appeal the Supreme Court, but, patriotic groups, including the American Legion, stepped in to help finance the case. Before the Supreme Court, Harvard Law School Professor George K. Gardner argued Gobitis’s case on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union.

In an eight to one decision, the Supreme Court reversed the two lower court decisions and upheld the right of the Minersville School District to require that students salute the flag. Writing for the Court was Justice Felix Frankfurter, who conceded that “the affirmative pursuit of one’s convictions about the ultimate mystery of the universe and man’s relation to it is placed beyond the reach of law. Government may not interfere with organized or individual expression of belief or disbelief.” However, Frankfurter noted that there were no absolute guarantees of religious freedom. He found that the task of the Court was to “reconcile two rights in order to prevent either from destroying the other.” He found that “conscientious scruples have not, in the course of the long struggle for religious toleration, relieved the individual from obedience to a general law not aimed at the promotion or restriction of religious beliefs. The mere possession of religious convictions that contradict the relevant concerns of a political society does not relieve the citizen from a discharge of political responsibilities.” Put simply, Frankfurter was arguing that the First Amendment’s guarantee of religious freedom only extended to protection from laws that were overtly religious in nature. Frankfurter rejected the findings of the lower court that the enforcement of the pledge was overt religious discrimination.

In a hyperbolic analogy, Frankfurter compared the dilemma of the Jehovah’s Witnesses to that of Lincoln’s query during the Civil War: “Must a government of necessity be too strong for the liberties of its people, or too weak to maintain its own existence?” Frankfurter argued that the flag was a “symbol of national unity, transcending all internal differences” and as such he implied that failure to salute it somehow threatened the existence of the nation.

He further argued that the states should be given great latitude in determining how best to instill patriotism in children. He thought judicial review was “a limitation on popular government” that should be used sparingly. Thus, he urged that issues of liberty be fought out in the state legislatures and “in the forum of public opinion” to “vindicate the self-confidence of a free people.”

Justice Harlan Fiske Stone dissented, asserting that “by this law the state seeks to coerce these children to express a sentiment that, as they interpret it, they do not entertain, and which violates their deepest religious convictions.” Stone dismissed Frankfurter’s appeals to patriotism and his unrealistic suggestion that the issue be decided “in the forum of public opinion” by appeals to the wisdom of the legislature. Stone pointed out that “History teaches us that there have been but few infringements of personal liberty by the state which have not been justified, as they are here, in the name of righteousness and the public good, and few which have not been directed, as they are now, at politically helpless minorities.” Finally, Stone argued that the Constitution was more than just an outline for majoritarian government, it was “also an expression of faith and a command that freedom of mind and spirit must be preserved, which government must obey, if it is to adhere to that justice and moderation without which no free government can exist.”

Stone understood the value of instilling patriotism in future citizens. He declared that the state might “require teaching by instruction and study of all in our history and in the structure and organization of our government, including the guarantee of civil liberty, which tend to inspire patriotism and love of country.” But, forcing children to violate their religious precepts was, in Stone’s mind, not the way to teach patriotic values. He thought it far better that the schools find “some sensible adjustment of school discipline in order that the religious convictions of these children may be spared” than to approve “legislation which operates to repress the religious freedom of small minorities....”

The Gobitis decision helped unleash a wave of political, legal, and physical attacks on Jehovah’s Witnesses. Immediately after the decision, there were hundreds of assaults on Jehovah’s Witnesses and their property. Throughout the nation, Jehovah’s Witnesses were beaten, mobbed, and kidnapped. Their attackers often included police officials. In Odessa, Texas, for example, seventy Jehovah’s Witnesses were arrested for their own “protection,” held without charges when they refused to salute the flag, and then released to a mob of more than 1,000 people who chased them for five miles, throwing stones at them. In Wyoming some Jehovah’s Witnesses were tarred and feathered, in Arkansas some were shot, and in Nebraska one Jehovah’s Witness was castrated. In Richwood, West Virginia, the police arrested a group of Jehovah’s Witnesses who sought police protection, forced them to drink large amounts of castor oil, tied them up, and paraded them through the town. By 1943 more than 2,000 Jehovah’s Witnesses had been expelled from schools in all forty-eight states. This was the nationwide answer to Justice Frankfurter’s unrealistic suggestion that the Jehovah’s Witnesses appeal to the state legislatures for relief.

The nation’s intellectual community responded to Gobitis in quite a different way. Overwhelmingly law review articles condemned the decision. The law reviews at Catholic universities, such as Fordham, Georgetown, and Notre Dame, were unanimous in their opposition to Gobitis, even though the Jehovah’s Witnesses had traditionally vilified the Roman Catholic Church. But, the issue here was civil liberties, not theology, as Catholic scholars clearly understood.

Members of the Supreme Court soon came to doubt the wisdom of Gobitis. In another case involving the Jehovah’s Witnesses, Jones v. Opelika (1942), three dissenting justices who had voted with the majority in Gobitis declared they now believe it was “wrongly decided” and that “the historic Bill of Rights has a high responsibility to accommodate itself to the religious views of minorities however unpopular and unorthodox those views may be.”

Barnette v. West Virginia State Board of Education

In January 1942, the West Virginia state school board adopted a strict flag salute requirement. The board’s resolution, which had the authority of a statute, began with a long preamble that quoted at length portions of Frankfurter’s Gobitis opinion. The resolution ended by declaring “that refusal to salute the Flag [shall] be regarded as an act of insubordination, and shall be dealt with accordingly.” Shortly after the adoption of this resolution, school officials in Charleston expelled a number of Jehovah’s Witnesses, including the children of Walter Barnette.

In August 1942, attorneys for Barnette and other Jehovah’s Witnesses asked the District Court to convene a three-judge panel to permanently enjoin state school officials from requiring Jehovah’s Witnesses to salute the flag. Writing for a unanimous court, Judge John J. Parker, of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, granted the injunction. Parker acknowledged that “ordinarily” the lower court would “feel constrained to follow an unreversed decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, whether we agreed with it or not.” However, in the light of the dissents in Opelika, Parker expressed doubt that Gobitis was still binding. The three-judge panel believed that the West Virginia flag salute requirement was “violative of religious liberty when required of persons holding the religious views of the plaintiffs.”

West Virginia’s attorney general refused to appeal this decision to the U.S. Supreme Court, so the attorney for the Board of Education appealed the case with an unimaginative argument that relied almost entirely on Gobitis, supported by a weak amicus brief from the American Legion. Attorneys for Barnette attacked Gobitis, comparing it to the Dred Scott decision of 1857. Amicus briefs for Barnette came from the American Civil Liberties Union written by Osmond K. Fraenkel and Arthur Garfield Hays and the American Bar Association’s Committee on the Bill of Rights written by Harvard Law professor Zachariah Chafee, Jr.

On June 14, 1943, which was Flag Day, Justice Robert Jackson, speaking for a six to three majority upheld the lower court and reversed the Gobitis precedent. Justice Frankfurter wrote a bitter dissent.

While the Flag Salute cases are generally seen as involving freedom of religion, that issue is virtually absent from Jackson's majority opinion. He accepts, without question, that the Jehovah's Witnesses sincerely held beliefs that made it impossible for them to conscientiously salute the flag. But, Jackson does not offer any analysis of the importance of that belief or even of the role of religious freedom in striking down the mandatory flag salute. Indeed, he links the freedom to worship with other bill of rights protections, noting that the "right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections." He finds that the "freedoms of speech and of press, of assembly, and of worship may not be infringed" on "slender grounds."

Rather than grounding his opinion in freedom of religion, Jackson analyzed the case as one of freedom of speech and expression. Jackson argued that the flag salute—or the refusal to salute the flag—was "a form of utterance" and thus subject to standard free speech analysis. He noted that the flag was a political symbol, and, naturally, saluting that symbol was symbolic speech:

Symbolism is a primitive but effective way of communicating ideas. The use of an emblem or flag to symbolize some system, idea, institution, or personality, is a short cut from mind to mind. Causes and nations, political parties, lodges and ecclesiastical groups seek to knit the loyalty of their followings to a flag or banner, a color or design. The State announces rank, function, and authority through crowns and maces, uniforms and black robes; the church speaks through the Cross, the Crucifix, the altar and shrine, and clerical raiment. Symbols of the State often convey political ideas just as religious symbols come to convey theological ones.

The question for Jackson was rather simple, did the "speech" of the Jehovah's Witnesses threaten the rights of any individuals or the peace and stability of the government. If the answer to either question was yes, then Jackson might have allowed the mandatory flag salute. But, if they did not threaten the rights of others or threaten the government, then there was no valid reason to suppress their expression.

Jackson noted that the conduct of the Jehovah's Witnesses "did not bring them into collision with rights asserted by any other individuals." The Court was not being asked "to determine where the rights of one end and another begin." It was, rather, a conflict "between [governmental] authority and rights of the individual."

Jackson compared the forced flag salute to Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931), which had allowed protestors to carry a red flag. This case and others supported the "commonplace" standard in free speech cases "that censorship or suppression of expression of opinion is tolerated by our Constitution only when the expression presents a clear and present danger of action of a kind the State is empowered to prevent and punish. It would seem that involuntary affirmation could be commanded only on even more immediate and urgent grounds than silence." But, were there such grounds? No one claimed that the silence of the children "during a flag salute ritual creates a clear and present danger that would justify an effort even to muffle expression." Jackson pointed out the irony of the flag salute requirement, in light of the expanded freedom of speech found in recent decision. "To sustain the compulsory flag salute we are required to say that a Bill of Rights which guards the individual's right to speak his own mind, left it open to public authorities to compel him to utter what is not in his mind."

Jackson's shrewd analysis had turned the case inside out. It was no longer one of freedom of religion, but one that in part took the form of an establishment of religion on the part of the government through its "flag salute ritual." Jackson correctly saw that the Jehovah's Witnesses were not trying to force their views on anyone else, but rather, that the government was trying to force its views and beliefs on the Jehovah's Witnesses. He noted that in Gobitis the Court had "only examined and rejected a claim based on religious beliefs of immunity from general rule." But, Jackson pointed out, this was not the correct question to ask. Indeed, Jackson noted that people who did not hold the religious views of the Jehovah's Witnesses might still find "such a compulsory rite to infringe constitutional liberty of the individual." For Jackson the correct question was "whether such a ceremony so touching matters of opinion and political attitude may be imposed upon the individual by official authority . . . under the Constitution." In other words, did the government have the power to force anyone, regardless of their religious beliefs, to participate in any ceremony or "ritual." What Jackson might have asked was, did the Constitution allow for the establishment of a secular national religion with the flag as the chief icon? This led him to a discussion, and refutation, of various points in Gobitis.

In Gobitis, Frankfurter had noted Lincoln's "memorable dilemma" of choosing between civil liberties and maintaining a free society. Jackson had little patience for "such oversimplification, so handy in political debate." He "doubted whether Mr. Lincoln would have thought that the strength of government to maintain itself would be impressively vindicated by our confirming power of the state to expel a handful of children from school." Here Jackson revealed the fundamental weakness of Frankfurter's assertion in Gobitis that somehow the safety of the nation depended on whether Jehovah's Witnesses were forced to salute the flag in the public schools.

Along this line, Jackson noted even Congress had made the flag salute optional for soldiers who had religious scruples against such ceremonies. This act "respecting the conscience of the objector in a matter so vital as raising the Army" contrasted "sharply with these local regulations in matters relatively trivial to the welfare of the nation."

This led Jackson to the national security issue raised by Frankfurter in Gobitis. At the time of Gobitis, the nation was not at war, but war seemed imminent. By the time the Court heard Barnette, the nation had been at war for more than a year. Jackson agreed that in wartime "national unity" was necessary and something the government should "foster by persuasion and example."

But, could the government gain national unity by force? Jackson made references to the suppression of the early Christians in Rome, the Inquisition, "the Siberian exiles as a means of Russian unity," and the "fast failing efforts of our present totalitarian enemies." He warned that "those who begin coercive elimination of dissent soon find themselves exterminating the dissenters. Compulsory unification of opinion achieves only the unanimity of the graveyard." During a war against Nazism, Jackson's opinion was a plea for the nation to avoid becoming like its enemies.

Jackson ended his opinion by reminding Americans that the patriotism in a free country could not be instilled by force. Indeed, he argued that those who thought otherwise "make an unflattering estimate of the appeal of our institutions to free minds." America's strength, he argued, was found in diversity. The test of freedom was "the right to differ as to things that touch the heart of the existing order." This led Jackson to a ringing defense of individual liberty: "If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein."

Justice Felix Frankfurter was unmoved by Jackson's powerful defense of individual liberty and his condemnation of oppressive "village tyrants" who expelled small children from school because of their religious beliefs. At a time when millions of Jews (and thousands of Jehovah's Witnesses) were perishing in German death camps, Frankfurter used his ethnicity to justify his support for the suppression of a religious minority in the United States. He began: "One who belongs to the most vilified and persecuted minority in history is not likely to be insensible to the freedoms guaranteed by our Constitution." But, he argued that he could not bring his personal beliefs to the Court because, "as judges we are neither Jew nor Gentile, neither Catholic nor agnostic." He then defended judicial self-restraint and recapitulated and elaborated on his Gobitis opinion.

Frankfurter argued that "saluting the flag suppresses no belief nor curbs it" because those saluting it were still free to "believe what they please, avow their belief and practice it." In making this point Frankfurter failed to explain how one could "practice a belief" by doing what that belief prohibited. Nor did he explain how forcing children to say and do one thing, while encouraging them to secretly believe that what they were doing was a violation of God's commandments, would inspire patriotism in them.

Frankfurter conceded that the flag salute law "may be a foolish measure," and that "patriotism cannot be enforced by the flag salute." But he argued that the court had no business interfering with laws made by democratically elected legislatures. Frankfurter argued that because a total of thirteen justices had found the flag salute laws to be constitutional, the state laws "can not be deemed unreasonable." Because the state legislators had relied the recent decision in Gobitis, Frankfurter thought it unfair to strike down their legislation.

Frankfurter condemned "our constant preoccupation with the constitutionality of legislation rather than with its wisdom..." Yet he refused to strike down the West Virginia law that he conceded was unwise, not because it passed all constitutional tests but because of judicial restraint and respect for stare decisis. He argued that the "most precious interests of civilization" were to be "found outside of their vindication in courts of law" that thus he urged that the Court not interfere in the democratic process but to wait for a "positive translation of the faith of a free society into the convictions and habits and actions of the community." What would happen to the Jehovah's Witnesses in the meantime seemed of little concern to Frankfurter.

There was some minor resistance in a few localities to Barnette. The Supreme Court heard a few cases in which various local decisions were overturned. On the same day it handed down Barnette, the court unanimously overturned a conviction for sedition in Taylor v. Mississippi, 319 U.S. 583 (1943). The Jehovah's Witnesses in that case had been convicted for "violating a statute making it an offence to preach, teach or disseminate any doctrine which reasonably tends to create an attitude of stubborn refusal to salute, honor, or respect the Government of the United States or the State of Mississippi." The defendants had been sentenced to remain in jail until the end of the War or for ten years, whichever came first. The Court found the act abridged freedom of speech and press and was “so vague, indefinite, and uncertain as to furnish no reasonably ascertainable standard of guilt.” The Mississippi law, and the prosecutions under it, illustrates the extent of official persecution of the Jehovah’s Witnesses. After 1946, the Court heard no more cases on the flag salute issue. Barnette became an important precedent for other free speech and freedom of religion cases.

FLAG SALUTE CASES

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Manwaring, David. Render Unto Caesar: The Flag Salute Controversy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962.

Peters, Shawn Francis. Judging Jehovah’s Witnesses: Religious Persecution and the Dawn of the Rights Revolution. Lawrence, KS: University of Kansas Press, 2000.

FLAST v. COHEN, 392 U.S. 83 (1968)

Case litigation requires courts to possess the authority to hear the case (“justiciability”). An important justiciability requirement is that litigants have “standing” (be able to show injury to a protected interest) to sue. One of the most important cases involving standing is Flast v. Cohen, where the Supreme Court determined that taxpayers have standing to sue the government to prevent unconstitutional uses of taxpayer funds.

In Flast, taxpayers challenged federal legislation financing the purchase of textbooks for religious schools, arguing such use of tax money violated the First Amendment’s establishment clause. The issue before the Supreme Court was whether petitioners’ status as taxpayers gave them standing to sue in federal courts. Using a two-part test, the Court held (eight to one) that petitioners had standing to pursue the lawsuit.

Flast clarified an earlier ruling in Frothingham v. Mellon (262 U.S. 447 [1923]), which prevented taxpayers from having standing to sue the federal government if the only injury was an anticipated tax increase. The Court explained that Frothingham did not absolutely bar taxpayer suits but prevented courts from serving as forums for generalized taxpayer grievances. The Flast decision allows taxpayer suits against the federal government if the taxpayer can show: (1) a logical relationship between their taxpayer status and the challenged statute; and (2) that the challenged enactment exceeds constitutional limitations imposed on congressional taxing and spending power. Although the Burger and Rehnquist Courts have restricted standing requirements, taxpayer suits are commonly used today to contest the constitutionality of government actions.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

Dorf, Michael, ed. Constitutional Law Stories: Constitutional Law. New York: Foundation Press, 2004.

Miller, Robert T., and Ronald B. Flowers. Toward Benevolent Neutrality: Church, State, and the Supreme Court. 4th Ed. Waco, TX: Markham Press, 1992.

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 3rd Ed. New York: West Publishing Company, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968)

Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923)

FLORIDA STAR v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524 (1989)

Florida Star is an important free press case reinforcing the principle that the press can rarely be punished for publishing truthful, lawfully acquired information about a matter of public importance. In Florida Star, the Supreme Court refused to punish a weekly newspaper that published the name of a rape victim in violation of a state statute.

The Court agreed that the statute attempted to serve the “highly significant interests” of protecting rape victims’ privacy and safety and encouraging victims to report rapes without fear of exposure or reprisal. But the Court majority was unwilling to hold a newspaper liable for publishing truthful information, information in B.J.F.’s case about a matter of “paramount public import: the commission, and investigation, of a violent crime which had been reported to authorities.”

The Court did not rule that the press could never be punished for publishing truthful information, but, drawing on Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Company, the Court said only a government interest of the “highest order” would justify such punishment. Once again, the Court left editors to decide what to publish.

The six-member majority was unwilling to hold the press responsible for publishing information that was already public, especially because it was the sheriff’s office that released the victim’s name. The Court also thought the statute was too broad, automatically punishing the press, whether or not anyone was offended or damaged by the publication.

The three dissenters argued the Court’s ruling would “obliterate” the legal protection for a person’s “private facts.”

KENT R. MIDDLETON

References and Further Reading

Franklin, Mark A., David A. Anderson, and Fred H. Cate. Mass Media Law: Cases and Materials. 6th Ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2000, pp. 424–451.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 443 U.S. 97 (1979)

FLORIDA v. JIMENO, 500 U.S. 248 (1991)

Argued March 25, 1991, decided May 23, 1991, by a vote of seven to two, Chief Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion for the Court, with Justice Marshall and Stevens dissenting. The Court held that a criminal suspect's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches is not violated when, after he gives police permission to search his car, they open a closed container found within the car that might reasonably hold the object of the search.

Police Officer Trujillo followed Jimeno's car after overhearing Jimeno arrange what seemed to be a drug transaction. Jimeno was subsequently stopped for a traffic violation. Officer Trujillo declared he had reason to believe that Jimeno was carrying narcotics in the car and asked permission to search it. Jimeno consented, and Trujillo found cocaine inside a folded paper bag on the car's floorboard. Jimeno argued that his consent to search did not carry the specific consent to open the bag and examine its contents.

Chief Justice Rehnquist opined that the Fourth Amendment was satisfied when, under the circumstances, "it is objectively reasonable for the police to believe that the scope of the suspect's consent permitted them to open the particular container." (p. 250–252). The authorization to search extended beyond the car's interior surfaces to the bag, since Jimeno did not place any explicit limitation on the scope of the search and was aware that Trujillo would be looking for narcotics in the car. Since a reasonable person may be expected to know that narcotics are generally carried in some form of container, it is reasonable for Trujillo to open the bag. There is no basis for adding to the Fourth Amendment's basic test of objective reasonableness a requirement that if police wish to search closed containers within a car, they must separately request permission to search each container.

The dissent argued the distinction between open and closed containers and noted that general consent should not be specific consent as well. "A person who consents to a search of the car from the driver's seat could also be deemed to consent to a search of his person, or indeed of his body cavities, since a reasonable person may be expected to know that drug couriers frequently store their contraband on their persons or in their body cavities. I suppose (and hope) that even the majority would reject this conclusion, for a person who consents to the search of his car for drugs certainly does not consent to a search of things other than his car for drugs." (p. 256). There are distinct privacy expectations a person has in a car and in closed containers.

AARON R. S. LORENZ

See also Search (General Definition); Seizures; Warrantless Searches; Automobile Searches

FLORIDA v. RILEY, 488 U.S. 445 (1989)

Florida v. Riley considered whether helicopter surveillance constituted a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, such that a warrant would be required. In the plurality opinion, the Supreme Court reversed the lower court, holding that the Fourth Amendment did not require police traveling in the public airways (in legal airspace) at an altitude of 400 feet to obtain a warrant to observe what was visible to the naked eye.

After an anonymous tip that respondent was growing marijuana, a sheriff's officer circled over the property in a helicopter flying at 400 feet. With his naked eye, he was able to see through openings in the roof and sides of the greenhouse. After he identified what he thought was marijuana, he obtained a search warrant to confirm his observations.

The Court relied on California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986), a similar case involving a police inspection from a fixed wing aircraft at 1,000 feet. There, the Court held that the viewing was not a search subject to the Fourth Amendment even though the occupant had a subjective expectation of privacy. A home and its curtilage are not necessarily protected from inspection that involves no physical invasion. "What a person knowingly exposes to the public, even in his own home or office, is not a subject of Fourth Amendment protection." Ciraolo, 476 U.S. at 213 (citing Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 351 (1967)). As long as the police are "where [they have] a right to be," Ciraolo, 476 U.S. at 213, they need not obtain a warrant.

EMILY FROMSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986)

Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 351 (1967)

See also Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs

FLORIDA v. ROYER, 460 U.S. 491 (1983)

The nature of a police-citizen encounter determines whether Fourth Amendment rights are implicated and possibly infringed; without a seizure by police, Fourth Amendment protections do not apply. In Florida v. Royer, the Supreme Court revisited its stop and frisk doctrine, further clarifying when a consensual encounter becomes a seizure or when a seizure becomes an arrest.

Plainclothes narcotics detectives stopped Royer in the airport, identified themselves, and asked him to speak with them. At their request, Royer gave them his airline ticket and driver's license. Noticing a discrepancy, the detectives told Royer they suspected he was carrying narcotics. Retaining his documents, the detectives asked Royer to come with them to a small room nearby. One detective then retrieved Royer's luggage without his consent. When asked if he would consent to a search of the luggage, Royer simply produced a key and unlocked one bag. Marijuana was found inside, as well as in another bag. Royer was arrested and convicted of felony possession of marijuana.

In a plurality opinion, the Court found the initial encounter had escalated into an unlawful arrest when the detectives moved Royer to a small room while retaining his ticket, license, and luggage. Because Royer's consent was given after the unlawful arrest, it was tainted by this illegality and could not justify the luggage search. Recognizing there was no bright-line marking when an encounter becomes a seizure or an arrest, the Court reiterated that a lawful investigatory detention has to be limited in its scope and duration, considering the specific circumstances justifying its inception.

MARGARET M. LAWTON

References and Further Reading

American Jurisprudence. 2nd Ed., vol. 68 (Searches and Seizures). West Group, 2000, sec. 18–19.
Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Procedure. 3rd Ed. LexisNexis Publishing, 2002, pp. 131–134.
Katz, Lewis R., Terry v. Ohio at Thirty-Five: A Revisionist View, Mississippi Law Journal (2004) 74: 423–500.
LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure: Criminal Practice Series. vol. 2, Chapter 3, sec. 8. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.
United States v. Mendenhall, 466 U.S. 544 (1980).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)

See also Arrest without a Warrant; Balancing Test; Exclusionary Rule; Race and Criminal Justice; Stop and Frisk

FLORIDA v. WHITE, 526 U.S. 559 (1999)

How far does the Supreme Court extend the automobile exception to the search warrant requirement? In Florida v. White, the court extended the exception in time and place and to new circumstances.

The exception was extended to new circumstances: The defendant's automobile had been searched after it was been seized under a state criminal forfeiture law. Police found drugs inside in the ensuing inventory search.

Police had probable cause to believe that defendant had used the vehicle in a drug transaction, which allowed forfeiture of the vehicle under state law. The court relied on Carroll v. United States to declare that police can search without a warrant when they have probable cause to believe that a vehicle contains contraband. In Florida v. White, the vehicle did not contain contraband; the vehicle itself was contraband. However, at the time of the seizure defendant was incarcerated and the state proved no immediate need to search.

The exception was also extended in time: The seizure occurred more than two months after defendant was seen using the vehicle in the drug transaction.

And the exception was extended in place: The Court relied on the fact that the vehicle was located in a public place when it was seized. Like seizures of vehicles for taxes in G.M. Leasing v. United States, the seizure involved no invasion of privacy because the vehicle was in a public place.

JEFFERSON L. LANKFORD

References and Further Reading

Chilcoat, Kendra H., The Automobile Exception Swallows the Rule: Florida v. White, Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology 90 (2000): 917–950.
Dery, George M. III, Missing the Big Picture: The Supreme Court's Willful Blindness to Fourth Amendment Fundamentals in Florida v. White, Florida State University Law Review 28 (2001): 571–604.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)
G.M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338 (1977)

See also South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976); Warrantless Searches

FLYNT, LARRY (1942–)

Born in Kentucky in 1942, Larry Flynt dropped out of school in ninth grade and, lying about his age, joined the army at age fifteen. Discharged at age seventeen, he again lied about his age to get into the navy, where he served as a radar technician. He currently heads the Hustler Publishing Company, which oversees more than twenty sex magazines and sees an annual turnover of a $100 million. In 1974, he started Hustler as a working-class magazine. In 1978, an assassination attempt left him paralyzed. Flynt was the defendant in a landmark Supreme Court in 1988 concerning Jerry Falwell in a decision that stipulated that offensive speech aimed at a public figure—Falwell, in this case—was constitutionally protected as long as it did not claim to be fact.

In 1983, when the Defense Department refused to allow American journalists to accompany the U.S. invasion force into Grenada by blockading all news concerning its activities there for two days, Flynt sued the government claiming a constitutionally guaranteed right of access for the media in combat zones under the First Amendment. The case was declared moot, because the Defense Department had lifted the restrictions against coverage by the time the case came to court. That same year, the Flynt-owned Hustler magazine ran an advertisement parody in its November issue featuring Jerry Falwell. In response to the parody, Falwell brought a $45 million lawsuit against Hustler and its publisher, Larry Flynt. Falwell charged that Flynt and the magazine had appropriated his name and image for advertisement or trade without his consent, that the parody represented libel—written defamation (that false and defamatory statements had been made against Falwell)—and that the parody intentionally inflicted emotional distress on him. According to Falwell and his supporters, constitutionally guaranteed freedoms cannot be understood outside of a moral framework. The First Amendment, in this view, cannot be perverted to mean that the nation must tolerate ideas that the Constitution did not intend to protect and that run counter to the moral truths they believe the Constitution embodies. There is no value in destructive speech, such as appeared in Hustler, and thus it does not fall under First Amendment protection. For Flynt and his supporters, the freedom of speech is absolute. In other words, any and all speech that does not physically threaten anyone falls under First amendment protections. Furthermore, Flynt contended that the advertisement was a joke, and any award of damages would be frivolous.

In an opinion written by Chief Justice William Rehnquist on February 24, 1988, the Supreme Court of the United States found that the case presented the question of the First Amendment's limitations on a State's authority to protect its citizens from intentionally inflicted emotional distress. In reversing the judgment of the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court concluded that public figures cannot recover damages for emotional distress from issues like the one at issue without also showing that the publication contained a false statement of fact made with actual malice or reckless disregard for its truthfulness. Thus Flynt prevailed in an eight-to-zero opinion.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

Flynt, Larry, with Kenneth Ross. An Unseemly Man. Los Angeles: Dove Books, 1996.
Smolla, Rodney. Jerry Falwell v Larry Flynt: The First Amendment on Trial. NY: St. Martins Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1998)

See also Falwell, Jerry; Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1998); Obscenity

FOLLETT v. TOWN OF MCCORMICK, S.C., 321 U.S. 573 (1944)

Mr. Lester Follett, a member of Jehovah's Witness faith, devoted his life to preaching. In this capacity he traveled door-to-door in his hometown of McCormick, South Carolina, and accepted contributions for the sale of religious texts. Follett had no other source of income. The town of McCormick required licensure for book salesmen with a fee amounting to $1.00 per day or $15.00 per year. Mr. Follett claimed the fee imperiled his freedom of religion and refused to remit the licensure fee. Although precedent leaned in his favor, the South Carolina Supreme Court disagreed, narrowly interpreting past cases as only applying to transient booksellers (see Murdock v. Pennsylvania 319 U.S. 113 and Jones v. Opelika 319 U.S. 103).

Justice Douglas delivered for the Court a verdict in favor of Mr. Follett. Noting that similarly to Murdock and Opelika, Mr. Follett was "engaged in a 'religious' rather than 'commercial' venture," his activities cannot be measured "by the standards governing the sales of wares and merchandise." Justice Douglas narrows the question to whether a license tax is applicable to a preacher in his hometown and concludes that full-time preachers may not be taxed for commercial activities directly related to their evangelism. He writes: "Freedom of religion is not merely reserved for those with a long purse. Preachers of more orthodox faiths are not engaged in commercial undertakings because they are dependant on their calling for a living."

Justices Roberts, Frankfurter, and Jackson dissented, citing two main points. (1) The license tax did not affect only preachers, but all street vendors, and thus did not discriminate against religions expression. (2) The tax exemption would potentially open the door for entire churches to claim tax exemption from their commercial holdings.

JOHN GREGORY PALMER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 113

Jones v. Opelika, 319 U.S. 103

See also Graham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)

FONG YUE TING v. UNITED STATES, 149 U.S. 698 (1893)

In the late nineteenth century, amid a rise in anti-alien sentiment, Congress promulgated a series of Chinese Exclusion Acts. The Act of 1892 required all “Chinese laborers” lawfully resident within the United States to apply for certificates of residence and provided for the deportation of those who did not obtain certificates. Failure to obtain the certificate could be excused by a demonstration of “unavoidable cause” and the testimony of “at least one credible white witness” as to lawful residency. Fong Yue Ting and two other Chinese were arrested in New York City for failure to possess certificates. They challenged the constitutionality of the Exclusion Act.

The question of what limits the Constitution places on Congress’s power over aliens had come before the Court before. In Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., the Supreme Court held that Congress possessed full and unrestrained power to exclude aliens as an inherent incident of sovereignty. Fong Yue Ting presented the further question of whether the Constitution constrained the ability of Congress to expel aliens lawfully present within the country. The Court extended the rule of Chae Chan Ping, concluding that the right to expel non-citizens “rests upon the same grounds, and is as absolute and unqualified, as the right to prohibit and prevent their entrance into the country.”

The extreme language of Fong Yue Ting has been moderated by subsequent cases such as Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, which affirmed that deportation hearings must comport with procedural due process.

KERMIT ROOSEVELT, III

References and Further Reading

Henkin, Louis, The Constitution and United States Sovereignty: A Century of Chinese Exclusion and its Progeny, Harvard Law Review 100 (1987): 853.

Neuman, Gerald. Strangers to the Constitution. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 3rd Ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2000, pp. 967–977.

Chin, Gabriel J. Chae Chan Ping and Fong Yue Ting: The origins of plenary power, in Martin, David A., and Peter S. Schuck, eds. Immigrant Stories 7. Foundation Press, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33 (1950)

Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889)

See also Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889) and Chinese Exclusion Act; Due Process in Immigration; Undocumented Migrants

FORCED SPEECH

In times of peril and uncertainty, governments often seek to ensure that all pay obeisance to central tenets of the state. In the 1940s, West Virginia sought to teach school children about democracy and required them to recite the pledge of allegiance. Children of devout Jehovah’s Witnesses objected on grounds that their religion forbade such oaths, and school officials expelled them. In West Virginia v. Barnette, the Supreme Court reversed in ringing tones: “If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein.”

This principle—that the First Amendment prohibits the government from forcing citizens to feign compliance with state orthodoxy—has been extended. When car owners objected on religious grounds to the slogan, “Live Free or Die,” embossed on New Hampshire license plates and covered it, violating state law, the Supreme Court held that the state could not punish the act. Another citizen who wished to distribute literature anonymously was held to have a First Amendment right to do so even though state law required disclosure to avoid anonymous political mud slinging.

Most people recognize the power of social pressure. To one degree or another, we are all pressured to conform to the views and habits of our neighbors, whether those habits consist in wearing fashionable clothes, adhering to implicit codes of behavior (no spitting on the sidewalk; don’t eat with your mouth open), or adopting conventional attitudes about other people or policies. Some conformity is essential to civilized society. We adopt laws requiring people to pay taxes, to drive on the right, and to attend schools until age sixteen. And, while the government may require compliance with many rules of behavior, the First Amendment forbids the government from exacting conformity in belief or speech.

Why does our Constitution permit the government to force people to pay taxes but may not force people to salute the flag? The answer lies in a fundamental understanding that individuals must be left free to think their own thoughts, make their own decisions about what and how to express themselves. In addition, a core principle of a functioning democracy is the citizenry's freedom from government coercion in their associations and in developing individual ideas and beliefs. Conflicting perspectives, what Barnette called "intellectual individualism," and preservation of the right to dissent are essential characteristics of a democratic society.

In some instances, the principle has protected media outlets from being forced to publish views it opposed. For example, a Florida statute required newspapers to accord equal space to political candidates who the newspaper had criticized. In Miami Herald v. Tornillo, the Supreme Court held the statute unconstitutional, because it interfered with editorial judgment about what should be published and essentially punished the paper for criticizing politicians. One might also point to the special favoritism granted political candidates as a further support for the outcome of the decision.

In contrast, in Turner Broadcasting, the Court upheld federal law requiring cable operators to carry the signals of local broadcasters. The Court distinguished the Florida case on the ground that the "trigger" for the Florida law was content based—publishing criticism of politicians—whereas here the overriding objective was not to favor one viewpoint over another but the economic one of preserving free television programming regardless of the content of the expression. In enacting the legislation, Congress expressed particular concern that a key communication outlet for large numbers of Americans, local broadcasting, would dry up. The Supreme Court's decision thus recognized the value of preserving multiple channels of communication.

Although the First Amendment prohibits government from coercing speech, different sets of problems arise when the issue concerns government efforts to break up broadcast monopolies or to remove financial barriers to promote diversity among speakers. For example, the Federal Communications Commission, the agency designated to allocate broadcast licenses in the limited spectrum available, sought to promote fairness by requiring broadcasters to allow persons who had been attacked on air a "right of reply" and further required licensees to promote discussion of public affairs. This "Fairness Doctrine" was unanimously upheld in Red Lion Broadcasting. The Supreme Court reasoned that the government had selected the broadcasters; because the spectrum was scarce, anyone could be attacked on the air without recourse. Furthermore, much of the public would be unable to access the airwaves without regulations providing for public access rights.

A similar result obtained when California required private shopping centers to permit student protestors to set up a table inside their malls over the owners' objections: California could promote greater diversity of expression in this fashion, and the rule did not infringe the owners' rights not to express ideas since the owners could post a sign disassociating themselves from the petitioners.

Gay rights activists sought to rely on the "access" line of cases to enforce a Massachusetts Human Rights Commission order that allowed them to march in a privately organized Irish-American parade. The Supreme Court unanimously held that the Commission rule interfered with the First Amendment right of the organizers to express their own message. Although ostensibly enacted to promote equal treatment of a disfavored minority, the Commission's approach would have supported a ruling by a different agency requiring civil rights marches to include Ku Klux Klan floats.

The distinction between these two lines of cases is that the government may promote access to channels of communication to diversify the voices that may be heard in public spaces provided it neither prescribes the message nor interferes with others' rights to express their own messages or to disavow association with the speech. Indeed, with increasing concentration of media empires, some have argued that it is even more important to democracy for the government to ensure access to media—especially for those who are unable to purchase such access.

A different set of issues arises when the government compels individuals to give financial support to private organizations with whose ideological positions they disagree. In the Abood case, for example, public sector employees were represented by a union pursuant to a collective bargaining contract with their employer, the Detroit Board of Education. One provision in the contract required non-union members to pay to the union a service fee equal to union dues as a condition of employment.

Some nonunion employees objected to paying the fee because they disapproved of (1) collective bargaining in the public sector and especially (2) "ideological union expenditures not directly related to collective bargaining." The Supreme Court ruled that mandating fees to support the collective bargaining process was constitutional, but that objecting individuals must be allowed the opportunity to opt out of the “ideological expenditures.” The basis of the distinction between the two types of expenditures has proven to be important in subsequent cases as well.

Mandatory fees to support labor negotiations were constitutional, because otherwise the entire system of collective bargaining would be undermined: non-union members could free load off the benefits obtained by the union negotiators without paying for them. On the other hand, fees to support ideological causes unrelated to collective bargaining (for example, lobbying expenses) and that were not germane to the collective bargaining process itself could not constitutionally be imposed on objecting members.

The Abood principle was reaffirmed in a case involving mandatory bar dues for lawyers: California could require its attorneys to finance the regulatory apparatus governing lawyers such as bar discipline but could not require objecting attorneys to finance political lobbying by the State Bar organization. But in Southworth, the Court held that the First Amendment permits a public university to charge its students an activity fee to support speech activities by extracurricular student organizations promoting a wide range of ideological views, provided that the program is viewpoint neutral. In contrast to Abood, where the Court was concerned to protect dissenters from being forced to subsidize speech they disagreed with, Southworth recognized that where the purpose of the fee was to “stimulate the whole universe of speech and ideas” it was implausible that individual students would be permitted to “opt out” of such funding mechanisms.

The First Amendment has also been invoked in cases involving advertising of agricultural products. The federal government and some states finance demand-bolstering advertising for agricultural products such as fruit, vegetables, and beef. In one case, fruit growers objected to mandatory assessments ordered by California agricultural authorities for generic advertising of fruit. They attempted to piggyback off the Abood “ideological” branch, arguing that requiring growers to pay for speech they didn’t want was unconstitutional “compelled speech.” However, in the Court’s view, the California marketing arrangement carried no ideological message (which distinguished the case from Abood). Moreover, the marketing scheme was part of a broader regulation of the market in fruits.

Nonetheless, when mushroom growers challenged a similar program, the growers cleverly argued that their message was that their mushrooms were superior to the generic mushrooms. Thus, remarkably, they persuaded the Court that being made to pay for generic mushroom advertising by an industry association violated their First Amendment rights not to finance “ideological” messages with which they disagreed.

Many scholars saw the mushroom growers’ argument as a smokescreen: the growers simply objected to paying for a government program they disliked, and that funneling the funds through a private association should not have made a difference. However, the mushroom case left open another question: does the First Amendment permit citizens to withhold fees for government advertising programs with whose message they disagree? The Court forestalled this possibility in the Johanns decision, where the governmental agency responsible for generic beef advertising argued that the government itself was “speaking” about the virtues of beef consumption. The Court ruled that beef producers who objected to government-compelled subsidy of the government’s own speech had no valid First Amendment complaint. The mushroom growers case was distinguished on grounds that the growers’ money went to a private association.

In sum, the government may not force an individual personally to adhere to a message he or she disagrees with; nor may the government generally compel an individual to subsidize an ideological message he or she disagrees with, where the message is expressed by a private entity. However, public universities can require students to pay to support ideologically diverse student organizations. And, individuals have no First Amendment right to challenge compelled subsidies of the government’s own message.

JOHN T. NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

- Cantor, Norman L., Forced Payments to Service Institutions and Constitutional Interests in Ideological Non-association, Rutgers Law Review 36 (1983): 3.
 Klass, Gregory, The Very Idea Of A First Amendment Right Against Compelled Subsidization, University of California at Davis Law Review 38 (2005): 1087.
 Jacobs, Leslie Gielow, Pledges, Parades, And Mandatory Payments, Rutgers Law Review 52 (1999): 123.
 Wasserman, Howard, Compelled Expression And The Public Forum Doctrine, Tulane Law Review 77 (2002): 163.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ.*, 431 U.S. 209 (1977)
Board of Regents of Univ. of Wis. System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217 (2000)
Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliott, Inc., 521 U.S. 457 (1997)
Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian & Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557 (1995)

Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Association, 544 U.S. ____ (2005)
Keller v. State Bar of California, 496 U.S. 1 (1990)
McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission, 514 U.S. 334 (1995)
Miami Herald v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)
Pruneyard v. Robbins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980)
Red Lion Broadcasting v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)
Turner Broadcasting v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622 (1994) (Turner I)
Turner Broadcasting v. FCC, 520 U.S. 180 (1997) (Turner II)
United States v. United Foods, Inc., 533 U.S. 405 (2001)
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

See also Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977); Anonymity and Free Speech; Broadcast Regulation; Cable Television Regulation; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Fairness Doctrine; Federal Communications Commission; Forced Speech; Government Funding of Speech; Government Speech; Gay and Lesbian Rights; Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974); Pledge of Allegiance and First Amendment; Red Lion Broadcasting v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969); Shopping Centers and Freedom of Speech; Student Activity Fees and Free Speech; Turner Broadcastings Sys., Inc. v. FCC I & II, 512 U.S. 662 (1994); University of Wisconsin v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217 (2000); West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

FORTAS, ABE (1910–1982)

Abe Fortas is remembered more for the circumstances surrounding his abortive nomination as Chief Justice and his subsequent resignation than for his judicial opinions. This is unfortunate. Trained as a Washington lawyer during the 1930s, and later trusted as a close advisor to President Johnson, Fortas, perhaps more than any other Justice, provided a link between Roosevelt's New Deal and Johnson's Great Society. Although his tenure was brief and controversial, Fortas played a significant role in shaping some of the most important cases to come down from the Warren Court.

Abe Fortas was born on June 19, 1910, in Memphis Tennessee, to Woolfe and Rachel Berzansky Fortas recent Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe. Theirs was a modest, working class family steeped more in the cultural than the religious tradition of Judaism. From his father, an amateur musician, Fortas inherited a deep and abiding love of music. Fortas himself became an avid violinist, and he later came to count Pablo Casals and Isaac Stern among his friends and clients.

An outstanding student, Fortas won scholarships both to Southwestern College in Memphis and to Yale Law School. At Yale, Fortas served as editor-in-chief of the Yale Law Journal and came under the influence of two powerful exponents of legal realism: Thurman Arnold and William O. Douglas. After graduating in 1933, Fortas joined Yale's faculty while also accepting a position with Jerome Frank in Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal Agricultural Adjustment Administration. In 1937, while serving at the Interior Department, Fortas befriended a young Texas Congressman named Lyndon Johnson.

In the 1940s, Fortas left government service but remained in Washington, D.C. and founded a law firm with Thurman Arnold and Paul Porter. Fortas came to exemplify the Washington lawyer of the post-war era. An able and aggressive advocate, trained in the New Deal, he effectively navigated clients through the intricacies of federal policies and programs.

At the outset of the Cold War in the late 1940s, Fortas took a lead role in opposing President Truman's loyalty program. He particularly objected to an incursion of the Executive and Legislative Branches of government into what he perceived as the judicial province of "judging" loyalty. Such incursions threatened to abridge the due process rights of challenged individuals. Soon, loyalty cases occupied a substantial portion of his firm's working hours. Prominent among the cases taken on by Fortas during this time was that of Owen Lattimore, a sinologist who headed the Page School of International Relations at Johns Hopkins University, who was accused by Senator Joseph McCarthy of being the "top Russian espionage agent in the United States." After five years of impassioned and meticulously organized defense by Fortas before investigating committees led both by Senator McCarthy and later, Senator McCarran, Lattimore was finally vindicated in 1955.

In 1962, the U.S. Supreme Court appointed Fortas to represent Clarence Gideon, in what became a landmark case of Gideon v. Wainwright. Gideon had been convicted of breaking and entering in Florida. He was indigent and could not afford to hire a lawyer at his initial trial. He filed a pro se appeal to the Supreme Court asserting that he should be freed because he had been denied effective access to counsel. Fortas argued the case before the Supreme Court and won a unanimous decision. In finding for Gideon, the Supreme Court held that the Sixth Amendment guaranteed anyone accused of a serious crime a right to counsel, and that those too poor to pay would be provided with a lawyer at no cost.

Always drawn to men of power and influence, Fortas maintained his friendship with Lyndon Johnson during the 1950s, serving as his lawyer and close advisor until Johnson, as President, nominated his old friend to the Court in 1965.

On the Court, Fortas developed a reputation as a liberal in civil rights and a conservative in areas involving government regulation of business. “The Courts may be the principles guardians of the liberties of the people,” he wrote, but “They are not chiefly the administrators of its economic destiny.” Baltimore & Ohio Railroad v. United States, 386 U.S. 372, 478 (1967). His opinions demonstrate an instrumental approach to the law but reveal no coherent legal philosophy. This is not to say Fortas was unprincipled, although some accused him of this, but that, true to his education in legal realism, he saw the law as a tool to achieve specific results.

Fortas’ experience as a corporate lawyer led him to take a dim view of government interference in business matters. For example, in Baltimore & Ohio Railroad v. United States, 386 U.S. 372 (1967), Fortas, in dissent, argued that the Court had no business questioning the informed decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission to allow a merger of two railroads.

Fortas’ greatest concern, however, lay in protecting the rights of minorities, the disenfranchised, and the powerless. He fiercely championed the rights of criminal defendants, especially their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. In Re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), Fortas wrote a strong opinion that effectively created a “Bill of Rights” for juvenile criminal offenders by extending certain basic Fourteenth Amendment due process rights into juvenile courts. Writing in a realist vein, Fortas relied more on historical, sociological, and psychological studies of the juvenile justice system than on legal precedent to support his holding.

Free speech was an area of special concern for Fortas especially in the era of civil rights and anti-Vietnam War demonstrations. He was not, however, a First Amendment absolutist. To the contrary, he could not abide disruptive civil disobedience or symbolic speech that violated valid laws merely to dramatize dissent. The musician in him cherished harmony and decorum. He allowed for tension and conflict but insisted it be contained or structured. Thus, in Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966), Fortas found a Louisiana breach of the peace statute unconstitutional as applied to several blacks who conducted a peaceful sit-in of a segregated public library. But in Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576 (1968), Fortas, in a stinging dissent, drew the line at flag burning, declaring that “Protest does not exonerate lawlessness.” Id. at 617. Yet in his landmark opinion in Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), Fortas held that a school’s prohibition on black armbands worn by certain students to protest the Vietnam War was unconstitutional. Echoing his support for juvenile rights enunciated in Gault, Fortas declared that students did not surrender their First Amendment rights on entering a school. Wearing armbands, Fortas asserted, was akin to “pure speech” that did not involve “aggressive, disruptive actions” and did not interfere with the school’s work. Id. at 508–509, 512.

Fortas also has a very strong commitment to privacy as a constitutional right. Indeed, Fortas saw the right to privacy as a significant limitation to the freedom of the press. Consistent with his free speech cases (and with his deep personal antipathy toward the press), Fortas refused to extend First Amendment protections to press activities he considered to be intrusive or disruptive. Thus, for example, dissenting in Time v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967), Fortas asserted that “There are great and important values in our society, none of which is greater than those reflected in the First Amendment, but which are also fundamental and entitled to the Court’s careful respect and protection. Among these is the right to privacy.” Id. at 412.

After only three years on the Court, President Johnson nominated Fortas to replace the retiring Earl Warren as Chief Justice. It was an honor from which he never recovered. The confirmation hearings took place after Johnson had become a lame duck by refusing to seek reelection. Fortas soon became the target of a conservative backlash against the activism of the Warren Court and Johnson’s Great Society programs. Revelations of his ongoing business connections with millionaire businessman Louis Wolfson didn’t help matters any. By October, Johnson was forced to withdraw Fortas’ name. One year later, amid further allegations of improper business dealings, Fortas resigned from the Court although he maintained his innocence of any wrongdoing. Back in the private sector he was rebuffed by his old law firm but continued to practice law until his death in 1982.

JONATHAN KAHN

References and Further Reading

- Fortas, Abe. Concerning Dissent and Civil Disobedience. New York: World Publishing Co., 1968. A fascinating look into Fortas’ ideas on the nature and limits of free expression in a civil society, made even more interesting by the fact that he wrote it while sitting on the Supreme Court.
- Kalman, Laura. Abe Fortas: A Biography. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1990. Kalman’s solid study of Fortas’ life is the first to be based on complete access to Fortas’ private papers. Her work is therefore more complete than Murphy’s yet lacks a certain critical distance. Provides a good review of the development of Fortas’ legal ideas.
- Murphy, Bruce Allen. Fortas: The Rise and Fall of a Supreme Court Justice. New York: William Morrow and Co., 1988. An incisive study that concentrates on Fortas’ life as a Washington insider. More of a political biography, where Kalman's work is more a mix of the personal and the legal sides of Fortas' life.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Baltimore & Ohio Railroad v. United States, 386 U.S. 372 (1967)
Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966)
In Re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)
Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576 (1968)
Time v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967)
Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

If the standard for the significance of law be its effects on the everyday life of citizens, then the Fourteenth Amendment is one the most significant aspects of American law. This is certainly the case in regard to the Bill of Rights and civil liberties and perhaps in regard to the Constitution itself. In illuminating the impact of this great Amendment, we will first view its evolution and adoption as a part of post-Civil War reconstruction and then review the history and meaning of the guarantees of its great clauses: privileges and immunities, due process, and equal protection.

The Civil War and Reconstruction

The adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868 was to change the very nature of America. With the emancipation proclamation of questionable legal merit, the first order of post-war business was the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment in 1865 and abolishing slavery. The major issue concerning the meaning and intent of the Thirteenth Amendment was whether the amendment could reach "the badges" of slavery—the conditions that the former slaves faced as a result of the bondage and oppression that they had suffered.

That Congress so intended to reach these "badges" is supported by the fact that the Congress adopted civil rights legislation to protect the freed slaves in the South at the same time (Civil Rights Acts of 1865 and 1866) as it adopted the Amendment. Although this evidences the Framers intent that Congress could reach the badges of slavery under its enforcement power, the Framers feared that a still conservative Supreme Court might limit the Amendments and its enforcement power reach to abolition alone. This concern served as the predicate for the adoption, in May and June of 1866, of the most far-reaching constitutional protection of civil rights and liberties in our nation's history, the Fourteenth Amendment. Of particular relevance and meaning are the self-executing right prohibitions to the states in Section 1, and Section 5's empowering the Congress to enforce the newly creating rights delineated in Section 1.

Amendment XIV (1868)

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

The State Action Limitation

Before we review the rights guaranteed by the noble clauses articulated in Section 1 and Section 5 of the Amendment, one issue begs attention because of its effect on the application of the Amendment as a whole. The Fourteenth Amendment speaks in language directed at state governments, "No state shall make or enforce, . . . nor shall any state deprive, . . . nor deny." To what degree did this reference to the states indicate the framers intent that this limit application of the Amendment in regard to private forms of discrimination? This issue has been debated to this very day.

An answer supporting the Amendment's reach to private discrimination is, as noted previously, that the same Congress that adopted the Amendment passed civil rights legislation enforcing the Amendment that was clearly aimed at private conduct. The importance of this question cannot be overstated, since ultimately the fate of freed persons in the South would be decided by their former masters, and if the Amendment could not reach private activity, private racial discrimination would undoubtedly flourish. The answer to this question awaited what the Framers correctly characterized as their major antagonist, the Supreme Court.

The Court faced this issue in the Civil Rights Cases in 1883. The onset of "Jim Crow" can be traced to the Court's creation of the judicial fiction limiting application of the Amendment to affirmative "state action." Affirmative in the sense that inaction, even though a state might allow discrimination by not acting, was not sufficient. It is worthy of note that this was one of a trilogy of cases in which the Court provided threshold interpretations of the Fourteenth Amendment that "watered down" the effect of the Amendments so as to deny its intended benefit not only to the freed persons in the South but to the nation as a whole. The impact of these decisions set back individual rights and liberties until the mid-twentieth century, both doctrinally and substantively. It would be more than 100 years before the noble goals of the post-war era would meet fruition—although, that day would come. The other cases were Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1872) (Discussed in regard to the privileges and immunities clause, infra.) and Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896) (discussed in regard to the equal protection clause, infra).

The modern "story" of state action emphasizes the ability to reach some forms of what had previously been considered private and unreachable conduct and was closely associated with the rise of the civil rights movements in America in the mid-twentieth century, reaching its zenith in the 1960s and the "Warren Court."

These decisions changed the landscape of the state action doctrine, perhaps bringing it more in touch with the framers intent. Justice Harlan's dissenting opinion in the Civil Right's Cases, for example, would be drawn on in this regard. Yet, as the nation turned away from the civil rights era, the more conservative and "privacy" oriented Burger and Rehnquist Courts would limit and retreat from the Warren Court's doctrine liberalizing the ability to reach private activity.

Two concepts have emerged unto which the Court will treat private activity as state action. First, certain private activities are so public in character that they satisfy state action, because they serve a "public function." Note the potential breadth here, since many activities that are in private hands arguably serve a "public function." In recent years, however, the Court has severely limited this doctrine by requiring "the exercise by a private entity of powers traditionally exclusively reserved to the State" Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Company (1974). As if to emphasize the limitation of this concept, the Court held in Flagg Brothers v. Brooks (1978), that, "While many functions have been traditionally performed by governments, very few have been "exclusively reserved to the State."

Next, the government may be so involved in regulating private activities that the Court may find state action because of "significant state involvement." Once again, although still a more functional path to reach private activity, the modern Court has limited application of this doctrine as well. Now the state must "significantly encourage private activity," be a "joint actor or participant," or maintain a symbiotic and close relationship with the private activity so that, "there is a sufficiently close nexus between the State and the challenged action of the regulated entity so that the action of the latter may be fairly treated as that of the State itself" Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Company (1974); Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority (1961); Lugar v. Edmondson (1982).

At what point individual autonomy should end and the protections of the Fourteenth Amendment begin is an important thesis that underlies the concept of state action. In Moose Lodge v. Irvis (1972), the Court weighed in with its own moral views on this issue by finding that a private club could discriminate against admission of African Americans based on their race, because the activity was private and lacked state action. The Court held, despite liquor licensing by the state, that, "Our holdings indicate that where the impetus for the discrimination is private, the State must have 'significantly involved itself with invidious discriminations,' in order for the discriminatory action to fall within the ambit of the constitutional prohibition."

Since all of the clauses of the Amendment speak to the states, the state action limitation and the issue of private versus public in America are most consequential.

Privileges or Immunities

... No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Incorporation

There is no doubt the first sentence of the Fourteenth Amendment had as its intent overruling the heinous Dred Scott v. Sanford (1856) decision. Despite the Court's conclusion in Dred Scott that slaves were not "citizens" of the national government because they were mere chattels, now, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." The meaning of the second sentence, however, has produced as much debate concerning intent then perhaps any other verbiage in the Constitution: “No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.” What are the “privileges or immunities” of federal citizenship? If the first sentence overruled Dred Scott, did the second sentence overrule Barron v. Baltimore (1833), where the Supreme Court held that the “bill of rights” was not applicable to the states? Was this “short hand” language for the “Bill of Rights?” If it was, Baron would be overruled, the Bill of Rights would be applicable to the states, and the nation would have national protection of civil rights and liberties for the first time in its history. It would seem logical to so conclude based on the language of these two sentences, particularly because the now abolished “slavery” was a major reason for limiting the applicability of the Bill of Rights to the states. Yet, to so conclude would provide a profound change in the power balance between state and federal government, most particularly in the “new” post-war South. Incorporation of the Bill of Rights in the states via the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was a question of great meaning, and it awaited application of judicial review by the very Supreme Court the Framers feared.

In the first major post war decision interpreting the Amendment, the Supreme Court faced this most significant issue in the Slaughter-House Cases (1872). Despite what seemed to be the framers intent to overrule Baron, the Amendment’s author had stated the Amendment’s intent was, “to arm the Congress, . . . with the power to enforce the bill of rights” against the states, the Court would not so conclude. Justice Miller, speaking for the Court, refused to “radically change[s] the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people,” placed the privileges and immunities clause in the constitutional “waste paper basket,” where it still rests today. The Court not only rejected “incorporation” but also provided a limited nature of rights that Miller concluded would be protected—rights already given by some other federal law. Offhand it does not seem likely that the Civil War was fought and the Fourteenth Amendment adopted for access to navigable water, seaports, parks, and to redress the national government Twining v. State of N.J. (1908). This rejection of incorporation set the stage for the onset of “Jim Crow” and apartheid that would follow.

For all practical purposes Slaughter-House remains “good law” today, and the Court has thus rendered the clause essentially “superfluous.” Almost 100 years later the dissents of Field and Bradley in Slaughter-House would reach fruition in regard to “fundament rights” incorporation, but by application of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as opposed to the privileges and immunities clause.

Due Process Of Law

... nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

Due Process Incorporation

The mandate that “. . . Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law,” seems to be procedural in character. Although Slaughter House was the death knell of “privileges and immunities” incorporation, that finding was not to be the end of the road when it came to the issue of incorporation and national protection of civil rights and liberties. The Court, by the 1930s, would turn to the “due process” clause as a basis for incorporation.

Although due process seems to conjure “procedural” as opposed to “substantive” rights, the use of the term “liberty” in the clause, and the plain and simple “need” for at least some national protection of civil rights and liberties, found it the most likely alternative for “incorporating” rights. By the Palko v. Connecticut decision in 1937, there was no longer any doubt that “due process” could embrace not only procedural rights but substantive rights as well. Paramount in this move to “due process” incorporation was the Court applying the free speech protection of the First Amendment to the States on the basis of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, because freedom of speech was “among the fundamental personal rights and liberties” Gitlow v. New York (1925).

If the due process clause was to serve as the basis for incorporation, particularly given the procedural nature of the right, the most significant question was how one would decide which rights were protected? This might have been a less difficult inquiry under the privileges and immunities clause. Recall the argument that the privileges and immunities of national citizenship must have been the Bill of Rights and that the terminology was “short hand” language for such. The “textual” problem of incorporating via due process made this question quite difficult. In the Palko and Adamson v. California (1937) decisions, the debate between Justices Black, Cardozo, and Frankfurter reached historic proportion as the Justices debated how this process should be invoked.

Ultimately the Court settled on what as been described as fundamental fairness/natural law select incorporation. Natural law because this is an independent Fourteenth Amendment inquiry in regard to the significance and meaning of any particular right. Fundamental fairness because the “trademark” language in both Palko (double jeopardy) and Adamson (self-incrimination) is whether the right is “implicit in our concept of ordered liberty,” “deeply rooted in our civil and political institutions,” or a “principal of justice so rooted in the conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental.”

“Select” because the rights detailed in the first nine amendments are the ones most likely to be deemed “fundamental” via the preceding detailed nomenclature. The Warren Court’s active expansion of incorporation looked increasingly to the Bill of Rights to “selectively” incorporate more and more of its specific guarantees via the due process clause of the Amendment. The “fundamental fairness” inquiry would be used to decide which of the protections in the Bill of Rights should be selectively incorporated. To be sure, although selective incorporation centered on the first nine amendments, only those protections of the Bill of Rights deemed fundamental would be so included. Significantly, it was also possible that unarticulated rights not so specified could be deemed “fundamental” and held applicable to the states as well. By Duncan v. Louisiana (1968), the present position of the Court in regard to application of fundamental fairness selective incorporation seemed solidified as the Court concluded that the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial was fundamental to ordered liberty and applicable to the states. By this time almost all of the provisions of the Bill of Rights had been incorporated.

This “fundamental fairness” inquiry, used by the Court to selectively incorporate “fundamental rights,” creates and secures rights by a substantive application of the due process clause. Using the due process clause in this sense has been described as “substantive due process.” Here the inquiry by which rights are incorporated and made applicable to the states is the approximate inquiry the Court uses to create fundamental rights that are not delineated in the Constitution.

Substantive Due Process

“Substantive due process,” John Ely asserted, “sounds like a contradiction in terms—sort of like ‘green pastel redness” Ely, Democracy and Distrust 18 (1980). “A contradiction in terms” because the concept of due process normally conjures procedural rights, “An established course for judicial proceedings or other governmental activities designed to safeguard the legal rights of the individual” The American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language, 4th Ed. 2003.

Although the due process clause has been used to incorporate most of the Bill of Rights to the states, it invokes the greatest controversy when the Supreme Court applies it to create unarticulated rights not specified in the Constitution itself. This we call “substantive” due process. Substantive in the sense that the clause is not applied to protect “process” but to create and secure additional rights against which the government may only intrude with great difficulty.

Much the same as due process incorporation, we apply the fundamental fairness litany to create rights that are not articulated in the Constitution. The creation of unarticulated rights via substantive due process is a most controversial and oft-debated role for the Court.

Those asserting a more clause-bound basis for judicial interpretation, limited to the original intent of the Framers themselves, cite to the repudiation of the Court’s creation of the “liberty to contract” as an unarticulated right in Lochner v. New York in 1905. The creation of this unarticulated right by the Court’s substantive application of the due process clause has been criticized as an example of the danger in allowing the creation of such rights. The activism generated during the “Lochner era,” where the Court read “laissez-faire” capitalism as if it were a constitutional mandate, is the traditional armor for those who favor judicial restraint. The application of “substantive due process” to create unarticulated rights that a Court might find “implicit in our concept of ordered liberty and deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition,” are the controversial tools of this trade.

Nonetheless, and with ongoing controversy, the Court in the modern era has continued to apply substantive due process to create and secure unarticulated constitutional rights. The creation of a right of privacy in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) and its extension to “abortions” in Roe v. Wade (1973) are the most notable examples. In the modern era the Court has tended to apply “substantive due process” to conserve traditional social values or to deem privacy interests as fundamental based on a “respect for the teachings of history [and] solid recognition of the basic values that underlie our society” Moore v. East Cleveland (1977). Family, for example, is deemed a fundamental privacy interest “precisely because the institution of the family is deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition.” Ultimately, based on these themes, the Court has extended fundamental right protection “to personal decisions relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, child rearing, and education” Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992).

The creation of unarticulated rights rests at the root of a constitutional debate as to how a non-elected Supreme Court, enforcing the supremacy of the Constitution as fundamental law, should interpret the document in light of the framers intent and contemporary needs in a democratic society. Although most citizens today are well aware of the moral controversy extending from the abortion debate, very few are likely aware that among those who study the Court and the Constitution it is the issue of judicially created unarticulated constitutional rights via substantive due process that affords the greatest controversy. The modern Court, for example, has often cited to the word “liberty” in the due process clause to respond to this criticism and to ground these rights in the words of the Constitution. The magnitude of this polemic has been emphasized by the contemporary Senate confirmation process of Supreme Court nominees, where nominees’ views on the right of privacy have been center stage.

Procedural Due Process

Since due process normally conjures process-based protection, there is no controversy in regard to this application. Procedural due process normally requires some form of individualized hearing before the state can invoke a deprivation, for example, employment, license or welfare. It is, however, a right to “process,” or how a decision is reached, not the nature of the decision itself. There are two independent inquiries made when the Court applies the procedural protections of the due process clause. First, whether the right to due process protections apply, and second, once process is due, what type of process is required?

The Court has resorted to the specific terminology of the Fourteenth Amendment itself to decide if process is due. A state is required to grant due process if the individual so affected has a sufficient “liberty” and/or “property” interest. Although the interests are often state created and can thus be defined and limited by state law, they have nonetheless been interpreted with some degree of breadth.

A property interest sufficient to invoke due process procedural protection extends beyond “real property.” Thus, a welfare benefit, or entitlement, has been held as a sufficient property interest Goldberg v. Kelly (1970). The claim to an entitlement is not based on a constitutional right to such a benefit, but rather from a legislative decision by the state to offer the benefit, perhaps subject to certain conditions. A variety of cases after Goldberg have extended procedural due process guarantees to a wide range of other claimants: employees, students, prisoners, parolees, debtors, and automobile drivers.

The range of property interests that afford such protection are not “infinite,” and the Court has required a “legitimate claim of entitlement,” and or a “legitimate expectation to continued employment,” to invoke them Board of Regents v. Roth (1972).

A liberty interest sufficient to require due process reaches beyond “mere confinement” and may be invoked by a stigma that damages one’s reputation Wisconsin v. Constantineau (1971). Recently, however, the Court has limited the expansion of a liberty interest that is sufficient to require due process to circumstances where, “more tangible interests such as employment were present,” and “that reputation alone, apart from some more tangible interests such as employment,” is not “sufficient to invoke the procedural protection of the due process clause” Paul v. Davis (1976).

Once a sufficient property and/or liberty interest has been successfully advanced, or “process is due,” a court must then decide “what process is due.” Here the Supreme Court has made the process due dependent on the factual circumstances and interests in each case. Their guidance for the lower court extends from three criteria, now firmly established in Mathews v. Eldridge (1976), “First, the private interest that will be affected by the official action; second, the risk of a erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and finally, the Government’s interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail.”

Equal Protection

... nor [shall any state] deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The Meaning of Equality in an Economically Privileged Society

The Fourteenth Amendment’s guarantee that no state shall “deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws,” is perhaps America’s greatest anomaly. In a society where privilege abounds, a grant of “equal protection” seems to conflict with our core socioeconomic values. To enforce the equalitarian mandate of this language on our society via judicial review would likely have a revolutionary impact. Consequently, and perhaps much the same as the unequivocal language of the First Amendment, the history of the equal protection clause has been centered around how to limit its meaning and avoid a judicially led reordering of American society.

It is worth noting that almost all laws discriminate. In this regard, for example, a criminal sanction discriminates against the convicted. Here, of course, the argument is that the state has a justified purpose in discriminating against the convicted. Viewed in this sense the clause would be interpreted as allowing a state to deny equal protection, depending on its purpose.

With this in mind, and despite the unequivocal language of the equal protection clause, the Court has interpreted the clause as if it read, “A state may deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws if it has a sufficient purpose.” This analysis has at a minimum successfully limited an enforcement of the clause that would challenge the very ethic of privilege that abounds in America. Any study of equal protection is then an analytical inquiry into whether a state has a sufficient purpose to defend its discriminatory classification.

Our review of equal protection will thus center on the degree of scrutiny the Court applies to evaluate a state’s purpose. Here the Court, over the years, has devised a method that depends on the classification and/or interest that is discriminated against. The standards the Court applies, particularly how closely they scrutinize a state’s purpose in discriminating, are the central issue in the application of equal protection doctrine.

The Rational Purpose Test

The traditional restraint the Court has historically applied in enforcing the equal protection clause has been described as the old equal protection and is identified as the rational purpose test. Here the Court will analyze whether the state has a legitimate purpose and whether or not the means it has chosen to achieve its purpose are rationally related to the attainment of its ends. In practice, this rational purpose review deferred to the legislative process. The application of this minimum scrutiny was so deferential that it was described as “fatal in theory but not in fact.” This was the case because any rational purpose asserted by the state seemed adequate to defend the constitutionality of its statute Williamson v. Lee Optical (1955).

In the modern era, the “lessons of the Lochner” have mandated minimal scrutiny of a state’s purpose in cases concerning “socio-economics” Dandridge v. Williams (1970). Although application of minimum scrutiny in regard to socioeconomic issues continues unto this day, the Court has recently applied the rational purpose test with what it describes as “teeth,” so that in some circumstances the test may be “fatal in theory and in fact.” Where parties can prove the means chosen by the state are “arbitrary and/or irrational” in relation to its ends, statutes have been held unconstitutional even under minimum scrutiny. Thus, in Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center (1985), the Court applied the rational purpose test in striking down a state statute that discriminated against the disabled and reached much the same result in Romer v. Evans (1996) in striking Colorado’s Amendment 2, because it “classifies homosexuals not to further a proper legislative end but to make them unequal to everyone else.”

In a meaningful review of the present status of the rational purpose test, the majority in Romer commented, “In the ordinary case, a law will be sustained if it can be said to advance a legitimate government interest, even if the law seems unwise or works to the disadvantage of a particular group, or if the rationale for it seems tenuous,” and that even though Amendment 2 failed this inquiry, “if a law neither burdens a fundamental right nor targets a suspect class, we will uphold the legislative classification so long as it bears a rational relation to some legitimate end.”

The Compelling Purpose Test: Strict Judicial Scrutiny

If the rational purpose inquiry was the only standard applied in equal protection analysis, the impact of the clause and its powerful verbiage would likely have become meaningless. Perhaps because of such and by the onset of the “Warren Court,” a dual standard, two-tier approach, referenced in the Romer opinion above, provided a basis for judicial activism in regard to the clause. The level of judicial scrutiny applied to a state’s legislative purpose now depended on who was classified and what rights the legislation discriminated against. If the “old” equal protection was the deferential rational purpose test, this dual standard test became the “new” equal protection. If a state discriminated against a racial classification or denied a fundamental right the Court would apply strict scrutiny, and the state would be required to prove a compelling purpose. Application of this dual standard seemed to mean that a state's successful defense of its legislation became all but impossible. The compelling purpose test of the new equal protection was thus "strict in theory but fatal in fact."

Much the same as our discussion of the current application of the rational purpose test, the Court in the modern era has applied a compelling purpose test that is strict in theory but not fatal in fact. A review of the application of strict scrutiny and the present means of analysis is best served by viewing the evolution of the two conduits to compelling purpose review—race-based classifications and the denial of fundamental rights.

Race-Based Classifications

That the Supreme Court has closely scrutinized race-based discrimination should come as no surprise given the Civil War and the primary purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment and the equal protection clause. The Court's opinion in Strauder v. West Virginia (1880) certainly exemplified such, "[What is equal protection] but declaring, [in] regard to the colored race, for whose protection the amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color? [That] the West Virginia statute respecting juries [is] such a discrimination ought not to be doubted."

Based on this premise, the Court has traditionally treated all disadvantaged racial classifications as inherently suspect, mandating close judicial scrutiny and requiring the state to prove a compelling purpose. Traditionally, the closest scrutiny has been applied to what the Court has described as discrete (easily identifiable) and insular (isolated) minorities who have a history of being discriminated against and disadvantaged in the majoritarian process. The degree to which this approach would be applied to any racial group, as opposed to a "discrete and insular" racial minority, awaited the modern civil rights era and the onset of affirmative action.

How, given this history, could Jim Crow and apartheid flourish in the South for some 100 years after the adoption of the clause? The answer rests in the conclusion of the Court in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), that racial segregation imposed by the force of state law satisfied the mandate of the equal protection clause. Viewed in this sense, Brown v. Board of Education (1954) was of greatest import as an antiapartheid case, holding that separate but equal was unconstitutional and inherently unequal. Even a determination that apartheid was unconstitutional, however, did not rid us of racial discrimination. In postapartheid America, the Court faced two significant issues in this regard.

Life and discrimination are subtle. It is possible, for example, to discriminate even though a statute is neutral on its face. In postapartheid America, this was a major issue of consequence in regard to race-based discrimination. What resolution when there was a racially discriminatory effect, yet the statute itself was neutral? To require affirmative proof that a state "intended" to discriminate in such a circumstance would be an extremely difficult, if not impossible, burden. This is the case in regard to proving anyone's intent.

Yet, the Supreme Court, as it withdrew from the leadership it had exercised in the civil rights arena, precisely so held. In Washington v. Davis (1976), the Court found that "official action will not be held unconstitutional solely because it results in a racially disproportionate impact," and that, "proof of racially discriminatory intent or purpose is required to show a violation of the Equal Protection Clause" Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corporation (1977).

The next issue of constitutional and social significance was whether discrimination against a racial majority should be treated the same as discrimination against a disadvantaged racial minority? Many state programs voluntarily attempted to offer "affirmative action" to remedy the past discrimination suffered by disadvantaged racial minorities. Although it hardly seems odious for a racial majority to discriminate against itself, the concept of discriminating against the majority stirred extensive political controversy. Given such, the standard of review to be applied by the Court was contentiously debated Regents of The University Of California v. Bakke (1978).

By 1995, the Court definitively resolved this issue and held, "that all racial classifications, imposed by whatever federal, state, or local governmental actor, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny." Yet, this was not a compelling purpose test that was always "fatal in fact." For a state could constitutionally advance affirmative action programs if such classifications were, "narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests" Adarand Constructors, Inc v. Peña (1995).

To be "narrowed tailored" and constitutional the Court has indicated that the program must not just remedy the general nature of past societal discrimination but be supported by facts that "identify prior discrimination" in the area challenged. In City of Richmond v. Croson (1989), for example, this meant a history of identified discrimination in the Richmond construction industry itself. In the 2003 term, in Grutter v. Bollinger, the Court reaffirmed the Bakke decision and held that a law school's admission program that favored racial minority candidates to further the goal of "diversity" was constitutional. This was the case because the program was narrowly tailored in that it did not, "unduly burden individuals who are not members of the favored racial and ethnic groups," and, "because the Law School considers" all pertinent elements of diversity, "it can (and does) select nonminority applicants who have greater potential to enhance student body diversity over underrepresented minority applicants."

The Supreme Court has also included classifications based on "religion and national origin" as inherently suspect and requiring application of strict scrutiny. The Court in Bernal v. Fainter (1984), made this clear in holding that "a state law that discriminates on the basis of alienage can be sustained only if it can withstand strict judicial scrutiny." The Court cited to a "narrow exception" to this rule that has been labeled the "political function" exception and applies to laws that exclude aliens from "positions intimately related to the process of democratic self-government."

Fundamental Rights

The second conduit to the application of strict scrutiny under equal protection analysis is rights that are deemed fundamental. When a fundamental federal right is denied, strict scrutiny is applied no matter what the discriminatory classification. Thus, although deference is applied to wealth-based classifications, strict scrutiny will be applied if a fundamental federal right is denied to the poor as against the wealthy.

This makes a determination of what rights are deemed fundamental of consequence. With "explicit" constitutional rights most likely deemed "fundamental," the more particularized issue is once again what nonarticulated rights are deemed fundamental as well. Despite the inherent controversy of this process, the fact that a right to vote is not expressly articulated in the Constitution and is most certainly necessary for the democratic government mandated by the document makes it almost impossible not to conclude that there are "implicit, nonarticulated" fundamental rights. Just as our discussion concerning the "implicit" fundamental right of privacy, so we now make a similar inquiry as to other such rights.

The Supreme Court's conclusion that education was not a fundamental right in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez in 1973 articulated reluctance on behalf of the Court to expand implicit fundamental rights. The Court's conclusion in Rodriguez that only rights "explicit and implicitly" in the Constitution could be deemed fundamental was, in fact, quite limiting in nature. The conclusion that education was not such a right, and the history since the opinion, indicates the Court's reluctance to expand implicit fundamental rights.

Beyond the explicit detailing of rights in the Constitution, most notably, of course, the Bill of Rights, the following implicit rights have been deemed fundamental and subject to strict judicial scrutiny: vote, privacy, access to courts, and the right to interstate travel.

Heightened Review: The Middle Scrutiny Test

Although the Constitution hasn't changed, the role of women in our society certainly has. Whatever individual justices might have to say about a "living constitution," in Craig v. Boren in 1975, the Supreme Court retuned its positional analysis when it came to gender-based discrimination. The Court revolutionized its "two-prong" method and gave birth to "middle scrutiny" or heightened review when it came to gender. Under this increased scrutiny of gender-based classification, the Court held that "[To] withstand constitutional challenge, previous cases establish that classifications by gender must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives." As opposed to a legitimate governmental objective, the objective must now be "important," and not just rationally related to its ends, but "substantially."

The Court has, since Boren, continued to emphasize this increased scrutiny when it comes to gender. They have put state legislatures on notice that any gender-based classifications "must be applied free of fixed notions concerning the roles and abilities of males and females. Care must be taken in ascertaining whether the statutory objective itself reflects archaic and stereotypic notions" Mississippi University for Women v. Hogen (1982). The Court now references the application of middle scrutiny as requiring an "exceedingly persuasive justification" for any gender-based classification. It has described its review as "skeptical scrutiny," rejecting "overbroad generalizations about the different talents, capacities, or preferences of males and females" that "perpetuate the legal, social, and economic inferiority of women” J.E.B. v. Alabama (1994). Gender today finds the Supreme Court applying a heightened review that is very close to strict scrutiny.

The application of middle scrutiny review has not been limited to gender. In Clark v. Jeter (1988), after some confusion in previous cases, the Court indicated that “intermediate scrutiny” would be applied to any state classification of nonmarital children. The Court has also applied intermediate scrutiny on a case-by-case basis when the nature of the facts may require such. Thus, in Plyler v. Doe (1982), the Court found Texas’ denial of an education to children who had not been legally admitted into the United States an unconstitutional denial of equal protection, noting the “discrete” nature and “innocence” of the children and carefully limiting the application of middle scrutiny to the facts at hand.

The Enforcement Power

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Finally, and of particular significance given the framers intent of adopting the Fourteenth Amendment to support the constitutionality of post-war civil rights legislation, the Framers granted to Congress the “power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.” The post-war Congress exercised their enforcement power to adopt legislation that is significant even until today. Notable among this legislation are two statutes offering federal criminal protection: 18 U.S.C. § 241 (Derived from § 6 of the 1870 Act): Conspiracy against rights; 18 U.S.C. § 242 (Derived from § 2 of the 1866 Act): Deprivation of rights under color of law; and their civil law counterparts: 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (Derived from § 1 of the Civil Rights Act of 1871): Civil action for deprivation of rights.; 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3) (Derived from Civil Rights Act of 1871): Conspiracy to interfere with civil rights. Section 1983’s deprivation of fundamental rights under color of law has been a major source of litigation in the modern era, because it can be used to protect against the deprivation of all rights protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. This is quite expansive given that most of the Bill of Rights is incorporated by means of the Amendment.

Although most all of this legislation was “remedial” in character, the dominant issue in regard to the enforcement power is whether or not Congress could substantively enforce the Amendment to reach beyond the Court’s own definitions of the Amendment’s clauses. The first arguments that surfaced addressed whether or not Congress could reach private activity that the Court held the Amendment itself could not (the state action limitation). Although the fact that Section 241 and its civil parallel, Section 1985, seems to address private activity, and despite affirmative nuances by the Warren Court, the Court has essentially settled this question in the negative, and the Fourteenth Amendment’s enforcement has been limited to at least some involvement of the state, or state action.

Within the same context, the issue as to whether or not Congress can extend the substantive reach of the Amendment, based on its enforcement power, has also generated much debate. In reviewing one of the most significant pieces of civil rights legislation, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Warren Court affirmed its sweeping mandate that extended well beyond the Court’s own interpretation of Section 1 Katzenbach v. Morgan (1966).

But by the late twentieth century, the Rehnquist Court “put the brakes” on the Katzenbach rationale in finding that the Court could not modify substantive rights City of Boerne v. Flores 1997. Although they would conclude that Congress could abrogate the states Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit by the enforcement clause, they nonetheless scrutinized congressional purpose and limited legislation to remedies that were “proportional and congruent” to the alleged discrimination United States v. Morrison (2000). In fact, as if to make its point in regard to limits on the modern enforcement power, the Court held that in areas where the Court itself provided a higher degree of scrutiny (gender, fundamental rights), they would allow Congress greater leeway in legislating under its enforcement power Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs (2003), Tennessee v. Lane (2004).

MARTIN L. LEVY

References and Further Reading

- Amar, The Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment, Yale Law Journal 101 (1992): 1193.
- The American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language*. 4th Ed. 2003.
- Charles and Mary Beard. The Rise of American Civilization. 2 vols. 1927.
- Corwin, E. The Constitution of the United States of America 965, 1953.
- Currie, The Constitution in the Supreme Court: Limitations on State Power, 1865–1873, University of Chicago Law Review 51 (1983): 329, 348.
- Ely. Democracy and Distrust. 18, 1980.
- Fairman, Does the Fourteenth Amendment Incorporate the Bill of Rights? The Original Understanding, Stanford Law Review 2 (1949): 5, 132, 137–139.
- Graham, Our “Declaratory” Fourteenth Amendment, Stanford Law Review 7 (1954): 3, 23, 25.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

Reich. "The New Property." Yale U. 73 (1964): 733.
Tribe, L. American Constitutional Law. 1978.
Tussman and tenBroek, The Equal Protection of the Laws,
California Law Review 37 (1949): 341.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46 (1947)
Adarand Constructors, Inc v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200 (1995)
Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252 (1977)
Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. 243 (1833)
Bernal v. Fainter, 467 U.S. 216 (1984)
Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564 (1972)
Brown v. Board of Education, 47 U.S. 483 (1954)
Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U.S. 715 (1961)
City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. (1997)
City of Richmond v. Croson, 488 U.S. 469 (1989)
Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
Clark v. Jeter, 486 U.S. 456 (1988)
Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, 473 U.S. 432 (1985)
Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976)
Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1970)
Dred Scott v. Sanford, 60 U.S. 393 (1856)
Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)
Flagg Brothers v. Brooks, 436 U.S. 149 (1978)
Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Gutter v. Bollinger, 1236 S. Ct. 2325 (2003)
Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Company, 419 U.S. 345 (1974)
J.E.B. v. Alabama, 511 U.S. 127 (1994)
Katzenbach v. Morgan, 984 U.S. 641 (1966)
Lockner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
Lugar v. Edmondson, 457 U.S. 922 (1982)
Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976)
Mississippi University For Women V. Hogen, 458 U.S. 718 (1982)
Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)
Moose Lodge v. Irvis, 407 U.S. 163 (1972)
Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 528 U.S. 721 (2003)
Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)
Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693. (1976)
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982)
Regents of The University Of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Romer v. Evans (1996), 517 U.S. 620 (1996)
San Antonio Independent School District V. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973)
Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1872)
Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303 (1880)
Tennessee v. Lane, 124 S.Ct. 1978 (2004)
Twining v. State of N.J., 211 U.S. 78 (1908)
United States v. Morrison 529 U.S. 598 (2000)
Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229 (1976)
Williamson v. Lee Optical, 348 U.S. 483 (1955)
Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U.S. 433 (1971)

44 LIQUORMART v. RHODE ISLAND, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)

Freedom of speech is not unlimited in the case of "commercial speech," such as advertising. A 1942 Supreme Court decision upheld an ordinance that prohibited distribution of advertising leaflets on the street, saying that purely commercial advertising was not entitled to any First Amendment protection.

The Court later retreated from that position. Beginning in 1975, the Court said that an ordinance could regulate the manner of distribution but not its content. In a series of decisions the Court struck down prohibitions of specific types of advertising, where the commercial message also involved a matter of "public interest"—advertisements for abortion clinics, prescription drug prices, lawyers, optometrists, contraceptives, and electrical appliances.

A Rhode Island statute prohibited the advertising of liquor prices. 44 Liquormart's newspaper ad stated that "State law prohibits advertising liquor prices"—but claimed that that 44 Liquormart had low prices for potato chips, peanuts, and sodas. 44 Liquormart filed for a declaratory judgment, challenging the statute's validity.

The Court said that a statute that bans truthful, nonmisleading advertising must be subjected to strict scrutiny. The Court applied two of the four Central Hudson tests and overturned the statute. The Court said the prohibition did not directly advance the state's interest in promoting temperance, seeing no evidence that liquor price advertising and alcohol consumption were related. The Court also said that the state could reduce the consumption of alcohol by means other than abridging speech.

Rhode Island also argued that since the state could ban the sale of alcohol, it could ban or regulate the advertising of alcoholic beverages. The state cited, as authority for this proposition, a 1986 Supreme Court decision upholding a Puerto Rico statute limiting advertising of Puerto Rico gambling casinos. 44 Liquormart overturned that decision.

ELI C. BORTMAN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)
Posadas De Puerto Rico Assocs. v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986)

See also Commercial Speech; Lawyer Advertising; Professional Advertising

FRANCE v. UNITED STATES, 164 U.S. 676 (1897)

This case involved a charge of conspiracy for violating an act of Congress intended to suppress interstate lottery traffic. A lottery drawing of three random numbers was held in the city of Covington, Kentucky, located immediately across the Ohio River from Cincinnati, Ohio. Lottery agents in Cincinnati recorded the numbers chosen by players. At a certain time before the lottery was to be drawn in Covington, the agents in Cincinnati sent messengers with a paper showing the various numbers chosen, the amounts of the bets, and the money to the office in Covington. The messengers would return with “hit slips,” which were slips of paper with the winning numbers and the amounts payable to those who won in the last drawing. On their return to Cincinnati, some of the messengers were arrested and charged with conspiracy for carrying these hit slips. This was a violation of the statute prohibiting papers or instruments relating to lotteries across state lines.

Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the Court and ruled that the words “concerning any lottery” must be strictly construed to mean a current or future lottery. Because the lottery had already been drawn, the hit slips carried by the messengers were not dependent on a current lottery and, therefore, did not violate the law. Furthermore, because the hit slips did not contain any particular person’s name, did not have signatures, and were not addressed to any person, they did not represent a ticket, share, or interest in the event of any lottery. Thus, a strict interpretation of the language of the statute required that the judgment against the messengers be reversed.

LYNNE GARCIA

References and Further Reading

- Carlisle v. United States*, 517 U.S. 416 (1996): a case involving the power of an appellate court to reverse a district court’s denial of a motion for a directed verdict.
- Millan Couvertier v. Gil Bonar*, United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, No. 98-1997 (1999): a case involving lotteries in Puerto Rico.
- United States v. Halseth*, 342 U.S. 277 (1952): case that affirms strictly construing the meaning of “concerning any lottery” when information concerning lotteries is sent through the mail.

FRANCIS v. FRANKLIN, 471 U.S. 307 (1985)

Francis v. Franklin expanded on the Court’s earlier decision in Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510 (1979), by holding that jury instructions that create an unconstitutional burden-shifting presumption in a criminal trial could not be cured by informing the jury that the presumption was rebuttable. During an escape from custody, Franklin killed a man with a pistol. Franklin’s sole defense was that the firing of the gun was unintentional. The judge charged the jury that a person’s acts were presumed to be the product of his will and that a person was presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his acts, then the judge charged that these presumptions could be rebutted. The jury convicted Franklin of murder, and he was sentenced to death. After exhausting state remedies through unsuccessful appeals in Georgia, Franklin sought federal habeas corpus relief.

Franklin argued that the jury charge violated the due process clause, because it relieved the State of its burden to prove the element of intent beyond a reasonable doubt, and the Court agreed. Justice Brennan found that a reasonable juror could have understood that the disputed instructions created a mandatory presumption that shifted to Franklin the burden of persuasion on the element of intent once the state had proven the act of firing the pistol. Justice Brennan also found that neither the use of rebuttable language nor the jury instructions read as a whole cured the error.

Franklin affirmed the basic constitutional principle that the State has the burden to prove every element of a crime beyond a reasonable doubt, and the jury must be so charged.

EARL F. MARTIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510 (1979)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt

FRANK, JOHN P. (1917–2002)

John Frank was a twentieth century legal practitioner, scholar, teacher, mentor, and author who most assuredly lived “a life in the law.” As a law professor and practicing lawyer, he participated in a number of the major Supreme Court cases of the modern era.

After earning degrees at the University of Wisconsin and Yale Law School, Frank began his legal career in 1942 as a clerk for Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black. He subsequently taught law at Indiana University and at Yale. In 1954, when health problems pushed him to the southwestern United States, he joined the Phoenix, Arizona, law firm of Lewis and Roca in 1954 and practiced there for almost fifty years.

During his faculty tenure at Yale, Frank, who had met Thurgood Marshall at Indiana, joined in the NAACP Legal Education and Defense Fund assault on segregated education. In 1949 in Sweatt v. Painter, the Fund challenged the State of Texas for providing inadequate law school facilities for African Americans. At Marshall's request, Frank and two Yale Law School colleagues submitted an amicus brief, eventually signed by 187 law professors, supporting the NAACP suit. The brief in Sweat v. Painter went far beyond Marshall's argument, suggesting a complete end to segregation. Frank argued that racial classifications intrinsically violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Although the Court did not at the time accept the academics' argument, the justices did acknowledge that the plaintiff had been denied equal educational opportunity. Ultimately, the constitutional argument was addressed in the 1954 Brown v. Education litigation in which Frank also advised Thurgood Marshall.

During his time in private practice in Phoenix, Frank's accomplishments were many and varied. He became an expert on civil procedure and participated in a major revision of those rules. He was noted for his extensive pro bono work and represented Ernesto Miranda in Miranda v. Arizona in which the United States Supreme Court declared that the Fifth Amendment requires suspects be informed by law enforcement authorities that they have the right to an attorney during questioning. Frank was noteworthy, as well, for his mentoring of aspiring lawyers and was instrumental in encouraging the opening up of law practice to women. As a nationally respected lawyer, he testified in support of Richard Nixon's controversial nomination of Clement Haynsworth to the Supreme Court in 1970 but testified in opposition to Ronald Reagan's Robert Bork nomination in 1987. He also advised Anita Hill in her appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1991 in the contentious Thomas–Hill confirmation hearings.

Frank remained an active legal scholar until the end of his career, publishing eleven books that included a portrait of Abraham Lincoln as lawyer, a study of the Supreme Court, and last, an examination of the Haynsworth nomination process. His most important legacy, however, was summed up best by a former protégé, Leon Higginbotham, an African-American student of Frank's at Yale who later became chief judge for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, himself a noted jurist. Higginbotham, in an address to young lawyers thanked Frank for the lesson he had learned from him at Yale—"that the pursuit of justice was not an inappropriate profession for a lawyer."

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

- Barrett, John Q., Symposium: John Frank, Leon Higginbotham, and One Afternoon at the Supreme Court—Not a Trifling Thing, Yale Law and Policy Review 20 (2002): 311–323.
- Cardena, José A., John P. Frank: A Life of Socially Useful Work, Arizona Attorney 39 (November 2002): 22.
- Entin, Jonathan L., In memoriam: John P. Frank, Case Western Reserve Law Review 53 (Fall 2002): 238–242.
- Kluger, Richard. Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Vintage Books, 1977.
- Sperry, Lisa, John Frank's Mark of Excellence, Arizona Attorney 36 (December 1999): 40–45.

FRANKFURTER, FELIX (1882–1965)

Felix Frankfurter—law professor and associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court—had been known as one of the country's leading reformers when Franklin Roosevelt named him to the high court in early 1939. By the time he retired, forced off the bench by a debilitating stroke in 1962—he had become the bête noire of most judicial liberals and the most conservative member of the Warren Court. There is an irony here, because the two men—the supposedly "liberal" Professor Frankfurter and the supposedly "conservative" Justice Frankfurter—did not differ that much. Both adhered to a single judicial philosophy—judicial restraint—but whereas that view made a man a liberal in the 1930s, by the 1950s, at least in terms of civil liberties, it stood for the notion that the Bill of Rights could be restricted by the government provided it could offer a minimalist justification.

Born in Austria, Frankfurter came to the United States as a child. His ambitious mother dominated his young life, urging him to excel so he could rise up in the world; she fully believed in the American dream, and it was her drive that got the family out of the immigrant slums and into a better neighborhood. The brilliant Frankfurter easily excelled in public school and at City College, and then went to the Harvard Law School. There he learned a very important lesson, namely, that intelligence did matter, that there was a world in which those who could think clearly, logically, and quickly could do well. At Harvard, he later claimed, he discovered the democracy of merit, an idea that to him epitomized what America was all about.

After graduation he worked briefly—and unhappily—in a private law firm, and then eagerly accepted an offer to become an assistant to U.S. Attorney Henry L. Stimson. The patrician New Yorker would be an important influence in Frankfurter's life, opening to him the possibility of how exciting and rewarding a career in public service could be. He followed Stimson to Washington during the administrations of Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft. Stationed in the War Department, the gregarious Frankfurter soon met all the movers and shakers in the capital. He lived in a house on "I" Street with other young men, where people like Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., and Louis D. Brandeis would stop by to visit at what soon became known as the House of Truth. Both Holmes and Brandeis would become mentors to the young Frankfurter, and it was the latter who convinced him to accept an appointment at the Harvard Law School.

From the time Frankfurter joined the Harvard Law faculty in 1914 through the constitutional crisis of 1937, conservatives on the courts used the notion of substantive due process to strike down economic reform legislation they did not like. Led by Holmes and Brandeis, liberals called for judicial restraint, that is, for allowing legislatures wide discretion in policy-making provided no specific constitutional bar prohibited it. Frankfurter stood as the leading academic champion of judicial restraint, and at the time of his appointment, his friends expected—correctly—that he would not allow his personal economic views to thwart legislative will.

But what Frankfurter never understood—and Holmes and Brandeis had made very clear—was that whereas judges ought not to thwart legislative policy in economic matters, they had a special role to play in protecting individual liberties. This showed up in its most explicit form in the famous Footnote Four in the Carolene Products case, in which Harlan Fiske Stone said the courts should impose much higher scrutiny on legislation affecting civil rights and civil liberties than on economic regulation. Despite his great reverence for Holmes and Brandeis, Frankfurter did not absorb this lesson.

Frankfurter's earlier reputation is well deserved. Brandeis called him the "most useful lawyer in America." He had opposed A. Mitchell Palmer's Red Scare after World War I; he had taken over Brandeis's role as chief litigator for the Consumer's Union in defending protective legislation for workers; he had been the chief advocate in the most sensational case of the 1920s, the trial of two Italian immigrants, Sacco and Vanzetti, for payroll robbery and murder. Although there is still controversy over whether or not the two men were guilty, it was clear at the time that the two men had been arrested because they were immigrants and anarchists, and the trial was marked by gross prejudice on the part of the presiding judge. Frankfurter thought the entire episode a travesty of justice, and in his view either there should be a new trial with a fair and impartial judge or the two men should be pardoned. His defense of the two men made him a hero to liberals, but many misunderstood his position. The real crime, he believed, had been the perversion of the justice system; to some extent the guilt or innocence of the two men was secondary.

With the arrival of Franklin Roosevelt in the White House in 1933, he became one of the president's closest advisors and a one-man personnel agency stocking New Deal agencies with his former students from Harvard. He had been a member of the American Civil Liberties Union, as well as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and he had used the columns of the New Republic to attack judges deciding cases on personal predilection rather than the law.

Yet during most of this time Frankfurter had said little and written less about issues such as freedom of speech. In part this is understandable, since the Supreme Court's agenda through the early 1930s consisted mainly of economic matters; that agenda changed at about the time Frankfurter went on the Court, and so neither he nor his admirers would have expected the types of cases he would confront. However, one might get an idea of his views on this from a letter he wrote to Ellery Sedgewick, the editor of the Atlantic Monthly, regarding the attacks on him during the Sacco and Vanzetti controversy. He believed that his criticism of the judge and other public officials opened him to charges of seditious libel. He argued that while it would probably be politically unwise for the state to do so, he believed that it had the right and the power to act against those who attacked the actions of the state.

While on the Court, Frankfurter engaged in a running battle with Hugo Black for more than twenty years on two issues key to civil liberties—the incorporation of the Bill of Rights through the Fourteenth Amendment to apply to the states and the preferred position of the First Amendment, especially freedom of speech in the constitutional pantheon.

Brandeis had first suggested the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause included noneconomic liberties, and by 1939, the Court had made freedom of speech and press, as well as counsel in capital cases, applicable to the states. Then in Palko v. Connecticut (1938), Justice Cardozo had suggested that not all of the protections in the Bill of Rights should be incorporated, but only those that were fundamental to a free society. Frankfurter, who succeeded Cardozo on the Court, took up this theme and thus fought against any notion that all of the Bill of Rights applied to the states. In part, this belief stemmed not only from conservatism but also from a strong belief in federalism, and that under a federal system states ought to be given as much leeway as possible. Just as judicial restraint meant that judges did not interpose their economic views against Congress and state legislatures, so it also meant that states had the authority to limit rights in a manner denied to the national government.

In 1942, Frankfurter joined with a majority of the Court in declining to extend the right of counsel in Betts v. Brady and continued to oppose incorporation of that right throughout his years on the Court. Not until after he retired did the Court unanimously overrule Betts in the landmark decision of Gideon v. Wainwright (1963).

In 1947, the Court was asked to overrule Twining v. New Jersey (1908), in which it had held that a state law permitting comment on a defendant's refusal to testify did not violate procedural due process. Since that time, the Court had begun to incorporate parts of the Bill of Rights to apply to the states, and Frankfurter, in Adamson v. California, argued that the Fifth Amendment protection against testifying against oneself, or having the prosecution comment on it, did not apply to the states. The right against self-incrimination, he declared, did not constitute one of those fundamental principles inherent in "the concept of ordered liberty." In a concurring opinion that defined the notion of selective incorporation for the next two decades, Frankfurter spelled out his ideas of federalism, judicial restraint, and the notion that even in the areas of individual liberties courts should not second-guess the legislature.

Opposing him was Hugo Black, who after initially agreeing with Cardozo's Palko opinion, had come to the conclusion that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated totally all of the protections in the first eight amendments. The Court nominally followed the Cardozo–Frankfurter notion of "selective" incorporation, but in the end it was Black who triumphed, because the Court incorporated practically every protection in the Bill of Rights. In 1964, the Court overturned Adamson and incorporated the right against self-incrimination in Malloy v. Hogan and then a few years later carried it to even greater length in Miranda v. Arizona (1966).

Even when Frankfurter was willing to incorporate a provision, he did so in as restricted a manner as possible. He wrote the majority opinion in Wolf v. Colorado (1949), which in effect applied the warrant clause to the states but did so in as crabbed a manner as possible. Refusing to come right out and declare the Fourth Amendment protection incorporated, he found that unreasonable searches and seizures on the part of state officials violated the sue process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Although that clause was the basis of incorporation, here Frankfurter emphasized the procedural process elements. He also refused to apply the exclusionary clause, the only means of truly enforcing the warrant clause, against the states. Here again, his view was eventually rejected by the Court in Mapp v. Ohio (1961).

In terms of free speech, Frankfurter rarely voted to support the individual against efforts by the state to restrict it. In Carpenters' and Joiners' Union v. Ritter's Café (1942), he held that peaceful picketing enjoyed no immunity from state regulation, although the Court had earlier extended free speech protection in labor disputes. In what is perhaps his most notable speech opinion, he concurred with the majority in Dennis v. United States (1941), a case that has been universally condemned ever since. The Court convicted Communist Party leaders not of attempting to overthrow the government of the United States by force but of conspiring to teach about the idea of overthrowing the government. Although he personally abhorred the McCarthy witch hunt and the various loyalty programs, he believed that the First Amendment posed no barrier to Congress and the executive putting such programs into place.

Unlike Hugo Black and William O. Douglas, who took an absolutist view of the First Amendment Speech Clause, Frankfurter in effect saw no difference between the government's right to regulate economic activity and the regulation of expression. When Black suggested that the First Amendment held a "preferred position," Frankfurter wrote to Stanley Reed "Please tell me what kind of sense it makes that one provision of the Constitution is to be 'preferred' over another? The correlative of 'preference' is 'subordination,' and I know of no calculus to determine when one provision of the Constitution must yield to another."

To Frankfurter, as William O. Douglas correctly observed, the First Amendment was little more than a caution for moderation. This can be seen when a friend reminded him that during the 1920s, Frankfurter had voiced extremely unpopular opinions in defense of Sacco and Vanzetti. Frankfurter shot back that while it would have been poor policy for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to have put him in jail for what he did, it was clear to him that the state did in fact have the power to do so.

Although Frankfurter strongly believed in separation of church and state, and voted accordingly in Everson v. Board of Education of Ewing Township (1947), Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education (1948), and Zorach v. Clausen (1952), he apparently had little interest in the free exercise clause, as he displayed in the series of cases launched by Jehovah's Witnesses in the early 1940s.

In these cases, Frankfurter is best known for his opinions in the two flag salute cases. In Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940), he ruled for an eight-to-one Court that the state could force school children to salute the American flag, even if it went against their religious principles. He dismissed the free exercise argument out of hand, and in a telling phrase wrote: "To the legislature no less than to courts is committed the guardianship of deeply cherished liberties." In essence, courts should accept that legislatures were rights-protective and defer to their judgment. There has been a great deal of comment over this case, and a number of scholars have suggested that the real key to understanding Frankfurter's position is the fact that he was an immigrant and a super-patriot. America had been good to him; in Europe his brilliance would have done him little good, and doors would have been closed to him solely for the reason that he was a Jew. He had had his innate patriotism reinforced in his public school days, and he saw no reason why schools should not continue to do so, especially with the chances so high that the United States would soon be involved in another war. The so-called religious rights of a small and insignificant sect mattered little when balanced against the needs to promote love of country.

The resulting uproar over the Gobitis case, the increase on attacks on Witnesses, and the determination of the Witnesses to fight for their civil liberties brought one case after another to the high court, and in every one of them Frankfurter voted against the free exercise claim. Then in Jones v. Opelika (1942), Black, Douglas, and Murphy indicated that they had voted wrongly in Gobitis, and the following year the Court reheard the flag salute issue, this time finding for the Witnesses in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943). Justice Jackson wrote a ringing endorsement of the right of free thought, and Frankfurter wrote an anguished dissent noting that, although he belonged to "the most vilified and persecuted minority in history," the courts had no special business protecting minorities. The Framers of the Bill of Rights, he said, "knew that minorities may disrupt society."

Twenty years later Frankfurter still had no sympathy for minorities and voted against making exemption for religious Jewish merchants from Sunday closing laws in Braunfeld v. Brown (1961) and Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Market (1961).

Frankfurter was not a complete enemy of civil liberties, and even while opposing incorporation of the Fourth Amendment often wrote opinions denouncing the police for going too far in their zeal.

A good case in point is Rochin v. California (1952), in which he chastised the police for forcibly pumping a suspect's stomach to get incriminating evidence of drugs. And in the notorious Rosenberg case, Frankfurter throughout the ordeal was the only member of the Court to consistently argue that the two had not had a fair trial, and that the Court should review the proceedings.

Frankfurter was also a champion of civil rights and voted in every case that came before the Court during his tenure in support of the rights of black Americans. He named the first African-American clerk to the Court and worked out the strategy that led the Court to reconsider the Brown case so that Chief Justice Earl Warren would be able to develop a unanimous opinion. Unfortunately, Frankfurter also imposed the "all deliberate speed" formula on Brown II, although it is clear that by it he did not mean it to serve as an excuse for delay. And in Gomillion v. Lightfoot (1960), Frankfurter wrote the opinion striking down an Alabama gerrymandering scheme designed to deny black voters their rights.

That opinion, however, led to the overturn of an earlier Frankfurter opinion and in the end marked his departure from the Court with one of the great reversals of his career. In 1946, the Court heard a case challenging the failure of the State of Illinois to reapportion its election districts as required under the state constitution. The result was that although there had been great population shifts into the cities and their suburbs, the now under-populated rural areas still controlled the legislature, and refused to reapportion. In Colgrove v. Green (1946) Frankfurter, for a bare four to three majority, held the issue to be a "political question," and therefore not amendable to judicial resolution. He warned the courts to stay out of "the political thicket." In fact, four of the seven justices who heard the case did believe the matter justiciable, but Wiley Rutledge joined Frankfurter's opinion, because he did not believe there was sufficient time before the next election to resolve the case.

Then Frankfurter wrote the Gomillion opinion, and now people wondered why it was all right to strike down laws that discriminated against African Americans but not against urban residents. For Frankfurter the answer was clear—the Fifteenth Amendment addressed the issue specifically. But with the Warren Court's attack on segregation (in which Frankfurter joined) and the beginning of its due process revolution, it was only a matter of time before the question of apportionment came up before the high court again.

In Baker v. Carr (1962), the Court agreed that the question of mal-apportionment was justiciable and set the case down for argument on its merits in the following term. Frankfurter entered a bitter dissent, accusing the majority of going where it should not go. The answer, he said, lay with the legislature, completely ignoring the fact that a majority of the people could not get their way because the minority controlled the legislature and would not yield that power. What must have made his defeat even more galling was the fact that the majority opinion was written by his one-time student, William Brennan, who with great skill and craftsmanship completely demolished Frankfurter's argument in Colgrove.

Frankfurter had a stroke later in the year and was off the Court when it heard the apportionment cases and handed down a series of decisions requiring the states to reapportion on the basis of "one person, one vote." Frankfurter had warned that there was no judicially manageable formula by which courts could oversee reapportionment, but his longtime foe on the Court, William O. Douglas, came up with the catch phrase that not only garnered public support but also provided the judicial formula necessary.

Frankfurter's place in the history of civil liberties is mixed at best. A prisoner of the idea of judicial restraint that he and other reformers championed before the Court crisis of 1937, Frankfurter could never grasp the fact that rights belonging to the people, be they civil rights or civil liberties, are in a different class than simple economic regulations. Practically all of Frankfurter's opinions concerning incorporation and the Bill of Rights—especially relating to the First Amendment—have been overruled or otherwise discarded. Even conservative jurists now agree that, even if they do not use the phrase, the First Amendment does occupy a preferred position and that courts have to be vigilant in the protection of people's liberties. Frankfurter's great heroes—Holmes and Brandeis—understood that; regrettably he never did.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Hirsch, Harry N. The Enigma of Felix Frankfurter. New York: Basic Books, 1981.
- Kurland, Philip H., ed. Felix Frankfurter on the Supreme Court: Extrajudicial Essays on the Court and the Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971.
- Parrish, Michael E. Felix Frankfurter and His Times: The Reform Years. New York: Free Press, 1982.
- Silverstein, Mark. Constitutional Faiths: Felix Frankfurter, Hugo Black, and the Process of Judicial Decision-Making. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1984.
- Simon, James F. The Antagonists: Hugo Black, Felix Frankfurter, and Civil Liberties in Modern America. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Urofsky, Melvin I. Felix Frankfurter: Judicial Restraint and Individual Liberties. Boston: Twayne, 1992.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adamson v. California*, 332 U.S. 46 (1947)
- Baker v. Carr*, 369 U.S. 186 (1962)
- Betts v. Brady*, 316 U.S. 455 (1942)
- Braunfeld v. Brown*, 366 U.S. 599 (1961)
- Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka I*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka II*, 349 U.S. 294 (1955)
- Carpenters' and Joiners' Union v. Ritter's Café*, 315 U.S. 722 (1942)
- Colgrove v. Green*, 328 U.S. 549 (1946)
- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
- Everson v. Board of Education of Ewing Township*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Supermarket*, 366 U.S. 617 (1961)
- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
- Gomillion v. Lightfoot*, 364 U.S. 339 (1960)
- Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education*, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)
- Jones v. Opelika*, 316 U.S. 584 (1942)
- Malloy v. Hogan*, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
- Mapp v. Ohio*, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
- Minersville School District v. Gobitis*, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Palko v. Connecticut*, 302 U.S. 319 (1938)
- Rochin v. California*, 342 U.S. 165 (1952)
- Rosenberg v. United States*, 346 U.S. 273 (1955)
- Twining v. New Jersey*, 211 U.S. 78 (1908)
- United States v. Carolene Products Co.*, 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
- West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette*, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)
- Wolf v. Colorado*, 338 U.S. 25 (1949)
- Zorach v. Clausen*, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)

FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN (1706–1790)

Well-known as a printer, scientist, and inventor, Benjamin Franklin is less well-known as a civil rights champion. There was no more committed proponent of freedom of the press than Franklin, and he was active in the protest movement that began with the Stamp Act Crisis. It is often forgotten that Franklin held certain natural rights sacred, inasmuch as he explained in 1759, "They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."

Long an advocate of such Lockean ideas as the state of nature, the social contract, and natural law, Franklin particularly embraced Locke's reverence for life, liberty, and property. His actions during the Stamp Act Crisis and the Revolutionary period show that Franklin fully embraced the citizen's right to petition the government when government became tyrannical and to initiate revolution when all other means of reform failed. And Franklin's own writings indicate a particular respect for property and equality before the law. Although he was generally not given to profound political theory, and instead embraced the ideas of Locke and other theorists without expounding on them, he did feel compelled to write about property and equality (although he believed Parliament wrong for passing the Intolerable Acts after the Boston Tea Party, Franklin insisted that the activists should pay for the tea they had destroyed, because it was private property).

As a printer, Franklin also had a profound reverence for freedom of speech and the press. And his concern that citizens remain able to express thoughts, ideas, even criticisms through speech and media were well founded. James Franklin, Benjamin's older brother, had been jailed for a month when Franklin was sixteen for printing a piece that was critical of the Pennsylvania Assembly. Furthermore, he was forced to shut down his newspaper. To avoid actually closing the paper down, James transferred responsibility to young Benjamin, who published the New England Courant under his own name. So Franklin's concern was not merely academic.

Franklin was also assigned to Thomas Jefferson's committee to draft a Declaration of Independence. While Jefferson wrote the first draft himself, Franklin, John Adams, and the other members of the committee read it and offered suggestions before presenting it to the entire Continental Congress for further editing. It may be assumed, because Franklin left no explicit comment, that he approved of Jefferson's ideas of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

And it should not be forgotten that Franklin was a framer of the Constitution, as well. Indeed, he argued against property requirements of officeholders; he believed property qualifications would "debase the spirit of the common people." As the convention drew to a close and the time came for delegates to sign the document, Franklin stood and gave a speech. He expressed his belief that the document was not perfect and that he had some reservations but that he believed it better than any other government he knew of. He signed it, of course, and supported its ratification.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

Morgan, Edmund S. Benjamin Franklin. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2002.
Wright, Esmond, ed. Benjamin Franklin, A Profile. New York: Hill and Wang, 1970.

FREE EXERCISE CLAUSE (I): HISTORY, BACKGROUND, FRAMING

Along with the establishment clause, the free exercise clause is located at the beginning of the First Amendment: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof..." This article will provide a general guide to understanding the free exercise clause by describing the historical context in which it was drafted, the process by which it was drafted, and an overview of its interpretation and application.

Historical Background

During the time that North America was being explored and settled, England was grappling with the Protestant Reformation's extremely disruptive impact on English society and government. Henry VIII had broken with Rome and established an official Protestant Church of England, but when his eldest child, the devout Roman Catholic Mary Tudor, came to power, she began persecuting Protestants vigorously and drove their leaders into exile. The outright persecution of Mary's reign came to end when she was succeeded by her half-sister Elizabeth, who reestablished the Protestant identity of the Church of England. Queen Elizabeth I continually had to guard, however, against being overthrown by Mary Queen of Scots, who was intent on turning the nation back to Roman Catholicism.

Despite that Elizabeth had reestablished Protestantism in England, many Protestants, known as "Puritans," believed that the Church of England still needed to be cleansed of the residues of Roman Catholic belief and practice. When James I succeeded Elizabeth on her death in 1603, he resolved to suppress and drive the Puritans out. To avoid persecution under James I and his successor, Charles I, by the 1640s as many as 20,000 Puritans had sought refuge by fleeing to North America. Most of these Puritan emigrants congregated in New England; others spread as far south as the West Indies.

When Parliamentary leaders overthrew Charles I in the English Civil War, they ostensibly granted religious freedom to the entire nation, but this actually extended only to conformist Protestants. Catholics were excluded; Baptist ministers were imprisoned; and Protestant clergy who insisted on using the Anglican prayer book were ejected during this period. The official persecution of Protestant dissenters did not end until 1688, and Catholics remained subject to restrictions on political and military office throughout the eighteenth century.

Meanwhile, in the North American colonies, four distinctive approaches to resolving this extremely divisive question of the civil status of religion had been developing. As described by religion clause historian Michael McConnell, these four approaches ranged from the near theocracy of New England, at one end of the continuum; to the southern colonies where the state used religion as a means of social control; to the benign neglect of religion in New York and New Jersey; and finally to the four colonies founded as havens for religious dissenters, at the opposite end of the continuum.

In the New England colonies that the Puritans had founded, civil authorities suppressed any dissenters in an effort to force them to conform to Puritan beliefs and expectations. This approach led to Baptists being banished, dissenters being whipped or jailed, and four Quakers (who had returned after having been expelled) being hanged. Puritans continued to suppress dissenters until 1679, when, in response to a letter from King Charles II expressing support for “freedom and liberty of conscience” for all non-Catholic Christians, Puritan authorities halted the practice of imposing criminal punishments on those who refused to conform to Puritan beliefs and practices.

In most of the southern colonies, the Church of England had been established by order of the Crown and was financed and tightly controlled by the government. Although New England and the southern colonies were alike in maintaining religious establishments, in a more profound sense, as McConnell points out, these two types of systems are better understood as opposites. Whereas in New England the Puritans used government to make society conform to religious ideals, in the south the governing authorities and local gentry used religion to maintain their social status and control. This second approach is thus characterized by state domination of the church. By the eighteenth century, Virginia had become the most intolerant of all of the colonies. Georgia differed from the other southern colonies in that the authorities exhibited a remarkable degree of tolerance toward non-Anglican Protestants and Jews, although Catholics were detested and banned from the colony.

In New York and New Jersey, the official attitude toward religion was one of what McConnell describes as “benign neglect.” The populations of these two colonies were religiously quite diverse, and a de facto policy of religious toleration emerged, even in the four counties of metropolitan New York, where majorities had voted to establish the Church of England. In these areas, Protestants were free to live and worship as they chose, and Quakers and Jews were for the most part left alone.

Four colonies were intentionally founded as havens for religious dissenters. Maryland, the first of these, was founded by a Catholic proprietor as a haven from the persecution that Catholics were facing in England. Its founder, Lord Calvert, is credited with the first use of the term “free exercise” in an American legal document. In 1648, he instructed Maryland’s new Protestant governor and its councilors to promise to make sure that no Christian, “and in particular no Roman Catholic,” is disturbed in the “free exercise” of religion. The proprietor had previously used the term “free liberty of religion” in his attempts to attract Boston-area colonists to resettle in Maryland, but Massachusetts Governor John Winthrop had responded to the effect that no Bostonians were interested in religious “liberty.”

In 1649, Maryland’s Assembly followed Lord Calvert’s lead by enacting a statute that contained the phrase “free exercise.” This was North America’s first free exercise clause. The security of Catholics in Maryland changed radically, however, after the Glorious Revolution of 1688, which brought about the replacement of England’s Catholic King James II with the Protestants William and Mary and sparked a wave of anti-Catholicism in Maryland that led to the establishment of the Church of England there. Soon thereafter Maryland would come to rival Virginia for its lack of tolerance for religious dissenters.

Rhode Island was originally settled by Roger Williams in 1536, just to the south of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, from which Williams had been expelled for his differences with the Puritan authorities. The Rhode Island Charter of 1663 described the colony as a “lively experiment” with a “full liberty in religious concernments.” The Charter prohibited the infringement of civil liberty on the basis of “any differences in opinion in matters of religion,” and declared that residents may “freely and fully have and enjoy his and their own judgments and consciences, in matters of religious concernments.” Religious freedom in Rhode Island had its limits, however. Jews were barred from citizenship and Catholics from public office. Although in later times, many would come to admire Rhode Island’s “lively experiment” in religious liberty, during the colonial period neighboring New England colonists tended to see Rhode Island as an embarrassment, “the licentious Republic” and the “sink hole of New England.”

Despite Rhode Island’s negative reputation, its Charter of 1663 seems to have served as a model for the religious freedom provisions that were included in the original agreements between the proprietors and the prospective settlers of Carolina and New Jersey. These documents contained wording that was almost identical to the religious freedom provisions of the Rhode Island Charter of 1663. These provisions were later superseded by more limited religious freedom provisions for the colonies of North Carolina, South Carolina, and New Jersey, but after the Revolution, many of the new state constitutions seem to have drawn on the Rhode Island model.

In practice, it was probably the middle colonies that were the most influential examples of religious freedom on the later development of the free exercise clause. They established no church (except in the four counties of metropolitan New York), and welcomed persons from a wide range of religious traditions. Under William Penn's Charters of Privileges of 1701, Pennsylvania and Delaware provided for the religious freedom of all theists, while confining the holding of public office to Christians. Pennsylvania's reputation for religious tolerance contributed to the high level of immigration that it enjoyed, which was accompanied by widespread prosperity.

Following the Revolution, several of the states that had established the Church of England as colonies took swift steps to sever their official ties with the church. The new state constitutions of Georgia, New York, North Carolina, and South Carolina eliminated the provisions that had granted the Church of England special status and benefits. Going forward, South Carolina "established" the Protestant religion but provided churches no financial support; Georgia authorized a tax that would go to support the individual taxpayer's own denomination; and New York and North Carolina joined the middle colonies and Rhode Island with no establishment of religion.

Virginia and Maryland moved more gradually toward disestablishment after the Revolution. In 1776, the Virginia Declaration of Rights was adopted, which guaranteed for all the right to "the free exercise of religion," and the Virginia legislature suspended the collection of the compulsory taxes that had been supporting the Church of England. In 1779, these taxes were repealed, but the Church of England was not formally disestablished in Virginia until 1785. Virginia's post-Revolutionary free exercise protections, in practice, were not extended to Anglican clergy, who when they had been ordained in England were required to take an oath of allegiance to the crown. Anglican clergy who refused to violate their oaths after the Revolution were mobbed, beaten, and driven from their pulpits.

The Maryland Declaration of Rights of 1776 disestablished the Church of England, but it also authorized the legislature to impose a general tax "for the support of the Christian religion." The legislative battle over whether such a tax would be imposed lasted throughout the 1780s. Those who supported such an assessment were never able to prevail.

In 1786, the Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom, authored by Thomas Jefferson, was enacted, which prohibited any form of compulsory support of religion and guaranteed the rights of all to worship freely. By 1789, every state, with the exception of Connecticut, had enacted some form of protection for religious freedom, but Maryland and Delaware limited such protection to Christians, and five other states limited it to theists. According to McConnell, "These state constitutions provide the most direct evidence of the original understanding" of what would later be adopted as the Free exercise clause, "for it is reasonable to infer that those who drafted and adopted the first amendment assumed the term 'free exercise of religion' meant what it had meant in their states" (McConnell, 1456).

All of these state constitutional provisions contemplated the protection not only of belief but also of one's freedom to participate in religious activity. Four states described the scope of protection for religious activity in broad terms, but eight states limited such protection to acts of "worship." The First Amendment's Free exercise clause seems to have followed these four states' broader approach by not limiting the protection that it offers to "worship" activities. It also bears noting, however, that the limitation to "worship" in these eight states does not seem to have had any actual impact on the scope of free exercise protection in them.

Drafting

The federal free exercise clause emerged from the debate that surrounded the ratification of the Constitution of 1787 regarding whether or not that document should contain specific guarantees of individual liberties. The Federalists, proponents of the draft Constitution, contended that the inclusion of certain specific guarantees might be interpreted to mean that the other rights that the Constitution had sought to respect by carefully spelling out and limiting the scope of federal power should not also be protected. Their opponents, distrustful of federal power, insisted that specific guarantees were necessary.

Patrick Henry, among others, was concerned that the religious freedoms that had been forged at the state level might be overridden by the emerging federal government. John Leland, the leader of Virginia's Baptists, opposed ratification, because in his view religious freedom was not adequately protected by the Constitution in the form that it had been proposed. Rhode Island decided that it could not support ratification until an accompanying Bill of Rights had been drafted and put forward. Those in several other states who called for explicit constitutional guarantees of individual liberties eventually accepted the promise that a Bill of Rights would be drafted later in exchange for their votes for ratification.

James Madison had initially opposed the addition of specific guarantees of individual liberties in the new Constitution, but he came to accept them as a necessary compromise to ensure ratification. When he announced his candidacy for the first Congress under the new Constitution and learned that local Baptists were planning to support his opponent, James Monroe, Madison responded by pledging his support for express guarantees of all individual rights, including one that would fully protect religious liberty. This won the support of the Baptist leadership and tipped the election in his favor. Having helped Madison to get elected, Virginia's Baptists did not hesitate to remind him of their interest in religious liberty as he headed off to take his place in the first House of Representatives.

On arrival, Madison kept his word. He emerged as the foremost spokesperson for religious freedom in the first session of Congress. More than 200 state-sponsored proposals for constitutional guarantees of individual liberties had been received. Of these, which included five state-sponsored religious freedom proposals, Madison culled nineteen and added one of his own. Initially, he planned to work these amendments into the body of the existing Constitution rather than append them to it in the form of a Bill of Rights.

Madison chose not to put forward any of the religious freedom proposals submitted by the states. Instead, he advanced his own approach by suggesting that in Article I, section 10, the states should be prohibited from violating "the equal rights of conscience." With respect to the federal government, Madison proposed that to Article I, section 9, be added, "The civil rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, nor shall any national religion be established, nor shall the full and equal rights of conscience be in any manner, or under any pretext infringed."

Madison's initial formulation of what would become the First Amendment's religion clauses did not include the term "free exercise" of religion. Rather, in keeping with the laws of his own state and with three of the five state-submitted proposals, he favored protection for the freedom of "belief" and "worship" and of one's "rights of conscience."

Little was said during the recorded debates when the House took up the issue of religious freedom. Most of the controversy centered about what would become the establishment clause. To gain insight into the meaning that the drafters may have intended the free exercise clause to have, one must carefully analyze the wording of successive drafts of the religion clauses.

The House Select Committee that took up Madison's proposals initially shortened the religion clauses to read, "no religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed." The reference to protecting freedom of belief and worship was deleted. The phrase "free exercise of religion" made its first appearance in the amended version, as passed by the House and sent to the Senate: "Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed."

To this point, the phrases "rights of conscience" and "free exercise of religion" seem to have been used interchangeably. The inclusion of both in the version passed by the House suggests that some thought it necessary to use both terms.

The version that was sent to the Senate used a form of the verb "prohibit" rather than "infringe," as the prior drafts had used. Because this change was made after the close of recorded debate, we have no direct evidence of the reason for it. In a contemporary case, Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association (1988), the Supreme Court interpreted this switch from protection against infringements of free exercise to a ban on prohibitions of religious activity to mean that only laws that make the practice of religion unlawful or impossible are forbidden under the free exercise clause. According to the Court in Lyng, the free exercise clause is not violated if the practice of religion is merely made more difficult. McConnell has concluded, however, on the basis of the available evidence, that the Lyng Court's narrow interpretation of "prohibiting" is not justified, and that the verb should be given approximately the same meaning as "infringing."

In the Senate, Madison's idea about prohibiting the states from violating equal rights of conscience was not supported, presumably out of deference to states' rights. This effectively ended the First Congress' consideration of that possibility. Turning to the House's proposal pertaining to the federal government, the Senate initially amended it to refer only to the "rights of conscience," but then settled on a version that referred to the "free exercise of religion" instead: "Congress shall make no law establishing articles of faith or a mode of worship, or prohibiting the free exercise of religion. . . ."

Without direct evidence of the rationale for this change, since it occurred after the close of recorded debate, one could infer that "rights of conscience" was deleted because it was viewed as redundant, or (as a few expressed during the recorded portions of debate) that some were concerned to avoid establishing protection for claims of conscience based on something other than religion. Although the distinction in Free Exercise law between religiously based and non-religiously based rights of conscience has been criticized in academic circles, as McConnell points out, it makes no difference whether “rights of conscience” was deleted because it was redundant or because of concern about the extension of protection to nonreligious matters of conscience. Neither explanation offers any support for the view that the free exercise clause protection must be provided in secular matters of conscience. Either the scope of “free exercise of religion” is coextensive with that of “rights of conscience,” or it is not. Either way, by settling on “free exercise of religion,” Congress eliminated any textual support for the view that secular rights of conscience should be protected under the free exercise clause.

A conference committee, which included James Madison, then reconciled the differences between the House and Senate versions. The only change pertaining to the free exercise clause was that the Conference Committee eliminated the Senate version’s references to “articles of faith” and “a mode of worship” and replaced them simply with “religion.” This meant that the Senate’s ban on “prohibiting the free exercise of religion” could be shortened to “prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” The conference committee’s version was passed by Congress in 1789 and ratified by the states in 1791: “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.”

The First Congress had developed a constitutional guarantee for religious freedom that contains two complementary clauses: the establishment clause, which seeks to prevent governmental imposition of religion; and the free exercise clause, which seeks to prevent governmental imposition on religion. Or as John Witte describes it in Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment, the establishment clause prohibits the government from prescribing religion, and the free exercise clause prohibits the government from proscribing religion.

Interpretation and Application

Prior to 1940, courts interpreted the religion clauses of the First Amendment as limitations on federal power only, not applicable to the states. It was not until its 1940 decision in Cantwell v. Connecticut that the United States Supreme Court held the free exercise clause to apply to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment.

Even after Cantwell, virtually all cases finding a free exercise violation involved governmental restrictions on religious speech or belief. The distinction between a high level of free exercise protection for religious belief, versus a much lower level of protection for the practice of those beliefs in terms of religious conduct, originated in the Court’s very first free exercise clause case, Reynolds v. United States (1879). In Reynolds, the Court refused to grant free exercise protection to a Mormon who had been convicted under a federal statute that made polygamy a crime. Although a number of Free exercise scholars, including McConnell (1998), have come to view the Reynolds decision as wrongly decided, its emphasis on the distinction between religious belief and conduct would be reaffirmed as recently as the Court’s 1990 decision in Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, which is discussed later.

It was not until 1963 that the Court found a general government regulation of conduct, enacted for secular purposes, to violate the free exercise clause in circumstances in which such a regulation conflicted with the freedom to exercise one’s faith. In Sherbert v. Verner (1963), the Court upheld the unemployment compensation rights of a Seventh Day Adventist factory worker who was discharged for engaging in religiously motivated conduct, by refusing to work on Saturday, in accordance with her beliefs.

In so doing, the Court applied what has come to be known as the “strict scrutiny” test for free exercise claims. The Court first asked whether some “compelling state interest” justifies the governmental infringement of religious freedom. Even if such a compelling interest were found, under this test the state would still have to demonstrate that “no alternative forms of regulation would combat such abuses without infringing First Amendment rights.”

The “high water mark” for free exercise clause protection, according to constitutional scholar Jesse Choper, came in Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972), when the Court used the strict scrutiny test outside the context of an unemployment compensation dispute (Choper, 657). In Yoder, the Court found that the state had no compelling interest in enforcing its compulsory public education laws on Amish children whose parents did not want to expose their children to the influence of public education beyond the eighth grade. The decision in Yoder reaffirmed the Sherbert rule, that the strict scrutiny test is to be applied even when alleged free exercise violations result from the application of a religiously neutral governmental regulation that was enacted for secular reasons.

In the wake of Sherbert and Yoder, however, the Court rejected nearly all of the free exercise claims it considered. Then, in Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith (1990), the Court ruled the strict scrutiny test inapplicable to challenges brought against generally applicable regulations, enacted for secular reasons, that restrict the freedom to exercise one's faith. Smith, like Sherbert, arose in the context of an unemployment compensation dispute. In Smith, two Native American drug counselors were dismissed from their employment for having ingested peyote as a part of a Native American religious ceremony. They argued that the sacramental use of peyote should not disqualify them from receiving unemployment benefits as work-related "misconduct." Justice Blackmun agreed, in dissent, finding that Oregon had not advanced any state interest compelling enough to meet the demands of the strict scrutiny test.

Justice Scalia's opinion for the Court, however, asserted that the strict scrutiny test had been applied in challenges to generally applicable laws only when the free exercise clause was implicated along with other constitutional protections, such as freedom of speech. Justice Scalia thus refused to apply the strict scrutiny test to the drug counselors' claims. Justice Scalia conceded that, as a result of the Court's decision in Smith, accommodation of free exercise interests would need to be sought through the political process, which "may fairly be said . . . [to] place at a relative disadvantage those religious practices that are not widely engaged in. . . ." Smaller, less influential religious groups are not protected by the free exercise clause against the risk of being subjected to legislation that seriously restricts their freedom to practice their beliefs.

Justice Scalia's opinion in Smith did not, however, undermine the availability of free exercise protection against intentional discriminatory measures aimed by government at regulating the conduct of specific religious groups. Accordingly, in Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah (1993), the Court struck down a city ordinance targeted at prohibiting the ritual sacrifice of animals according to the Santeria religion.

Congress has attempted to restore the type of free exercise protection offered by the strict scrutiny test to the extent that to do so lies within its power. In 1993, it enacted the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), which would have reestablished strict scrutiny protection for free exercise claims. In City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), however, the Supreme Court struck RFRA down, on the grounds that in enacting RFRA Congress had violated federalism and separation of powers principles. In 2000, Congress responded by enacting the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). More narrowly focused than RFRA, RLUIPA reestablishes strict scrutiny protection for free exercise claims arising in the context of land use regulations and the treatment of institutionalized persons. To date, RLUIPA's constitutionality has been upheld.

DAVID T. BALL

References and Further Reading

- Choper, Jesse, The Rise and Decline of the Constitutional Protection of Religious Liberty, Nebraska Law Review 70 (1991): 651–688.
- Cobb, Sanford H. The Rise of Religious Liberty in America: A History. New York: Macmillan, 1902.
- Hutson, James H. Religion and the Founding of the American Republic. Washington, D.C.: Library of Congress, 1998.
- Lupu, Ira C., Where Rights Begin: The Problem of Burdens on the Free Exercise of Religion, Harvard Law Review 102 (1989): 933–990.
- McConnell, Michael W. What would it mean to have a 'First Amendment' for sexual orientation? in Olyan, Saul M., and Martha C. Nussbaum, eds. Sexual Orientation & Human Rights in American Religious Discourse. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998, p. 249.
- , The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, Harvard Law Review 103 (1990): 1409–1517.
- McLoughlin, William G. New England Dissent, 1630–1833: The Baptists and the Separation of Church and State. 2 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1971.
- Witte, John, Jr. Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment: Essential Rights and Liberties. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
- Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah*, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)
- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
- Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Lynn v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association*, 485 U.S. 439 (1988)
- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145 (1879)
- Sherbert v. Verner*, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
- Wisconsin v. Yoder*, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

See also Baptists in Early America; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing

FREE EXERCISE CLAUSE DOCTRINE: SUPREME COURT JURISPRUDENCE

The free exercise clause of the First Amendment provides that Congress shall "make no law . . . prohibiting the free exercise" of religion. The application of the free exercise clause to a person's religious beliefs is relatively noncontroversial, because the United States Supreme Court has held that the state cannot penalize a person on account of his or her beliefs. For example, in Torcaso v. Watkins (1961), the Court held that the state of Maryland could not condition the right to hold public office on whether a person believed in God. More controversial has been the application of the free exercise clause to religiously motivated conduct. In recent years, the Supreme Court has made clear that if the state prohibits certain conduct for the purpose of disadvantaging a particular religion, then it violates the free exercise clause. In Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah (1993), for example, the Court considered the constitutionality of several municipal ordinances that prohibited the slaughtering of animals in certain circumstances. The City of Hialeah, Florida, had promulgated these ordinances in response to an increase in the number of practitioners of the Santeria religion who engaged in a variety of practices and rituals, including animal sacrifice, that many non-Santerians found offensive. The Santerians argued that the ordinances violated their free exercise clause rights. The Court agreed, concluding “that suppression of the central elements of the Santeria worship service was the object of the ordinances.” Because the ordinances were not “neutral” in their purpose with respect to religion, the Court found that they violated the free exercise clause.

More controversial—indeed, the most frequently litigated free exercise clause issue at the Supreme Court during the past half century—has been the question whether the state is obliged to give exemptions from neutral and generally applicable regulatory laws to individuals for whom those laws burden the exercise of their religion. The question whether an “accommodation”—an exemption from a regulatory provision—is sometimes required has dominated free exercise clause jurisprudence for much of the past half century.

The Supreme Court first considered the question of exemptions from generally applicable regulatory statutes in Reynolds v. United States (1878), a case involving the constitutionality of a congressional statute governing the Territory of Utah that made it a crime for a person to have more than one spouse. This criminal prohibition conflicted with the religious obligations of members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (the Mormons) whose church doctrine at that time provided that it was a “duty of male members of said church, circumstances permitting, to practise polygamy.” Reynolds, a Mormon who had engaged in plural marriage, was convicted of violating that statute.

The question for the Court in Reynolds was whether “religious belief can be accepted as a justification of an overt act made criminal by the law of the land.” In holding that enforcement of the criminal prohibition on polygamy against Reynolds did not violate his free exercise clause rights, the Court, with Chief Justice Morrison Waite writing, cited Thomas Jefferson for his “belief-action” distinction: religious beliefs and opinions enjoy greater protection from governmental interference than do religiously motivated actions. In his Bill for the Establishment of Religious Freedom, Jefferson had written that to permit “the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion, and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles on supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy which at once destroys all religious liberty,” but that it was legitimate for the magistrate “to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order.” Moreover, in his famous 1802 letter to the Danbury Baptists, Jefferson had written that “[b]elieving with you that religion is a matter which lies solely between man and his God; . . . the legislative powers of the government reach actions only, and not opinions.” The Reynolds Court placed great weight on the views of Jefferson: “Coming as this does from an acknowledged leader of the advocates of the [free exercise clause], it may be accepted almost as an authoritative declaration of the scope and effect of the amendment thus secured. Congress was deprived of all legislative power over mere opinion, but was left free to reach actions which were in violation of social duties or subversive good order. . . . To permit [an exemption] would be to make the professed doctrines of religious belief superior to the law of the land, and in effect to permit every citizen to come a law unto himself.” Accordingly, the Court enforced the criminal sanction against Reynolds.

The Court in Reynolds concluded that the free exercise clause did not compel an exemption from regulatory statutes for religiously motivated conduct. Because the free exercise clause restrained only Congress, few cases arose under the clause, and the Court had limited opportunity to revisit its decision in Reynolds. After the Court incorporated the free exercise clause against the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940), free exercise clause claims became far more common on the Court’s docket. Since its decision in Cantwell, the Court’s position on the application of the free exercise clause to religiously motivated conduct has ebbed and flowed.

In Cantwell, some Jehovah’s Witnesses in New Haven, Connecticut, had been convicted of, among other things, soliciting without a license and “inciting a breach of peace” by playing an anti-Catholic phonograph record on the street in a Catholic neighborhood. Citing Reynolds, the Court, with Justice Owen Roberts writing, reasserted the distinction between “freedom to believe and freedom to act.” The Court noted that “the first is absolute but, in the nature of things, the second cannot be. Conduct remains subject to regulation for the protection of society.” But the Court went on to say that “the power to regulate must be so exercised as not, in attaining a permissible end, unduly to infringe the protected freedom.” In suggesting that some prohibitions on religiously motivated conduct might “unduly infringe” free exercise clause rights, the Court invited a “weighing of two conflicting interests”: the state’s interest “in the preservation and protection of peace and good order” and the Jehovah’s Witnesses’ interest in “free communication of views, religious or other.” The Court, on weighing these interests, ruled in favor of the Jehovah’s Witnesses.

During the 1960s and 1970s, the Court extended the constitutional protection of religiously motivated conduct in two landmark cases. In Sherbert v. Verner (1963), the Court considered whether the free exercise clause compelled an exemption from a neutral and generally applicable regulatory statute for a person’s religiously motivated conduct. Sherbert, a Seventh-Day Adventist employed at a South Carolina textile mill, refused to work on Saturday, her church’s Sabbath, when her employer rearranged her schedule requiring such work. As a result, the textile mill terminated her employment. Sherbert applied for unemployment benefits, but refused all job opportunities that required her to work on Saturday. The state Employment Security Commission denied her benefits claim because she had failed “without good cause, to accept available suitable work when offered.”

The Supreme Court, with Justice William Brennan writing, held that the denial of unemployment benefits to Sherbert violated the free exercise clause as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court found that the South Carolina unemployment scheme imposed a burden on Sherbert by forcing her “to choose between following the precepts of her religion and forfeiting benefits, on the one hand, and abandoning one of the precepts of her religion to accept work, on the other hand. Government imposition of such a choice puts the same kind of burden on the free exercise of religion as would a fine imposed against appellant for her Saturday worship.” Having found that the unemployment system imposed a burden on Sherbert’s free exercise right, the Court then considered whether the government had a “compelling state interest” for imposing this burden. The Court stated that in this “highly sensitive constitutional area,” only “the gravest abuses, endangering paramount interests, give occasion [to the government] for permissible limitation.” The government justified the denial by asserting an interest in preventing “the filing of fraudulent claims by unscrupulous claimants feigning religious objections to Saturday work” that might “not only dilute the unemployment compensation fund but also hinder the scheduling by employers of necessary Saturday work.” The Court concluded, however, that there was no evidence questioning the sincerity of Sherbert’s motives and that “even if the possibility of spurious claims did threaten to dilute the [unemployment insurance] fund and disrupt the scheduling of work, it would be plainly incumbent upon [the state] to demonstrate that no alternative forms of regulations would combat such abuses without infringing First Amendment rights.”

In dissent, Justice John Harlan, joined by Justice Byron White, rejected such a broad reading of the free exercise clause. Justice Harlan concluded that those “situations in which the Constitution may require special treatment on account of religion are, in my view, few and far between.” He rejected “the conclusion that the State is constitutionally compelled to carve out an exception to its general rule of eligibility in the present case.” Thus, for Justices Harlan and White, the resolution of the question of accommodating religious practices by granting exemptions from neutral and generally applicable regulatory laws should be left to the discretion of the political branches. Almost thirty years later, a majority of the Supreme Court would come to agree with them.

Nine years after Sherbert, the Supreme Court reconsidered the question of constitutionally compelled exemptions for religiously motivated conduct. In Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972), the Court considered the refusal of Yoder, a member of the Old Order Amish, to send his children to school after they completed the eighth grade. Wisconsin required school attendance until age sixteen and refused to grant Yoder’s two children an exemption from that requirement. (Yoder’s children, although they had completed eighth grade, had not yet reached age sixteen.) Yoder objected to the formal education of his children beyond the eighth grade on religious grounds, contending that high school emphasized “intellectual and scientific accomplishments, self-distinction, competitiveness, worldly success, and social life with other students” as opposed to the Amish emphasis on “informal learning-through-doing,” “wisdom, rather than technical knowledge,” and “community welfare, rather than competition.” The Supreme Court, with Chief Justice Warren Burger writing, acknowledged the state’s “interest in universal education,” but concluded that that interest did not outweigh the Amish’s religiously motivated desire to direct the education of their children as they saw fit.

After Sherbert and Yoder, the government was constitutionally compelled to grant an exemption from neutral, generally applicable regulatory statutes to persons claiming an infringement on their free exercise rights unless the government had a compelling interest in uniform enforcement and there was no less restrictive means of fulfilling the government’s interest. Thereafter, in a few unemployment benefit cases in which a person had quit his or her job for religious reasons, the Court required an exemption. For example in Thomas v. Review Board (1981), the Court held that a state could not deny unemployment benefits to an employee who quit his job rather than accept a transfer to a section of the employer's factory that produced armaments when the employee had religious objections to that type of work. Similarly, in Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Commission (1987), the Court held that a state could not deny unemployment benefits to an employee who was fired for refusing to work on her Saturday Sabbath—similar to the employee in Sherbert v. Verner. Two years later, in Frazee v. Illinois Department of Income Security (1989), the Court held that a state could not deny unemployment benefits to an employee who refused to work on Sunday because of a religious objection to such work.

In all other free exercise clause cases that it considered during the 1970s and 1980s, however, the Court refused to grant exemptions from neutral and generally applicable regulatory laws, despite the burden the enforcement of such laws placed on religiously motivated persons. For example, in United States v. Lee (1982), the Court rejected a challenge by an Amish taxpayer to the required payment of Social Security taxes. The Amish taxpayer argued that the Amish believe it “sinful not to provide for their own elderly and therefore are religiously opposed to the national social security system.” The Court held that mandatory participation in the social security system was “indispensable” to its fiscal vitality and that burdening the free exercise rights of the Amish taxpayer was therefore “essential to accomplish an overriding governmental interest.”

In Bob Jones University v. United States (1983), the Court held that the federal government's refusal to grant tax exempt status to a private religious college that engaged in racial discrimination did not violate the free exercise clause, even though the college's racially discriminatory policies were motivated by its religious beliefs. The Court noted that “the Government has a fundamental, overriding interest in eradicating racial discrimination in education” that “substantially outweighs whatever burden denial of tax benefits places on petitioners' exercise of their religious beliefs.” The Court further held that the elimination of racial discrimination was a “compelling government interest” and that “no less restrictive means are available to achieve the government interest.”

Other free exercise clause claimants also lost their challenges to generally applicable governmental regulations. In Goldman v. Weinberger (1986), the Court refused to grant an Orthodox Jew who wished to wear a yarmulke an exemption from an Air Force dress code requirement that barred members of the Air Force from wearing headgear indoors, citing the military's need for uniformity. In Bowen v. Roy (1986), the Court rejected a free exercise clause challenge to a requirement that individuals must provide Social Security numbers to receive welfare benefits. The Court emphasized that the “free exercise clause simply cannot be understood to require the Government to conduct its own affairs in ways that comport with the religious beliefs of particular citizens.” In O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz (1987), the Court rejected a prisoner's free exercise clause challenge to a neutral prison work policy that impeded the ability of Muslim prisoners to attend certain religious exercises. The Court relied on the prison's articulated need for the policy to reject the free exercise clause claim. As the Court had deferred to the military in Goldman, so the Court deferred to prison officials in O'Lone.

In Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association (1988), the Court considered a variation on the traditional free exercise claim to an exemption from a regulatory statute. In Lyng, the government proposed the construction of a road and the harvesting of timber in a portion of a National Forest that was a sacred religious site for three Native American tribes. The tribes claimed that the traffic, noise, and logging threatened to render impossible the exercise of their religion on the sacred land in question. The Court rejected the claim, holding that the free exercise clause rights of the tribes “do not divest the Government of its right to use what is, after all, its land.”

In the meantime, both Congress and various state legislatures granted literally hundreds of statutory exemptions from generally applicable regulatory laws for individuals whose otherwise prohibited conduct was religiously motivated. But some critics questioned whether religiously motivated individuals should receive exemptions from regulatory laws that would be denied to persons motivated by non-religious reasons. Why, for example, should a person retain eligibility for unemployment benefits on refusing Saturday work for religious reasons, whereas a person who refuses such work to spend time with his family is denied benefits? Some argued that the granting of exemptions for persons whose conduct is religiously motivated constituted an unconstitutional state preference for religion in violation of the establishment clause.

The Court addressed this question in Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos (1987). In Amos, a Mormon owned-and-operated gymnasium fired a worker because he failed to secure a “temple recommend”—a necessary endorsement from the Mormon. The worker alleged a violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that prohibits, among other things, employment discrimination based on religion. The church defended on the grounds that the Civil Rights Act expressly granted religious organizations an exemption from the prohibition on religious discrimination. The question for the Court was whether this statutory exemption, which gave preferential status to religious organizations, violated the establishment clause. The Court held that it did not. First, the Court found that the exemption did not have the purpose of advancing religion; rather, it had the secular purpose of allowing religious groups to carry out their mission unfettered by government regulation. Second, the Court found that the exemption did not have the effect of advancing religion. (Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, in her concurrence, argued that the exemption did have the effect of advancing religion, but that the exemption did not constitute an "endorsement" of religion and hence was not unconstitutional.) After Amos, both Congress and state legislatures were free to grant statutory exemptions to religious organizations or to religiously motivated individuals from neutral and generally applicable regulatory laws without offending the establishment clause.

Three years later, in Employment Division v. Smith (1990), the Court revisited the question whether a religiously motivated person had a constitutional right under the free exercise clause to an exemption from a neutral and generally applicable regulatory law. At issue in Smith was whether the state of Oregon properly withheld unemployment benefits from two Native Americans who were discharged from their jobs because they smoked peyote—a substance prohibited under Oregon law. The Native Americans, who had smoked the peyote as part of a religious ceremony, argued that the denial of unemployment benefits violated their rights under the free exercise clause. The Court rejected their claim, concluding that the free exercise clause afforded no such exemption from laws that were neutral and generally applicable and that did not infringe any other constitutional right—even if such laws imposed a substantial burden on the free exercise of religion for certain persons. The Smith decision constituted an important shift in the Court's free exercise clause doctrine, foreclosing constitutional claims for an exemption from neutral and generally applicable regulatory laws that interfered with a person's religiously motivated conduct. After Smith, such persons would need to appeal to the legislative process for relief from a regulatory statute.

The Court's decision in Smith sparked a significant political fight eventually capturing congressional attention. In 1993, Congress enacted the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) by an overwhelming margin in response to the Smith decision. In this statute, Congress provided that "Government may substantially burden a person's exercise of religion only if it demonstrates that application of the burden to the person (1) is in furtherance of a compelling governmental interest; and (2) is the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest." In doing so, Congress made clear that it sought to restore the legal landscape that existed prior to the Court's decision in Smith. Specifically, Congress found that "in Employment Division v. Smith, the Supreme Court virtually eliminated the requirement that the government justify burdens on religious exercise imposed by laws neutral toward religion." Congress stated that its purpose in enacting RFRA was "to restore the compelling interest test as set forth in Sherbert v. Verner and Wisconsin v. Yoder and to guarantee its application in all cases where free exercise of religion is substantially burdened."

But in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), the Court found RFRA to be an unconstitutional exercise of congressional power to the extent that it applied to state and local governments. (Lower courts have found RFRA constitutional as applied to the federal government.) Congress had justified RFRA's limitation on state and local governments by relying on its power under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment that gave Congress authority to enact legislation for the purpose of preventing state violations of Section 1 of that amendment. Because the Supreme Court had previously held that state restraints on the free exercise of religion violated the due process clause of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress concluded that it had power under Section 5 to prohibit state and local governments from burdening the free exercise of religion unless they could justify such burdens by reference to a compelling state interest. The problem was that Congress in RFRA defined free exercise rights more expansively than had the Court in Smith. As a result, in City of Boerne, the Court found RFRA unconstitutional as applied to state and local governments. To the Court, Section 5 permitted Congress to redress free exercise clause violations as defined by the Court—not to define free exercise rights more expansively than the Court had done in Employment Division v. Smith. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Congress had exceeded its Section 5 power.

In response to City of Boerne, Congress took further action. Relying on its constitutional power to regular interstate commerce, Congress in 2000 enacted the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) that provided that land use regulations (such as zoning) and regulations governing institutionalized persons (primarily in prisons and mental hospitals) may not “substantially burden” the exercise of religion unless the state has a “compelling interest.” Although RLUIPA is more limited in its scope than is RFRA, it restored some of the protections that Congress had provided in the earlier statute.

Today, if a person or religious organization seeks an exemption from a neutral and generally applicable law that prohibits its religiously motivated conduct, it must appeal to the legislative process because the free exercise clause no longer affords relief (unless the statute in question infringes another constitutional protection, such as the Free Speech Clause). Rather, the free exercise clause provides protection from outright restraints on religious belief or restraints on conduct that are motivated by a desire to disadvantage a particular religion.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Duncan, Richard F., Free Exercise is Dead; Long Live Free Exercise: Smith, Lukumi, and the General Applicability Requirement, University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law 3 (2001): 850–884.
- Gordon, James D., The New Free exercise clause, Capital University Law Review 26 (1997): 65–92.
- Hamilton, Marci A., The First Amendment's Challenge Function and the Confusion in the Supreme Court's Contemporary Free Exercise Jurisprudence, Georgia Law Review 29 (1994) 81–135.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bob Jones University v. United States*, 461 U.S. 574 (1983)
- Bowen v. Roy*, 476 U.S. 693 (1986)
- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
- Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah*, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)
- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
- Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos*, 483 U.S. 327 (1987)
- Frazee v. Illinois Department of Income Security*, 489 U.S. 829 (1989)
- Goldman v. Weinberger*, 475 U.S. 503 (1986)
- Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Commission*, 480 U.S. 136 (1987)
- Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association*, 485 U.S. 439 (1988)
- O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz*, 482 U.S. 342 (1987)
- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
- Sherbert v. Verner*, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
- Thomas v. Review Board*, 450 U.S. 707 (1981)
- Torcaso v. Watkins*, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)
- United States v. Lee*, 455 U.S. 252 (1982)
- Wisconsin v. Yoder*, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

See also Accommodations of Religion; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing

FREE PRESS/FAIR TRIAL

Under the United States Constitution, there has always been tension between the right of a criminal defendant to a fair trial, untainted by excessive and prejudicial publicity, and the press' right to report on criminal proceedings.

The landmark decision is Sheppard v. Maxwell, 383 U.S. 333 (1966). That case involved Dr. Sam Sheppard who was convicted of murdering his wife and children under sensational circumstances, and who claimed that he was unfairly convicted based on excessive and prejudicial pretrial publicity. In reviewing Sheppard's conviction, the Court began by emphasizing the importance of a free press to society, as well as to the criminal justice process, noting that the “press does not simply publish information about trials but guards against the miscarriage of justice by subjecting the police, prosecutors, and judicial processes to extensive public scrutiny and criticism.” However, the Court also recognized that every criminal defendant is entitled to a fair trial and that freedom of speech (especially excessive reporting) has the potential to subvert the criminal justice process. The Court held that the criminal justice process is subverted when there is a violation of the “requirement that the jury's verdict be based on evidence received in open court, not from outside [sources].” In other words, defendant was entitled to have his or her case tried by the jury without the effect of excessive and prejudicial pretrial publicity. In Sheppard, the Court found that defendant's rights had not been sufficiently protected, because “bedlam reigned at the courthouse during the trial and newsmen took over practically the entire courtroom, hounding most of the participants in the trial, especially Sheppard.” Throughout the preindictment investigation and the nine-week trial, “circulation-conscious editors catered to the insatiable interest of the American public in the bizarre.” In this atmosphere of a “‘Roman holiday’ for the news media, Sam Sheppard stood trial for his life.”

After Sheppard, even though the courts had the duty and obligation to mitigate the effects of publicity on the criminal justice process, it was unclear how that objective was to be accomplished. In Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976), in a highly sensational murder case, the trial judge became concerned that “because of the nature of the crimes charged in the complaint that there is a clear and present danger that pretrial publicity could impinge upon the defendant's right to a fair trial.” In an effort to limit the impact of the publicity on the trial, the judge entered a gag order restraining the press from publishing or broadcasting accounts of confessions or admissions made by the accused or facts “strongly implicative” of the accused. However, the U.S. Supreme Court concluded that the trial court had gone too far. The Court emphasized the importance of the press to the criminal justice process, noting that a “responsible press has always been regarded as the handmaiden of effective judicial administration, especially in the criminal field.... The press does not simply publish information about trials but guards against the miscarriage of justice by subjecting the police, prosecutors, and judicial processes to extensive public scrutiny and criticism.” In addition, the Court emphasized the importance of a free press noting that it had “learned, and continue to learn, from what we view as the unhappy experiences of other nations where government has been allowed to meddle in the internal editorial affairs of newspapers. Regardless of how beneficent-sounding the purposes of controlling the press might be.”

In Nebraska Press, the Court did not rule out the possibility of a gag order in a criminal case. However, it concluded that a much stronger showing of necessity must be made. In deciding whether to grant a gag order, the trial court must consider three factors: “(a) the nature and extent of pretrial news coverage; (b) whether other measures would be likely to mitigate the effects of unrestrained pretrial publicity; and (c) how effectively a restraining order would operate to prevent the threatened danger.” Although the Court concluded that the Nebraska Press case involved significant danger of excessive pretrial news coverage, it concluded that there was insufficient evidence regarding whether alternatives to a gag order might not be sufficient.

After the holding in Stuart, it has been widely recognized that courts should avoid entering gag orders restricting trial coverage and should instead use other means for protecting defendants against the possible adverse impact of prejudicial trial publicity. These other measures, originally cataloged in Sheppard but reaffirmed in Stuart, include the following. First, the trial court can order a change of venue when the glare of publicity is too great. In a locale that is removed from the publicity, the court is more likely to be able to seat an unbiased jury, and the defendant is more likely to receive a fair trial. Second, the court can postpone a defendant’s trial until press interest is less intense and public attention has sufficiently subsided. Third, as part of the voir dire process, the trial judge and the attorneys can ask searching questions of prospective jurors in an effort to screen out jurors who have been unduly prejudiced by pretrial publicity. Fourth, and additionally, a trial judge can provide the jury with clear and emphatic instructions regarding their duty to disregard media speculation and to decide the case based only on evidence presented in open court. Fifth, in an appropriate case, the trial court can sequester jurors to insulate them against the effects of publicity. In other words, courts must strive to maximize the possibility of press coverage while using other methods to protect the defendant’s right to a fair trial.

RUSSELL L. WEAVER

References and Further Reading

- Weaver, Russell L., and Arthur E. Hellman. The First Amendment: Cases, Materials & Problems. LexisNexis (2002): 747–761.
- Weaver, Russell L., and Donald E. Lively. Understanding the First Amendment. LexisNexis, (2003): 217–229.

FREE SPEECH IN PRIVATE CORPORATIONS

Writers and speakers are often dependent on corporate publishers or corporate-owned locales to be heard. Business corporations use their economic power to participate in the political process through lobbying, news media, contributions, and political campaigns.

The Tillman Act (1907) barred corporate contributions to federal candidates, expressing a view that corporations were not legitimate political actors. The courts restricted the ban and its state equivalents to a limited core. The current statute specifically permits corporations to use corporate money to staff political action committees so long as the funds transferred to candidates are derived from employee contributions (FECA, 2 U.S.C. § 441[b]).

Generally, First Amendment law does not distinguish between corporate and human speakers. Thus, governmental restriction of corporate funds used for lobbying, “public education” and even referenda campaigns seems to be fully barred by the First Amendment (First National Bank v. Bellotti (political lobbying); New York Times v. Sullivan [“editorial advertisement”]). However, corporate law typically requires corporate decisionmakers to cause the corporation to use its resources (including its employees’ voices) on behalf of the limited, legally constructed interests of the institution itself, not any human affiliated with it. Accordingly, granting free speech rights to corporations probably does not further free speech values of political self-governance or freedom of expression even of corporate participants.

Dissident speakers within the corporation (for example, employees who disagree with official corporate positions or shareholders who seek to change corporate policies) have no First Amendment rights against business corporations, because the Amendment extends only to state action.

DANIEL J. H. GREENWOOD

References and Further Reading

- Greenwood, Daniel J. H., Essential Speech: Why Corporate Speech Is Not Free, Iowa Law Review 83 (1998): 5:995–1070.
- Meir, Dan-Cohen. Rights, Persons, and Organizations: A Legal Theory for Bureaucratic Society. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986.
- Winkler, Adam, McConnell v. FEC, Corporate Political Speech and the Legacy of the Segregated Fund Cases, Election Law Journal 3 (2004): 2:361–369.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- First National Bank v. Bellotti*, 435 U.S. 765 (1978)
- McConnell v. FEC*, 124 U.S. 619 (2003)
- Federal Elections Campaign Act (FECA), 2 U.S.C. § 441(b)
- Tillman Act (1907), Ch. 420, 34 Stat. 864

FREEDOM OF ACCESS TO CLINIC ENTRANCES (FACE) ACT, 108 STAT. 694 (1994)

Originally introduced in 1992 by then House members Charles Schumer (D-NY), Constance Morella (R-MD), and Senator Ted Kennedy (D-MA), it gained impetus for passage only after the first death of an abortion provider, Dr. Paul Gunn of Florida, killed by anti-abortion extremists in 1993. The FACE Act was passed in 1994.

The FACE Act prohibits the intentional use of force, threat, or physical obstruction to either attempt or actually to injure, intimidate, or interfere with somebody providing or obtaining reproductive health services. It also punishes anyone found to be intentionally damaging or destroying a reproductive health facility (www.prochoice.org, National Abortion Federation website, 12/17/2005). This legislation protects not only facilities at which abortions are actually provided but also those providing “medical, surgical, counseling, or referral services related to pregnancy (or the termination of pregnancy). It covers facilities located in hospitals, clinics, doctors’ offices or “any other facility providing” such health services (NAF website). Those protected at both pro-choice and pro-life “pregnancy crisis centers” include security guards, maintenance staff, patients, and their escorts.

As with other attempts to limit the presence of anti-abortion activity at reproductive health clinics, two sets of constitutional challenges have been brought. The first concerns the assertion of a First Amendment freedom of speech right to tell clients about opposing views outside clinics. Most states have dealt with this question through constitutionally protected “buffer zones” of a certain radius outside clinics. The FACE Act does not prohibit constitutionally protected speech, only those threatening or intimidating activities designed to prevent clients from reaching the clinic.

The second constitutional question that has been raised in response to this Act has been that of Congress’ authority to affect the private sector (the operation of clinics). In 1997 and 2005, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the FACE Act was constitutional, based on Congressional authority to “regulate commerce among the states” as granted by the commerce clause in Article I. Those opposing this view argue that those who interfere with reproductive clinics are not engaging in “commercial or economic” activity as required by the statute. This argument has been successfully used to continuously appeal judgments against Joseph Scheidler of the Pro-Life Action League and Randall Terry of Operation Rescue under the RICO statute, passed in the 1970s to curtail racketeering. However, it has not damaged the FACE Act. The FACE Act was written specifically for reproductive health facilities and thus does not suffer the constitutional problems of trying to apply an “overly broad” statute. Each of the eight federal appeals courts that has heard challenges to FACE have upheld its constitutionality, and the Supreme Court has been asked but chosen not to review these cases (unlike the RICO statute cases regarding abortion clinics). Similarly, federal appeals courts have upheld Congress’ right to enact FACE through its commerce clause powers. The Alan Guttmacher Institute reports that as of December 2005, thirteen states and the District of Columbia have enacted state FACE statutes specifically with respect to abortion providers.¹

The FACE Act provides for criminal and civil penalties. Only the federal government can file criminal charges, whereas federal and state governments or any person harmed by a prohibited act under FACE can file a civil lawsuit against a violator. Criminal penalties include one year in prison and a fine of $100,000 for a first-time offender and penalties up to $250,000 and three years in prison for subsequent offenses. For offenses that are nonviolent in nature (yet still constitute physical obstructions of facilities), the penalties begin at 6 months’ jail time and a fine of ¹Alan Guttmacher Institute, www.guttmacher.org, “State Policies in Brief: Protecting Access to Clinics,” as of December 1, 2005; website accessed 12/17/05.

$10,000 (both of which are increased on subsequent offenses). The maximum sentence contained in the legislation is ten years in prison for bodily injury and life imprisonment for causing death (NAF website, 12/17/2005). Civil penalties may include fines of $10,000 or $15,000 and also the potential of getting an injunction against further actions by the protesters.

The National Abortion Federation website, www.prochoice.org, states that FACE prosecutions have been extremely successful in deterring “hard-core” violence at reproductive clinics. This is important, because some actions have included the gluing of locks or spraying of butyric acid (rendering a facility unusable): a woman in 1996 who threatened a doctor by shouting, “remember what happened to Dr. Gunn; this could happen to you,” and a man who parked a Ryder truck outside a clinic shortly after the Oklahoma City bombings. In 1994, at the time of the act’s passage, half the clinics (fifty-two percent) reported some type of violence directed against them that would be actionable under FACE (such as bombing, arson, stalking, gunfire, or physical violence). That percentage had been reduced by more than half (to twenty percent total) by 2000, usually attributed to the legislation’s enforcement. On the other hand, violence directed at clinics has not totally ceased. For example, in the two months after the September 11, 2001, attacks, 500 reproductive and women’s rights facilities reported anthrax threats. Similarly, in 2004, the Feminist Majority Foundation stated that about one in every five reproductive care facility in the United States reports that it continues to experience violence.

MELISSA HAUSSMAN

References and Further Reading

Planned Parenthood. National Abortion Federation and Alan Guttmacher websites: www.plannedparenthood.org, www.prochoice.org, www.guttmacher.org.

See also Abortion

FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION

After the American Revolution, neither the U.S. nor the state constitutions protected the freedom of association. They protected the freedom of assembly, which encompassed the right of “the people” collectively to protest against an unjust government but did not protect minorities from majorities.

States limited the freedom of association to protect the majority from minorities. Political parties were considered “factions” that put private interests ahead of the common good. Labor unions were treated as illegal “conspiracies” in common law, because they promoted the interests of one class over the public interest. The ability to form a corporation was strictly limited. Corporations were considered public institutions that must serve the common good. In New England, states denied corporate privileges to many churches until disestablishment in 1818 in Connecticut, 1819 in New Hampshire, and 1833 in Massachusetts. Virginia refused to grant any churches corporate privileges, denying them the ability to hold property and govern their own institutional affairs. The status of corporations changed when the Supreme Court, in the Dartmouth College (1819) decision, ruled that corporate charters were contracts protected by the Constitution. Dartmouth transformed many corporations from public agencies to private ones. After Dartmouth, corporations gained new rights vis-à-vis the state. Moreover, as the number of corporations expanded, more and more citizens demanded the right to form one to pursue their own commercial and charitable purposes. States responded with general incorporation laws allowing any group of persons to associate and receive corporate privileges under certain guidelines.

Philanthropic trusts followed a similar path as corporations. Americans, especially Thomas Jefferson, worried that trusts placed too much wealth beyond the people’s control. Many states denied their courts equity jurisdiction for trusts. In the Girard Will case (1844), however, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that federal common law recognized trusts, granting them legal rights and privileges.

Laborers continued to struggle for the right to organize. Not until the early 1810s in New York, and then in the 1844 Massachusetts case of Commonwealth v. Hunt, did laborers gain the freedom to associate. When laborers sought collective bargaining or closed shops, however, courts continued to define their activities as coercive and illegal.

After the Civil War, associations and corporations faced new challenges and limits. Labor unions continued to seek collective bargaining rights, whereas courts used new techniques, such as the injunction, to limit them. Catholics faced a challenge to their freedoms when Oregon passed a law requiring all children to attend public schools. With the KKK’s support, Oregonians hoped to teach Catholics Protestant values. In Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925), the Supreme Court ruled that the law violated religious liberty, permitting religious minorities to associate for educational purposes.

During the Gilded Age, business corporations expanded beyond any one state’s control and threatened the welfare of workers and consumers. Politicians and reformers pressed for new regulations, but federal courts struck down state laws interfering with economic freedom. In the Progressive and New Deal eras, reformers turned to the federal government. Starting with the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, the federal government committed itself to ensuring a free market by challenging corporate monopolies. Ironically, the Sherman Act was also used against unions until the Wagner Act legalized collective bargaining and set up procedures to recognize unions in return for allowing the federal government to oversee and regulate their activities. The subsequent Taft-Hartley Act weakened Wagner by permitting states to pass "right to work" laws limiting closed shops. Today, labor unions are again threatened. Many of the rights gained in the New Deal are routinely violated. In addition, important categories of workers, including agricultural workers, still do not have a guaranteed right to unionize.

From the 1920s through the 1950s, political minorities faced limits to their freedom to associate when their goals supposedly threatened the public interest. In the early 1920s, ten states passed laws to limit the activities of the Ku Klux Klan. Louisiana and New York also required KKK members to register with the state. These laws were upheld in Bryant v. Zimmerman (1928). The 1917 Espionage Act, passed during World War I, prohibited associating with groups hostile to the government. During the Red Scare, the Supreme Court in Gitlow v. New York (1925) upheld convictions for publishing communist propaganda. (Gitlow also incorporated the freedom of speech as a nationally protected right of all American citizens under the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. As a result, the federal government became the major arbiter in future freedom of association cases.) The Alien Registration (or Smith) Act (1940) extended the ban to peacetime. In 1947, President Truman issued Executive Order 9835 requiring all civil servants to declare loyalty to the government and prohibiting membership in any association the Attorney General determined to be "totalitarian, fascist, communist, or subversive."

Gilded Age money established new philanthropic foundations, including those founded by Rockefeller and Carnegie. Many progressives echoed Jefferson's fears that the foundations would enhance the power of the rich through permanent foundations beyond the people's control. In fact, foundations proved supportive of many progressive causes and it was the Right that turned against them. In the early 1950s, Congressional leaders in the House Select Committee to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations launched a broad probe into whether foundations were promoting communist ideas within the United States.

The emergence of constitutional protection for the freedom of association was tied to the civil rights revolution of the twentieth century. In the 1950s, southern states sought to check the NAACP by forcing members to register their names. In NAACP v. Alabama (1958), the Supreme Court ruled that the freedom to associate is protected by the Constitution. According to Justice John M. Harlan, "It is beyond debate that freedom to engage in association for the advancement of beliefs and ideas is an inseparable aspect of 'liberty' assured by the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause." The freedom of association was not absolute, however. The Court distinguished NAACP from Bryant by noting that the KKK, unlike the NAACP, promoted violence and illegal activity.

Although NAACP raised the bar for limiting associations, the Supreme Court continued to allow the government to monitor, and to limit, the activities of associations deemed threatening. In Dennis v. United States (1951) and Yates v. United States (1957), the Court upheld convictions under the Smith Act for advocating the violent overthrow of the U.S. government. Two cases concerning the membership clause of the Smith Act were decided in 1961. The first, Scales v. United States, sustained the conviction of a member of the Communist Party, because party membership proved commitment to overthrow the government. In Noto v. United States (1961), the Court limited the Smith Act to cases in which violence against the government was clearly intended, providing greater protection for the freedoms of expression and association.

The McCarran Subversive Activities Control Act (1950) and the Communist Control Act (1954) passed in the McCarthy era required Communist groups to register members with the Attorney General. The McCarran act was upheld in Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1961). Moderating the act in Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1965), a unanimous Supreme Court ruled that the Board could not force a person to register if he invoked the Fifth Amendment. Congress subsequently repealed the mandatory registration clause. Finally, in Boorda v. Subversive Activities Control Board (1969), the Supreme Court let stand a D.C. Circuit Court ruling that Party members cannot be exposed unless it can be proved that they shared the Party's violent goals, bringing some of the protections promised in NAACP to Communists.

The Supreme Court also limited the scope of loyalty oaths such as those required under EO 9835. Adler v. Board of Education (1952) allowed state governments to refuse to hire public employees who belonged to the Communist Party or similar associations. In Elfbrandt v. Russell (1966) and Keyishian v. Board of Regents (1967), the Court changed course and ruled that such actions amounted to guilt by association.

Recent cases have continued to balance the freedom of association against the public interest. In Moose Lodge no. 107 v. Irvis (1972), the Court decided that private social clubs could refuse to admit a member because of his race without violating the Fourteenth Amendment. But in Bob Jones University v. United States (1983), the Court ruled that Bob Jones University could not receive nonprofit status, meaning that it must pay taxes, if it discriminates against African Americans. In Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees (1984), the Supreme Court ruled that the Jaycees of Minnesota must admit girls. The Court determined that admitting girls would not alter the association's core mission and that the state's interest in eradicating gender discrimination outweighed the Jaycees' associative freedom. The Court reinforced these principles: Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte (1987). On the other hand, in Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (2000), the Supreme Court ruled that the Boy Scouts' religious beliefs permitted them to discriminate against homosexuals despite a New Jersey law protecting gay citizens. The Court argued that compelling the Boy Scouts to admit homosexuals violated the core purposes of the association and thus imposed an unconstitutional burden. Together, Jaycees and Boy Scouts expose the difficult balance the state has tried to maintain in the post-NAACP era.

After the attacks of September 11, 2001, new questions arose about how to balance the freedom of association with national security. These debates are nothing new. For better or for worse, Americans have always sought to balance the freedom of association with national security and the common good.

JOHANN N. NEEM

References and Further Reading

- Bresler, Robert J. Freedom of Association: Rights and Liberties under the Law. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2004.
- Cole, David, and James X. Dempsey. Terrorism and the Constitution: Sacrificing Civil Liberties in the Name of National Security. New York: Norton, 2002.
- Compa, Lance. Unfair Advantage: Workers' Freedom of Association in the United States under International Human Rights Standards. Ithaca: ILR Press, 2004.
- Fellman, David. The Constitutional Right of Association. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963.
- Gutmann, Amy, ed. Freedom of Association. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1998.
- Hall, Peter Dobkin. Inventing the Nonprofit Sector and Other Essays on Philanthropy, Voluntarism, and Nonprofit Organizations. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.

Hammack, David C., ed. Making the Nonprofit Sector in the United States: A Reader. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

Katz, Stanley, Barry Sullivan, and C. Paul Beach, Legal Change and Legal Autonomy: Charitable Trusts in New York, 1777–1893, Law and History Review 03 (1985): 1:51–89.

Neem, Johann N. "Freedom of Association in the Early Republic: The Republican Party, the Whiskey Rebellion, and the Philadelphia and New York Cordwainers' Cases." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography 127 (2003): 3:259–290.

———. "The Elusive Common Good: Religion and Civil Society in Massachusetts, 1780–1833." Journal of the Early Republic 24 (2004): 3:381–417.

Novak, William J. "The American Law of Association: The Legal-Political Construction of Civil Society." Studies in American Political Development 15 (Fall 2001): 163–188.

Tomlins, Christopher L. The State and the Unions: Labor Relations, Law, and the Organized Labor Movement in America, 1880–1960. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

———. Law, Labor, and Ideology in the Early American Republic. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

Wyllie, Irvin G. "The Search for an American Law of Charity." Mississippi Valley Historical Review 44 (1959): 2:203–221.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Dartmouth College v. Woodward*, 17 U.S. 518 (1819)
- Commonwealth v. Hunt*, 4 Metcalf 111 (1842)
- Vidal v. Girard's Executors*, 43 U.S. 127 (1844)
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- Bryant v. Zimmerman*, 278 U.S. 63 (1928)
- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
- Adler v. Board of Education*, 342 U.S. 485 (1952)
- Yates v. United States*, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)
- NAACP v. Alabama*, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
- Scales v. United States*, 367 U.S. 203 (1961)
- Noto v. United States*, 367 U.S. 290 (1961)
- Communist Party of the United States v. Subversive Activities Control Board*, 367 U.S. 1 (1961)
- Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board*, 382 U.S. 70 (1965)
- Elfbrandt v. Russell*, 384 U.S. 11 (1966)
- Keyishian v. Board of Regents*, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)
- Boorda v. Subversive Activities Control Bd.*, 421 F.2d 1142 (D.C. Cir.1969)
- Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis*, 407 U.S. 163 (1972)
- Bob Jones University v. United States*, 461 U.S. 574 (1983)
- Roberts v. United States Jaycees*, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)
- Board of Directors, Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte*, 481 U.S. 537 (1987)
- Boy Scouts of America v. Dale*, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT

The right to liberty of contract is not found in the text of the Constitution but has its origins in Anglo-American common law and natural rights ideology.

Beginning in the 1880s, American courts began to assert that a right to contract free from unreasonable government regulations is protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The U.S. Supreme Court first invalidated a law as a violation of liberty of contract in the infamous 1905 case of Lochner vs. New York.

Lochner, however, was something of an anomaly until the 1920s, because the Court almost always deferred to the states' assertion of their regulatory powers, the so-called police power. Between 1923 and 1934, however, the Court aggressively policed the boundaries of the states' regulatory powers, invalidating a wide range of laws as violations of liberty of contract that had no valid police power rationale. For example, in 1923 in Adkins v. Children's Hospital, the Court, in a controversial five-to-four decision, invalidated a law mandating minimum wages for women workers.

Ultimately, the doctrine of liberty of contract could not survive the Great Depression and of the pro regulatory sentiment that accompanied it. In the late 1930s, the Supreme Court announced that henceforth it would defer to government regulations of economic activity and the longer enforce the right to liberty of contract. Since then, Americans' right to make and enforce contracts has largely been at the mercy of legislative majorities.

DAVID E. BERNSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- Bernstein, David E., Lochner Era Revisionism Revised: Lochner and the Origins of Fundamental Rights Constitutionalism, Georgetown Law Journal 92 (2003):1–67.
 Gillman, Howard. The Constitution Besieged: The Rise and Demise of Lochner Era Police Powers Jurisprudence. Durham and London: Duke University Press, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lochner v. New York*, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923)

FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION IN THE INTERNATIONAL CONTEXT

The First Amendment's protection of freedom of expression became part of the U.S. Constitution in 1791. The French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, adopted by the French National Assembly in 1789, provides that "No one shall be disquieted on account of his opinions" (Article 10) and "That the free communication of ideas and opinions is one of the most precious of the rights of man.

Every citizen may, accordingly, speak, write and print with freedom, but shall be responsible for such abuses of this freedom as shall be defined by law" (Article 11). Otherwise, provisions for protecting freedom of expression have mostly come through the principal human rights documents that have been adopted or that have come into force only since World War II. This does not mean that countries without explicit rights documents have always failed to protect of freedom of expression. This is also not to suggest that freedom of expression has been universally honored since World War II by counties with explicit protective provisions. Indeed, either with or without rights documents, the number of national governments with serious breaches of freedom of expression no doubt has far exceeded the number of governments that has consistently protected that freedom. Nonetheless, it is important to remember that the great movement toward formal documentation of human rights after World War II began with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (adopted in 1948). The freedom of expression provision of the Universal Declaration is contained in Article 19: "Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes the right to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers." Other post-World War II human rights documents with provisions protecting freedom of expression include the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Article 19, came into force in 1976), the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man (Article 4, adopted 1948), the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Article 10, came into force in 1953), the American Convention on Human Rights (Article 13, came into force in 1978), and the African Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights (Article 9, came into force in 1986). These provisions, mostly from the second half of the twentieth century, usually include qualifications or conditions set out in a separate paragraph, for example, the European Convention's qualifications are set out in paragraph (2) of Article 10: "The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interest of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary." Taken together, these qualifications represent what is known in the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights as the “margin of appreciation.” The margin has been described by Judge R. St. J. Macdonald of the European Court as involving the “delicate task of balancing the sovereignty of Contracting Parties (member-states of the Council of Europe) with their obligations under the [European] Convention.” As we shall see in the following, this balancing act has required the recurring attention of the European Court of Human Rights.

After proclaiming freedom of expression in Article 19(2), Article 19(3) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights contains the proviso that: “The exercise of these rights provided for in paragraph 2 of this article carries with it special duties and responsibilities. It may therefore be subject to certain restrictions, but these shall only be such as are provided by law and are necessary.” Thus, Article 19(3)(a) provides, “For respect of the rights and reputations of others,” and 19(3)(b) provides, “For the protection of national security or of public order, or of public health or morals.” Also Article 20 provides that “any propaganda for war shall be prohibited by law” and also for the prohibition by law of, “Any advocacy of national, racial, or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence.”

It should be noted that in the United States, although the First Amendment’s protection of freedom of speech seems on its face to be absolute (“Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of speech”), the balance between freedom of speech and other values or interests has been worked out in decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. In U.S. practice none of the first Amendment freedoms are absolute. The rights documents adopted after World War II all contain explicit provisos, perhaps recognizing both the recent excesses and outrages that led to World War II and to the tensions of the cold war, as well as the experience of the Supreme Court of the United States in working out the limits of freedom of expression.

International Institutions

What institutions are responsible for enforcing human rights in the international context? The most active and influential institution has been the European Court of Human Rights, which has ultimate responsibility for interpreting the European Convention on Human Rights. While that Convention first came into force in 1953, the first judges of the European Court of Human Rights were not appointed until 1959, when fifteen European Countries were obligated to follow the European Convention. Its first decision on the merits was not made until 1961. The European Convention now applies to forty-four member-states with an aggregate population of more than 800 million people. Contrasting to the European Court, the Inter-American Court that applies the American Declaration and the American Convention on Human Rights is a fledgling institution, having become active in 1979, whereas the African Commission on Human and Peoples Rights, responsible for interpreting the African Charter is even more recent, being fully staffed only in 1989.

The freedom of expression articles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) are broadly within the responsibilities of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, and, in the instance of the ICCPR, the UN Human Rights Committee, but there is no United Nations agency or court with the authority to adjudicate cases involving alleged violations of freedom of expression and the direct or indirect power to enforce its decisions. The International Criminal Court, although not a UN agency was proposed under UN auspices at the conference that adopted what is known as the 1998 Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court. That court came into force on July 1, 2002, but it has exclusively criminal jurisdiction to try war crimes, crimes against humanity, genocide, and other crimes defined by the Rome Statute, rather than comprehensive authority of human rights.

Freedom of Expression under the European and American Conventions

As noted previously, the first substantive decision of the European Court of Human Rights was not made until 1961. The first Article 10 case before the European Court of Human was the 1976 Handyside case in which the prosecution of a publisher for having in his possession obscene books for publication for gain was upheld as having a legitimate aim of the protection of morals that was necessary in a democratic society. Among the other early Article 10 cases was Sunday Times v. United Kingdom (1979), the first case in which a violation of Article 10 was found by the European Court of Human Rights. That case is notable for our purposes because it shares its English common law origins with the United States and because its key issue, the legitimacy of an injunction (prior restraint) against publication of a newspaper article, also had been the subject of a case before the Supreme Court of the United States in the 1971 Pentagon Papers cases (New York Times v. U.S.).

The Sunday Times case involved a conflict between freedom of the press and the contempt powers of British courts applied to the press through an injunction to prevent the publication of an article that would have tended to “obstruct, prejudice or abuse the administration of justice.” The article that The Sunday Times proposed to publish was about the development, sale, and prescription of the drug thalidomide, which had resulted in the birth of a number of children with serious deformities. One feared consequence of the proposed article was that it would influence the payment of damages offered by the defendant pharmaceutical company for the suffered deformities. The House of Lords Appellate Committee, the court of last resort for the United Kingdom, sustained an injunction against The Sunday Times in 1973. It was this injunction that was held by the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) in 1979 (by 11 votes to 9) to violate Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. This was the first violation of Article 10 found by the ECHR.

The five law lords who had ruled against The Sunday Times had concluded that prejudgment of important issues through trial by newspaper should be prevented. While it was clear to all of the judges of the ECHR that the injunction was a violation of Article 10(1), the key issue was whether the injunction had a legitimate aim (“maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary” was included in Art. 10 [2]) that was “necessary in a democratic society.” Eleven members of the ECHR found that the injunction did not represent a pressing social need sufficient to outweigh the right to freedom of expression, whereas nine members disagreed. Their differences were over the “margin of appreciation” to be allowed national authorities by a transnational institution. The majority concluded that the exceptions to the freedom of expression protected by Article 10(1) must be narrowly interpreted. Freedom of expression was the primary concern. This “presumption” in favor of freedom of expression is like that expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States when it assesses intrusions on “preferred or fundamental freedoms” (U.S. v. Carolene Products Co.).

The second case in which the ECHR found a violation of freedom of expression was in 1986. It also involved a journalist who was sued in a private prosecution for defamation brought by Bruno Kreisky, then the outgoing Chancellor of Austria and President of the Austrian Socialist party. Austrian law provided for criminal punishment for any who “accuses another of possessing a contemptible character or attitude or of behavior contrary to honour or morality of such a nature as to make him contemptible or otherwise lower him in public esteem.” The defendant, Peter Lingens, had accused Kreisky, in a series of articles, of protecting former members of the SS for political reasons and of being too accommodating toward former Nazis, as well as citing his lack of tactful treatment of the victims of the Nazis. When, after extensive litigation in Austria, Lingens was found guilty and fined for his articles, he appealed to the ECHR. Once again, the violation of Article 10 (1) was clear, so the margin of appreciation the issue. Austria claimed that the prosecution was justified under the express provision of Article 10(2) to protect the “rights and reputations of others.” In holding that the criminal prosecution of Lingens was not “necessary in a democratic society,” and was “disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued” (the protection of the reputation of others), the ECHR concluded that, “The limits of acceptable criticism are...wider as regards a politician as such than as regards a private individual. Unlike the latter, the former inevitably and knowingly lays himself open to close scrutiny of his every word and deed by both journalists and by the public at large, and he must consequently display a greater degree of tolerance.” As was true with the Sunday Times Case, the Lingens case has a U.S.-relevant U.S. precedent, New York Times v. Sullivan (1964), with much the same outcome.

The second Sunday Times Case (1991), along with its companion cases for the Guardian and the Observer, was another prior restraint case, this one involving the proposed publication by the three newspapers of articles about or excerpts from Spycatcher, Peter Wright’s book about his work as a senior member of the British Security Service (MI5). The House of Lords had first voted to continue a preliminary injunction against publication of the articles, pending a trial on the facts of the confidentiality and security issues involved. That was followed by the judgment in the House of Lords Legal Committee that The Sunday Times had breached a duty of confidentiality by publishing extracts from the book and was liable to account for its profits from the publication. No permanent injunction was issued because by the time of judgment, global dissemination of Spycatcher had destroyed any element of confidentiality. When The Sunday Times took its case to The European Court of Human Rights, that court noted that “the dangers inherent in prior restraint are such that they call for the most careful scrutiny on the part of the Court.” Consistent with its concern, the ECHR found, by a vote of fourteen to ten, that although confidentiality and national security justified an injunction against publication for the first year, after that the injunctions were no longer justifiable under Article 10(2). Once confidentiality had been lost by publication outside the United Kingdom, the only purpose in continuing the injunctions was to deter others who might choose to emulate Peter Wright or to demonstrate that the Security Service would not “countenance authorized publication.” Neither of these justifications was seen as sufficient to support a continuation of the injunction. It is interesting that the dissenters expressed even stronger protection for freedom of expression and even greater suspicion of prior restraints than the majority.

Consistent with its strong protection for freedom of expression, in 1992 the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Castells v. Spain wrote that, “Freedom of the press affords the public one of the best means of discovering and forming an opinion of the ideas and attitudes of their political leaders,” whereas the 1994 decision in Jersild v. Denmark, the ECHR held that punishing a journalist for assisting another person in the dissemination of information violated Article 10.

Among the most recent decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, the case of Hirico v. Slovakia (2004) involved a publisher and editor of a weekly publication that published a series of articles concerning a prosecution for defamation brought by a government minister against a poet who had claimed that the minister was a fascist. The articles included accusations against the judge who tried the defamation case, and the judge then brought proceedings against the publisher and editor of the weekly claiming that the articles had impugned his civil and professional honor and his authority as a judge. The publisher claimed the protection of Article 10, and once again the issue was the appropriate margin of appreciation. The judge’s position was complicated by the fact that he also was a political candidate on the list of the Christian-Social Union, a party that had well-known views on issues involved in the defamation case that had been discussed in the series of articles. In a very brief opinion, the ECHR found for the publisher, holding that the limits of acceptable criticism are larger when a judge enters political life. Moreover, it held that Article 10’s protection extends journalistic freedom to include the expression of opinions that may “shock or offend” and even “possible recourse to a degree of exaggeration.” The articles commented on issues “of general concern on which a political debate existed.” Presumably the European cases involving freedom of expression have focused on press freedom, because that is where the critical issues have arisen.

To aid in the enforcement of Article IV of the American Declaration of Human Rights and Article 13 of the American Convention on Human Rights, the Office of the Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Expression of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights developed a Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression that were approved by the Inter-American Commission in October 2000. These thirteen principles were especially concerned with access to information and prior censorship and with the use of violence or threats of violence to intimidate or prevent social communications.

Also, in a 1985 Advisory Opinion (OC-5-85), the Inter-American Court of Human Rights wrote that: “[F]reedom of expression is a cornerstone upon which the very existence of a democratic society rests... It represents, in short, the means that enable the community, when exercising its options, to be sufficiently informed. Consequently, it can be said that a society that is not well informed is not a society that is truly free.”

It is not surprising that Inter-American institutions should place such an emphasis on free access to information, when we take into account that one of the first substantive decisions of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights case in the 1988 case of Velásquez Rodríguez involving the disappearance of a journalist. The Inter-American court there stressed that the investigation into his disappearance must be objective and effective. In its 1998 Annual Report, the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights wrote that threatening, intimidation, abduction or murder of journalists “seek to silence the press in its watchdog role, or render it an accomplice to individuals or institutions engaged in abusive or illegal actions.”

National Courts

Nihal Jayawickrama’s excellent review of contemporary application of human rights law, while focusing chiefly on the work of the European Court of Human Rights and the UN Human Rights Committee, reviews cases from Canada, India, Nigeria, Lithuania, and from the High Court of St. Vincent and the Grenadines that have viewed freedom of expression as being “indispensable to the operation of a democratic system.” These precedents suggest that the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of the United States will be only part of the story of the protection of freedom of expression in the future. It will be a good thing if other countries have more success stories for the protection of freedom of expression through their own processes.

DONALD W. JACKSON

References and Further Reading

- Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. Report on Terrorism and Human Rights. Washington, DC, 2002.
- Jackson, Donald W. The United Kingdom Confronts the European Convention on Human Rights. Gainesville: The University Press of Florida, 1997.
- Jayawickrama, Nihal. The Judicial Application of Human Rights Law: National, Regional and International Jurisprudence. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Castells v. Spain*, 14 E.H.R.R. 445 (1992)
- Handyside v. United Kingdom*, 24 Eur. Ct. H.R. (ser. A) (1976)
- Hirico v. Slovakia*, 41 E.H.R.R. 300 (2004)
- Jersild v. Denmark*, 19 E.H.R.R. 28 (1994)
- Lingens v. Austria*, 103 Eur. Ct. H.R. (ser. A) (1986)
- New York Times v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- New York Times v. U.S.*, 403 U.S. 703 (1971)
- Sunday Times v. United Kingdom*, 30 Eur. Ct. H.R. (ser. A) (1979)
- U.S. v. Carolene Products Co.*, 394 U.S. 144 (1938)

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT (1966)

The First Congress charged executive departments of the federal government with “housekeeping,” or maintenance, of their own records. Neither the Constitution nor any comprehensive law required disclosure of government records until the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 (APA). However, access under the APA was severely limited. Agencies could regulate access, and only “persons properly and directly concerned” with records were entitled to see them.

Dissatisfaction with secrecy in government, especially on the part of the press, grew in the 1950s. Bills were introduced in Congress as early as 1957, but none gained traction until 1963, when the APA came subject to overhaul. After back and forth between House and Senate, resolute dissent from federal agencies, and a threatened White House veto, President Lyndon B. Johnson signed into law the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) on July 4, 1966.

The FOIA, as since amended, mandates publication by executive authorities of materials such as rules and procedures and mandates disclosure of any executive branch record on request, regardless of the requester’s motive. However, the FOIA enumerates nine exemptions, including classified national security matters, trade secrets, agency memoranda, certain law enforcement records, matters of personal privacy, and records exempted by other statutes.

Though often touted as a journalist’s tool, the FOIA is used more widely by businesses and individuals. The FOIA has been litigated extensively, especially as to the scope of its exemptions. Since the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the scope of the FOIA’s national security exemption has been fiercely contested.

RICHARD J. PELTZ

References and Further Reading

- Hammit, Harry A., David L. Sobel, and Mark S. Zaid, eds. Litigation Under the Federal Open Government Laws 2004. 22nd Ed. Washington, D.C.: EPIC Publications, 2004.
- O’Reilly, James T. Federal Information Disclosure. 3rd Ed. St. Paul: West Group, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 551–706, Act of June 11, 1946, c. 324, 60 Stat. 237
- Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552, Act of July 4, 1966, Pub. L. No. 89-487, 80 Stat. 250

See also Access to Government Operations Information; Classified Information; Freedom of Information and Sunshine Laws; Media Access to Information; United Nations Subcommittee on Freedom of Information and of the Press

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION AND SUNSHINE LAWS

Although the First Amendment to the Constitution provides a freedom to speak and publish information that a person possesses, especially about government, the Constitution has not been construed to provide a freedom to obtain information. Thus the extent to which government must conduct business in public view or in secret is chiefly a matter for federal statutory and state law. Still, openness has long been recognized as a critical component of democracy. Louis D. Brandeis famously observed in 1914, “Sunlight is said to be the best disinfectant.” Laws ensuring public access to government have thus been termed “sunshine” laws.

At the federal level, the principal sunshine laws are the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) and the Privacy Act, which provide access to government records, and the Federal Advisory Committee Act and Government in the Sunshine Act, which provide access to government meetings. All but the FOIA (1966) were enacted in the 1970s, when the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal strained public confidence in government.

The federal laws were mirrored at the state level and made sunshine an entrenched feature of state government, although many states had sunshine laws dating to the early twentieth century. Today every state has an open meetings law and an open records law. They vary dramatically in their particulars. Some states, such as Florida and North Dakota, have sunshine laws in their state constitutions. Some states, such as Connecticut and Virginia, have established freedom of information councils to facilitate sunshine law compliance.

RICHARD J. PELTZ

References and Further Reading

- Leslie, Gregg, and Rebecca Daugherty, eds. Tapping Officials' Secrets. 4th Ed. Arlington, VA: Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 2001.
- O'Reilly, James T. Federal Information Disclosure. 3rd Ed. St. Paul: West Group, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Fla. Const. Art. I, § 24
- N.D. Const. Art. 11, §§ 5-6
- Federal Advisory Committee Act, 5 U.S.C. app. 2, Act of Oct. 6, 1972, Pub. L. 92-463, 86 Stat. 770
- Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552, Act of July 4, 1966, Pub. L. No. 89-487, 80 Stat. 250
- Government in the Sunshine Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552b, Act of Sept. 13, 1976, Pub. L. No. 94-409, 90 Stat. 1241
- Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, Act of Dec. 31, 1974, Pub. L. No. 93-579, 88 Stat. 1896
- Conn. Gen. Stat. §§ 1-205 to -205a
- Va. Code §§ 30-178 to -181

See also Access to Courts; Access to Government Operations Information; Access to Judicial Records; Access to Prisons; Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Classified Information; Congressional Protection of Privacy; Freedom of Information Act (1966); Media Access to Information; Media Access to Judicial Proceedings; Media Access to Military Operations; Nixon, Richard Milhous; Right of Access to Criminal Trials

FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND PRESS UNDER THE CONSTITUTION: EARLY HISTORY, 1791-1917

When reading this, it is important to remember that most of the First Amendment law concerning freedom of speech and press came after the period covered here. Nonetheless, 1791 was important as the year when the U.S. Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the U.S. Constitution) came into effect through ratification, whereas 1917 is the year the U.S. Espionage Act, which was designed to punish certain political speech (seen as being dangerous during World War I) was passed. So, the end of our period was just before the first important free speech decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1919, Schenck v. United States, which interpreted the scope of freedom of political speech under that act by adopting the “clear and present danger test.”

When we consider the freedoms protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution during the first 125 years of American constitutional history, our first task is to set aside our contemporary understanding of what the word “freedom” means to us. To be sure, First Amendment “freedom language” is mostly a product of the years since 1917, beginning, as noted previously, with several important cases involving political speech that were decided in the immediate aftermath of World War I. Our task is made somewhat easier by the fact that the seminal early book on freedom of speech, Professor Zechariah Chafee’s Freedom of Speech, was first published in 1920, just after the period that we consider here. Chafee’s update, Freedom of the Speech in the United States, was published in 1941, but, as he notes in his preface to that edition, the substantive material that was covered and first published in 1920 (Part I of the 1941 update) was mostly unchanged. Thus Chafee’s work can help us understand how freedom of speech was seen in 1920.

In Chafee’s 1941 update, from a book of more than 500 pages, only Chapter I (just more than thirty pages) deals with the pre-1918 period, so the first thing we realize is that for most purposes freedom of speech law developed with the prosecutions of political dissidents that followed World War I. It is true that the historical precedent to the Espionage Act of 1917 was the U.S. Sedition Act of 1798, through which the Federalist Party of John Adams sought to prosecute their political opponents, but that act led to no important Supreme Court decisions. Instead, the Act lapsed in March 1801, just before Thomas Jefferson’s inauguration as president. An excellent book, James Morton Smith’s Freedom’s Fetters, covers the relevant events of those years.

We need to note that one reason why a bill of rights was not included in the original U.S. Constitution was based on the view that the U.S. Congress had no power to enact legislation on the subjects eventually covered by the Bill of Rights of 1791. That point was belied by the Sedition Act of 1798, which was predicated on the view that Congress had the power to punish unlawful conspiracies or combinations that might impede the efforts of the federal government. Without knowing that he was beginning a tradition of exceptions, President John Adams called the Alien and Sedition Acts war measures justified by a perceived emergency (because of the possibility of war with France). The Sedition Act created the possibility of prosecution of anyone who “shall write, print, utter or publish...scandalous and malicious writing or writings against the government of the United States, or either House of the Congress...or the President...with the intent to defame...or to bring them...into contempt or disrepute; or to excite against them...the hatred of the good people of the United States.” It is important to note that freedom of speech and freedom of the press were treated in much the same manner at this time, and freedom of the press was probably the more important of the two because then the only way to reach a large audience was through print media.

Elkins and McKittrick’s The Age of Federalism describe the Federalists’ resort to prosecution of its opponents. Their narrative relies in part on Madison’s Federalist 10 in which he argued against political parties and factions as being usually contrary to the public interest. The ideal was that, instead of factions, enlightened and virtuous leaders should transcend narrow interests and seek the higher public good. When this ideal was applied in practice by the Federalists, the outcome was that when men of such good will and reason (as the Federalists saw themselves) were attacked by others who were insolent, vulgar, self-interested, and demagogic (as they saw their opponents), the Sedition Act of 1798 was the reasonable consequence. Madison, however, was not part of this outcome.

Indeed, in 1800 Madison reported to the Virginia legislature on the Alien and Sedition Acts. He argued that the Sedition Act was unconstitutional, because the federal government had no jurisdiction under its enumerated or implied powers over conduct that may have been criminal under English common law (political sedition) and that the First Amendment replaced the common law on freedom of speech and press. As to the federal government, freedom of speech and press were absolute, because there was no authority on the part of the federal government to legislate on those subjects. As to the notion that the common law had only prevented previous restraints against publications and did not prohibit post-publication criminal liability, as quoted by Leon Levy, Madison argued that, “It would seem a mockery to say that no laws should be passed preventing publications from being made, but that laws might be passed for punishing them in case they should be made.” In the United States, Madison argued, the people, rather than the king, were sovereign and they granted to the government only the powers that they had spelled out in the Constitution of the United States. Another compelling argument in Madison’s report was the fact that the First Amendment also prohibited an establishment of religion by the federal government, whereas there was clearly such an establishment (the Church of England) under the common law. The logical implication was that the common law was modified by the Bill of Rights when the two conflicted, as they did with respect to the establishment of religion. In this context it must be recognized that this logical implication did not apply to the states, although this was not explicitly decided by the Supreme Court until 1833 in the case of Barron v. Baltimore, which held that the Bill of Rights was written to limit the national government. The adoption of provisions protecting freedom of speech and press in state constitutions, however, possibly raised the same logical implication. Although Levy concludes that Madison’s Report was not necessarily indicative of the intended meaning of the Bill of Rights in the period of 1789–1791, it certainly represented the evolution of Madison’s thinking by 1800.

There were fourteen prosecutions under the Sedition Act. Elkins and McKittrick argue that these cases, while marked with “brutal highhandedness,” were more striking for the “almost comic clumsiness, the sheer political ineptitude with which the Federalists went about their work of trying to silence the opposition press.” Nonetheless only one defendant was acquitted under the Sedition Act of 1798. Because the Sedition Act expired in 1801, coupled with the fact that the U.S. Supreme Court did not exercise the power of judicial review until its decision in Marbury v. Madison in 1803, there was no constitutional review of these cases.

Although political sedition had been part of the common law of England, whether it had been, in effect, repealed by the First Amendment’s protection of freedom of speech was a question that never reached the Supreme Court in our early history. An interesting book on that question is Leon Levy’s Legacy of Suppression. Levy argues that the Federalist leaders, who contributed to the drafting and ratification of the U.S. Constitution, and later the Bill of Rights, did not understand freedom of speech to have broad scope, especially in the instance of political expression. Levy concluded that we know relatively little about the original understanding of the meaning of freedom of speech or of the press within the First Amendment. He notes that, “The phrase, ‘freedom of speech’ used in connection with the right of a citizen to speak his mind was extremely rare in the seventeenth century.” Freedom of the press and of religion were of much greater concern, but even so, under English law prosecutions for seditious libel were the means by which the press could be controlled. Greater tolerance of political criticism and a libertarian understanding of freedom of speech, he suggests, did not come until the Jeffersonians took power. However, Justice Holmes took a contrary position in Abrams v. U.S. (1919), when he concluded that the First Amendment's protection for freedom of speech was intended to prohibit prosecutions for political sedition, as it was then understood in English common law. Chafee affirms that position in the first chapter of Freedom of Speech in the United States. Whichever view is right, it is necessary to first understand at least the basic elements of the English law of seditious libel (political sedition).

Seditious Libel

The English common law of seditious libel criminalized speech that might have the tendency to bring the government into disrepute, even if the content of the speech was true. According to Chafee, the law of seditious libel in England through the close of the eighteenth century was “the intentional publication without lawful excuse or justification, of any written blame of any public man, or of the law, or of any institution established by law.” Under this definition, freedom of speech and of the press consisted chiefly of the absence of prior censorship, whereas the publication of information tending to disparage public officials or institutions was usually punishable. The early common law rule was that the only question for a jury was whether the defendant had indeed published the material; all other issues were questions of law to be determined by judges. Thus, liberty of the press in particular was simply the absence of a government censor to which publications had to be submitted prior to publication. As reported by Levy, the result was that in prosecutions for criminal libel—those libels against the state—“a man might be arrested on a general warrant, prosecuted on an information without the consent of a grand jury, and convicted for his political opinions by judges appointed by the government he had aspersed.”

Probably the most famous early prosecution for political sedition in the American colonies was the trial in 1735 of John Peter Zenger, printer of the New York Weekly Journal. Zenger attacked the administration of colonial Governor William Cosby. Cosby assumed his office in 1731 and promptly achieved widespread unpopularity. Zenger, who was associated with the Popular Party that opposed Cosby, was defended by Alexander Hamilton, who argued that truth should be a defense to prosecution for seditious libel. As noted in the website cited in the references, the prosecution accused Zenger of “being a seditious person and a frequent printer and publisher of false news and seditious libels” who had “wickedly and maliciously” sought to “traduce, scandalize and vilify” Governor Cosby and his cabinet. Hamilton argued that the law of New York colony need not be the same as the common law of England. The presiding judge ruled that Hamilton could offer no proof of the truth of Zenger's publication and instructed the jury that its duty was clear; it was not to judge or alter the law. However, when the question of his guilt was submitted to a jury, Zenger was acquitted. That single, although famous, outcome did not establish the universal principal of truth as a defense, but it did reveal and offer the prospect for enhancing the power of American juries. Yet, Levy concludes that one of the reasons for the fame of the Zenger case was its singularity. Today such verdicts are known as jury nullification, that is, when a jury simply refuses to enforce the extant law. Even given such occasional victories as Zenger's, Levy argues that to consider the American colonies as “a society in which freedom of expression was cherished is a hallucination of sentiment that ignores history.”

Levy reports that the first instance of freedom of speech being protected by a constitution came in Pennsylvania in 1776, when its first constitution said “That the people have a right to freedom of speech, and of writing, and publishing their sentiments; therefore the freedom of the press ought not to be restrained.”

Despite those words, Pennsylvania failed to protect Loyalist (pro-English) speech during the American Revolution, and Quakers were often the objects of official persecution.

The Cushing-Adams letters of 1789, reviewed by Levy, are often cited for their relatively broad understanding of freedom of speech and press. Cushing was then the Chief Justice of Massachusetts. In his letter to John Adams, Cushing sought Adams confirmation of his view that the free press clause of the Massachusetts constitution guaranteed “freedom to discuss all subjects and characters ‘within the bounds of truth.’” Adams' reply was that he agreed the provision that Cushing relied on supported the view that a jury ought to determine the truth of accusations and if they found that they were published for the “Public good,” they would acquit. This standard was indeed contained in the Sedition Act of 1798, but the acquittals did not follow. Indeed, Cushing, who became a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1789, after his letter to Adams was written, presided over some of the trials brought under the Sedition Act of 1798 and viewed that act as constitutional. Since the Sedition Act came only seven years after the First Amendment became part of the U.S. Constitution, the conclusion that Federalists, who then held power, did not see that amendment as a bar to prosecutions for seditious libel seems inescapable.

Story's Commentaries

In the absence of early judicial precedents interpreting the scope of freedom of speech and press in the United States, we must consider instead the work of notable nineteenth century scholars. Joseph Story's Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States was published in three volumes in 1833 and dedicated to then Chief Justice John Marshall. In the last volume of his treatise, when discussing freedom of the press, Story emphasized responsibility rather than freedom. He wrote that absolute freedom was a "supposition too wild to be indulged by any rational man."

Instead he wrote that:

It is plain then, that the language of this amendment imports no more, than that every man shall have a right to speak, write, and print his opinions upon any subject whatsoever, without any prior restraint, so always, that he does not injure any other person in his rights, person, property or reputation; and so always that he does not thereby disturb the public peace, or attempt to subvert the government. (Section 1874)

And he added that:

Every freeman has an undoubted right to law what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press. But, If he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity. (Section 1878).

Story's position was consistent with Blackstone's narrative of the English common law as prohibiting "previous restraints" but not subsequent prosecution. Blackstone's Commentaries, published in a readily portable format, probably was the single most important law book on the American frontier.

Cooley's Constitutional Limitations

In his famous book, first published in 1871, Thomas Cooley also concluded that the English law of libel was not abolished by the First Amendment, citing as precedent the opinion of Chief Justice Parker of Massachusetts, who, writing in 1825 in Commonwealth v. Blanding about his own state constitution's protection of liberty of the press, argued that such liberty should be distinguished from licentiousness and that all that was prohibited by liberty of the press was previous restraints on publication. Thus, prosecutions for publication of material of a blasphemous, obscene, or a scandalous character were not protected. However, Cooley did review at some length the exceptions to the general common law rule against seditious libel that had in England sustained prosecution of publications that had a tendency to defame the government or to subject public officials or institutions to disrepute.

As to common law prosecutions for seditious libel in federal courts, Cooley argued that they could not be maintained, because those courts had no common law jurisdiction, their only jurisdiction being prescribed by Article III of the U.S. Constitution. Reviewing the Sedition Act of 1798, Cooley argued that it was counterproductive, because he thought all such extreme measures might be among a democratic populace. In the abstract he ventured an exception of the discussion of "constitutional questions"—that they ought to be privileged "if conducted with calmness and temperance"—and that they ought not to be indictable unless beyond the "bounds of fair discussion." But then he noted the indeterminacy of words like calmness and temperance.

As to state prosecutions, if the American states are the receptors and standard bearers of English common law, Cooley urged that prosecution for seditious libel, because those had been brought in England, were "unsuited to the condition and circumstances of the people of America, and therefore ought never to be adopted in the several states." Thus, in considering whether there might be liability for criticizing public officials, Cooley reviewed several cases from the American states. For example, a case from New York upheld such criticism as, "the most sacred and unquestionable rights of free citizens; rights essential to the very existence of a free government; rights necessarily connected with the relations of constituent and representative; the right of petitioning for the redress of grievances and the right of remonstrating to the competent authority against the abuse of official functions." However, when the criticism involved the allegation of the commission of a crime or of corrupt practices, another case from New York held that the proof of justification, chiefly the truth of the allegations, rested on the person making such charges. Finally, when the charges against a public official or candidate concerned only his or her qualifications for office, and did not impugn personal character, there was no basis for recovery of damages. These state cases seem to have offered somewhat greater protection for freedom of speech and press than previously had been the rule under the English common law—because truth was accepted as a defense—as it had not previously been under criminal prosecutions for libel in England. Under the English rule there arose a common law maxim: “The greater the truth, the greater the libel,” as Cooley reports. Nonetheless, newspapers were presumed to have been guilty of malice when their published words were untrue and damaging to individuals. They had the burden of rebutting that presumption. Still, Cooley reported that publishers could not be liable for exemplary or “vindictive” damages without proof of actual malice or of negligence. Cooley’s first edition was published in 1871. It was not until the case of New York Times v. Sullivan (1964) that the U.S. Supreme Court required greater First Amendment protection for the press.

Cooley also reported that several American state constitutions provided that in libel cases the jury had the right to determine both the law and the facts of the case. The limited role of juries in libel cases under the common law of England led to the enactment of what was known as Mr. Fox’s Libel Act in 1792 and, it seems, to the insertion of these provisions in state constitutions. Levy reports that after the Libel Act of 1792, juries were, with few exceptions, as repressive as judges had been. Levy reports that “There are more trials for seditious utterances reported in the State Trials for the two years after Fox’s Libel Act than the total number reported for the whole of the eighteenth century before that time.” These included the conviction of Tom Paine for publishing The Rights of Man. American state constitutional provisions made truth a defense, but only if published with good motives and justifiable ends. Cooley reported that the meaning of those conditions had not been settled by judicial precedents.

In the views of Levy and other scholars, it was the Sedition Act of 1798 that provoked the Jeffersonian Republicans to support a more libertarian understanding of freedom of speech and press and to repudiate the law of seditious libel, chiefly as their defense to Federalist oppression. Jefferson’s Kentucky Resolutions against the Alien and Sedition Acts were introduced in the Kentucky legislature in 1799. It is clear that the resolutions were motivated by fear of Federalist support for greater power for the national government and by Federalist repression of their enemies. That the supporters of the resolutions also favored state nullification of acts of Congress and possibly the right of secession from the union had even greater interest in the events leading to the Civil War.

Lincoln and the Civil War

Certain steps taken by military authorities during the civil war intruded on freedom of speech. A recent book, Daniel Farber’s, Lincoln’s Constitution, does an excellent job of reviewing the Lincoln years. The most famous of these was Ex parte Vallandingham (1864), which involved an order by General Burnside proclaiming that the “habit of declaring sympathies for the enemy will not be allowed in this Department” (Ohio). In 1863, Vallandingham, a former congressman who opposed the war, was arrested for violating Burnside’s order.

Farber reports that Vallandingham had given a speech in which he referred to the war as “wicked, cruel and unnecessary,” and although he said that he would not counsel civil disobedience, he urged his audience to turn Lincoln out of office through use of the ballot box. Although Vallandingham was ordered to be detained for the duration of the war, Lincoln instead ordered that he be expelled into rebel territory. As to the constitutionality of Vallandingham’s treatment, Farber quotes Lincoln’s argument that Vallandingham had been properly prosecuted because he “avows his hostility to the war on the part of the Union; and his arrest was made because he was laboring, with some effect, to prevent the raising of troops; to encourage desertions from the army, and to leave the rebellion without an adequate military force to suppress it.” Whether Lincoln was right or wrong was not determined by the federal courts. The Supreme Court concluded that it had no jurisdiction to review the decisions of the military tribunal that had tried Vallandingham, so it did not rule on the legality of his treatment. Indeed, it ruled on issues like these only after World War I, after the period covered in this article.

One other incident was even more problematic. Lincoln seized the premises of the New York World, a newspaper he suspected of being involved in a Confederate conspiracy, and ordered the arrest of those responsible for its publication. This violates even the guarantee affirmed by Blackstone and others as being protected by the common law: the prohibition against previous restraint.

Lincoln’s defense of his actions was extra-legal: that he acted in response to the necessity of preserving the union and consistent with his oath as president to see that the laws are faithfully executed.

In his 1999 book, All the Laws But One, Chief Justice William Rehnquist reviewed Lincoln’s conduct as well, but as part of his book’s overall review of civil liberties in wartime. Because Lincoln’s wartime policies were never effectively challenged in the federal courts, Rehnquist infers that Lincoln’s policies became the “benchmark for future wartime presidents. Referring to Vallandingham, Rehnquist repeats Lincoln’s famous question: “Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier boy who deserts while I must not touch a hair of a wily agitator who induces him to desert?" The Chief Justice's comments on Lincoln's policies focus on the fact that Lincoln, and the military authorities who acted under his executive powers, acted alone, that is, without explicit congressional authorization, yet there was no challenge of his policies as violations of the First Amendment. Although Rehnquist does not adopt the Latin maxim, Inter arma silent leges (the law is silent in wartime), he concludes that although the laws may not be silent in time of war, "they will speak with a somewhat different voice." It was not until 1919 that the U.S. Supreme Court seriously attempted to set the tone for that different voice.

DONALD W. JACKSON

References and Further Reading

- Blackstone, Sir William. Commentaries on the Laws of England (1765–1769). Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.
- Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. Freedom of Speech. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1920.
- . Freedom of Speech in the United States. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1941.
- Cooley, Thomas M. Treatise on the Constitutional Limitations Which Rest on the Legislative Powers of the States of the American Union. Boston: Little Brown, 1890.
- Elkins, Stanley, and Eric McKittrick. The Age of Federalism: The Early American Republic, 1788–1800. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Farber, Daniel. Lincoln's Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Levy, Leonard W. Legacy of Suppression: Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1960.
- Madison, James. Federalist No. 10 in Hamilton, Alexander, John Jay and James Madison, The Federalist Papers. New York: The Modern Library Edition, 1937.
- Rehnquist, William. All the Laws But One: Civil Liberties in Wartime. New York: Vintage Books, 1998.
- Smith, James Morton. Freedom's Fetters: The Alien and Sedition Laws and American Civil Liberties. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1956.
- Story, Joseph. Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States. (Reprint of the 1833 edition in 3 volumes). New York: Da Capo Press, 1970.
- On the trial of John Peter Zenger: www.law.umkc.edu/faculty/projects/ftrials/zenger/zengeraccount.html (accessed July 26, 2005).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. U.S.*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
- Barron v. City of Baltimore*, 7 Pet. 243 (1833)
- Commonwealth v. Bland*, 3 Pick. 304 (Mass. 1825)
- Ex parte Vallandigham*, 68 U.S. 243 (1864)

FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND PRESS: NINETEENTH CENTURY

The nineteenth century is notable for the inactivity of the Supreme Court in matters of freedom of speech and freedom of the press. The century began with these freedoms enumerated in the Bill of Rights, but when interpreted with their common law understandings, proved to offer little protection for individual liberty. A more libertarian and protective notion of freedom of speech and freedom of the press would not emerge in Supreme Court doctrine until the twentieth century. Because provisions of the First Amendment were not incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment until the twentieth century as well, speech and press were subject to the state-level determination of public order that superseded liberty claims. Given that states and local governments in early America relied on the police power to maintain social order, the criminalization of written material that was offensive or mischievous to public peace was permissible and expected under the common law standards. Nevertheless, the nineteenth century occasioned the development for the construction of modern free speech theory outside the courts. In the interplay that ensued between the exercise of public ordering and the resultant resistance from affected individuals who invoked freedom of speech and freedom of the press in more protective versions, a constitutional discourse did take place in American political culture. In these extrajudicial venues, activists articulated modern conceptions of speech. These included the theory of the marketplace of ideas, which encouraged the proliferation of all ideas in the expectation that truth would emerge; the notion of the liberty of speech and liberty of press as prepolitical rights that are not subject to governmental creation or denial; the notion of freedom of speech and freedom of press as instrumental and necessary for a self-governing people to assess their public officials; and the identification of free speech and a free press as essential to the development of human autonomy. Although these theories did not inform the Court's doctrine in the nineteenth century, the ongoing discourse allowed for a dissemination of these theories in political culture, laying the groundwork for acceptance of the Supreme Court's later modern free speech doctrine.

Earlier Legacies

The century began with the predominance of the common law conception of freedom of speech and freedom of press and the aftermath of the Sedition

Act of 1798. In his exposition of the common law, the eighteenth-century British jurist Sir William Blackstone explained freedom of the press as consisting of the absence of no prior restraint. Liberty of the press meant that the government could not censor material before it was published; once it was printed, however, the writer had to accept the consequences of his words if the government found the expression to be criminal. In this tradition, the Sedition Act was a legitimate exercise of government power. The product of a majority Federalist legislature designed to restrict criticism from the Jeffersonian Republicans in the impending election of 1800, however, this partisan measure invited opposition. Detractors developed arguments against the federal government's restriction of speech and press and articulated positive arguments for the role of freedom of speech and freedom of the press in self-governance by the people. As President, Jefferson pardoned those who had been convicted under the Sedition Act. The outrage against the Sedition Act did not render illegitimate the federal government's criminalization of sedition—it would pass a Sedition Act again in World War I—but it did set the tone of free speech discourse that would occur time and again in the nineteenth century in inviting the dynamic of repression and resistance.

Free Speech Theory outside the Courts

The common law doctrine gave way to more libertarian theories in a pattern of repression and response from radical groups. In stated efforts to maintain public peace and social order, state governments and the federal government passed laws and policies that restricted, silenced, and censored the expressions of groups that threatened the social order, whether they were challenges to slavery, gender norms, or employment law. In response, as affected individuals and groups sought free speech and free press in the public sphere, they mustered arguments that defended their right to freedom of speech and press against government suppression.

As tensions over slavery mounted in the nineteenth century, the federal government sought to avoid deciding on the issue of slavery and to avoid talking about it altogether. Congress, federal agencies, state governments—both north and south—and citizen groups repressed the expression of the ideas that issued from the abolitionist movement. When technological advances allowed for a proliferation of newspapers and pamphlets, abolitionists printed their own literature and attempted to mail it to slave states to reach slaves. The Postmaster General deferred to slaveholding states that prohibited the dissemination of literature for fear of slave insurrection. The federal government supported these state laws with the Post Office Act of 1836, which held that the post office would refuse to deliver mail that was rendered criminal by state law. In the same year, abolitionist groups inundated Congress with petitions requesting it to address the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. The House of Representatives received the petitions but failed to discuss them in the notorious gag rule that was finally ended in 1844 after the persistent efforts of Rep. John Quincy Adams. Abolitionist newspapers were targets of anti-abolitionist mobs. The office of the Cincinnati newspaper, Philanthropist, was beset by mobs, and the printer Elijah Lovejoy lost his life defending his presses from mobs in Illinois in November 1837. In response to the multiple forms of suppression of speech, abolitionists responded with defenses of their right to the discussion of slavery in speech and in print. In addition to defending the liberty of slaves, they defended the liberty of abolitionists to express their positions. Abolitionists declared freedom of the speech and the press as natural rights, never relinquished to government, and necessary political rights for participating in self-government. The free exchange of ideas in newspapers, they argued, would allow for a flourishing of positions and the possibility of arriving at the truth. Although public opinion was initially against the abolitionists regarding the issue of slavery, public sentiment turned more sympathetic as the issues of freedom of speech and freedom of press emerged, altering the position of the abolitionist movement in American politics and centrally positioning protective theories of free speech and the press in the public discourse.

The abolitionist movement welcomed women in its ranks, providing them with a forum in the public sphere. Laws denied women the political rights of voting and jury service, whereas social norms dictated that they not speak in public. The practices of the abolitionist movement challenged those norms, with abolitionist meetings seating men and women, blacks and whites, together. Abolitionist women were enlisted as public speakers, violating the stricture against women speaking in public, provoking the charge that women were speaking in front of “promiscuous audiences.” Forerunners included Frances “Fanny” Wright, who conducted a lecture series to much controversy in 1829. Maria Stewart, a freeborn black woman, was a well-known speaker in the early years of the abolitionist movement. In response to a public speaking tour by Sarah Grimke and Angelina Grimke, members of the Massachusetts Congregational clergy publicly expressed their chastisement.

The Grimke sisters responded with the development of a theory that recognized women's right to speech. In her letters written on the equality of the sexes, Sarah Grimke outlined women's equal rights with men by developing a rights theory in which all rights were granted by God. A government could not create or deny those rights that were between a woman and God. In making the case, Grimke asserted a place for women in free speech theory, but she also advanced modern free speech theory in arguing that freedom of speech was prepolitical and could not be denied to a citizen because of her gender. The common law doctrine, with its repression of speech for the purpose of public order, could not come between the natural rights of any individual and the Creator. A less visible development took place in the practices of women who collected signatures for petitions and sewed goods for sale, opportunities for women to redefine their political identity and to claim a space in political life.

The Civil War occasioned the deprivation of civil liberties of the abolitionists' opponents—those northern Democrats who declared themselves to be against the war and President Lincoln's policies. Clement Vallandigham, a former Ohio politician, was arrested in May 1863 for an antiwar speech he delivered at a political rally. A civilian, he was arrested by the United States military and denied habeas corpus, which had been suspended by Lincoln in 1861. Other Democrats were arrested for their dissent, and the military closed or threatened to close newspapers. In response, the Democratic newspaper, Chicago Times, claimed the freedom of the press, a right that preceded the Constitution that the federal government had no right to suppress. U.S. soldiers destroyed copies of the Chicago Times, an act that was reported by the New York Tribune as government suppression of the press. A series of newspaper stories, protest meetings, and party conventions pointed to the recognition that even opponents to abolition deserved the right to speak their opinion. Despite the government's explanation that civil liberties deserved less protection in time of rebellion, members of the public, abolitionists, and Democrats alike acknowledged the importance of the speech, even speech of the opposition, to democratic governing.

Free speech controversies also occupied the social reformers involved in the free love movement, which originated in the utopian communities of the 1820s and 1830s. Free love advocates challenged the conventions of gender norms and marriage. Early leaders Frances Wright and Robert Dale Owen worked for equality within marriage and reform in divorce laws. The later free love activist Victoria Woodhull provoked a free press controversy in 1872 when Woodhull and Claffin's Weekly publicized the Beecher-Tilton Scandal, revealing an affair between Reverend Henry Ward Beecher and the wife of his friend, Theodore Tilton. Anthony Comstock had Woodhull arrested for sending obscene material through the mails, but a judge dismissed the charge, noting that the federal statute did not apply to newspapers. The Comstock Act (1873), which suppressed the trade and circulation of obscene literature and items deemed for immoral use, would subsequently target a wide variety of material considered obscene. The Comstock Act included literature about birth control in its prohibitions, a feature that would be fought out in the twentieth century. It was also instrumental in banning books such as Lysistrata, The Canterbury Tales, Moll Flanders, and The Arabian Nights from the mails. The National Defense Association, founded in 1878, provided a libertarian defense for those convicted under the Comstock Act, but the surveillance of the Comstock Act would linger into the twentieth century, and the Act remains part of American law. Prosecuted under the Comstock Act, Ezra Heywood, author of Cupid's Yokes (1876), claimed freedom of speech to be essential to the development of human autonomy. He sought to associate the earlier abolitionist movement with the free love and anarchy movements of his own time. His prosecution indicates the disconnect between the various radical movements of the nineteenth century. Although the radical social reform and workers' movements further contributed to the development of modern free speech theory, their theories of free speech became less sympathetic in the eyes of the law and the larger public.

Labor unions in the later decades of the nineteenth century exercised their right to speak. At the Haymarket rally in Chicago on May 4, 1886, in the midst of a nationwide strike over the eight-hour workday, various speakers spoke out for workers' rights and against the death of two workers at the hands of police at a strike the previous day. Members of anarchist groups distributed fliers for the rally, and Samuel Fielden, a member of the Socialist Labor Party, issued a speech urging workers to challenge and defy the law. Following his speech, a bomb was thrown into the crowd. Eight police officers would eventually die of wounds resulting from the bomb, and a riot ensued, with attendees killed and injured, as the police dispersed the crowd. Eight men were charged, not with throwing the bomb, but with criminal conspiracy. Four of them were eventually hanged. The Supreme Court foreclosed any question of the free speech rights of the speakers when it dismissed the petition for writ of error in Spies v. Illinois (1887).

The disputes over freedom of speech and freedom of the press at the end of the nineteenth century indicated that the struggle between the government's perceived need for order would continue to conflict with individuals' stated liberty requirements. Although these struggles would continue into the twentieth century, they would, eventually, fall under the purview of the courts. The nineteenth century remains notable for the public participation in defining and defending rights of speech and press.

KATHLEEN S. SULLIVAN

References and Further Reading

- Curtis, Michael Kent. Free Speech: 'The People's Darling Privilege': Struggles for Freedom of Expression in American History. Durham: Duke, 2000.
- Rabban, David M. Free Speech in Its Forgotten Years. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Zaeske, Susan. Signatures of Citizenship: Petitioning, Antislavery, and Women's Political Identity. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Spies v. Illinois 123 U.S. 131 (1887)

See also Abolitionist Movement; Comstock, Anthony was because a corporation rather than an individual or association was involved." Corporate speech in the form of truthful advertising about lawful products/services receives protection today under the commercial speech doctrine.

Corporate speech is now a "dominant discourse," as Herbert Schiller wrote. Corporations control the marketplace of ideas and, some argue, use the protection of free speech to ward off government attempts to regulate the content they propagate.

CLAY CALVERT

References and Further Reading

- Allen, David S. "The First Amendment and the Doctrine of Corporate Personhood: Collapsing the Press-Corporation Distinction." Journalism 2 (2001): 255–278.
- Schiller, Herbert I. Information Inequality: The Deepening Social Crisis in America. New York: Routledge, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978)

Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936)

Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad Corp., 118 U.S. 394 (1886)

FREEDOM OF SPEECH EXTENDED TO CORPORATIONS

Since 1791, the First Amendment's text has protected "the press." Today, the press often is owned by large corporations whose speech rights are protected by the First Amendment as if they were people rather than legally created, artificial entities.

The doctrine of corporate personhood dates back to 1886, when the U.S. Supreme Court held in Santa Clara v. Southern Pacific that the Fourteenth Amendment equal protection clause protects corporations just as it does persons. In 1936, the Court held in Grosjean v. American Press Co. that the corporate press was a "person" within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment equal protection and due process clauses and that the tax at issue in the case "abridged the freedom of the press." Then, in 1978, the Court ruled in First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti that corporations possess a First Amendment right of free speech. It wrote that speech about government affairs is "indispensable to decisionmaking in a democracy, and this is no less true because the speech comes from a corporation rather than an individual." It added that "[i]n cases where corporate speech has been denied the shelter of the First Amendment, there is no suggestion that the reason

FREEDOM OF SPEECH IN BROADCASTING

Broadcasters enjoy free speech rights under the First Amendment, but not to the same degree as their colleagues in the print or online media.

One rationale for the differential treatment is that broadcasting—unlike other media in the United States—is licensed by the federal government. When Congress first addressed the licensing issue in the 1920s, it was decided that the government should not own the broadcast system in this country but instead should regulate it to ensure that broadcasters operate in the "public interest, convenience, and necessity."

At that time, broadcasters asked the government to intervene because the spectrum of available frequencies was limited, and amateurs too often usurped the airwaves space others had occupied. This scarcity of available spectrum space was another reason for government to step in and create some system of order. As the industry developed throughout the twentieth century, however, broadcasters grew weary of the government's interference in their operations. In the 1980s, Congress and the courts relaxed a number of the programming requirements on broadcasters, but some controversial content restrictions remain.

Broadcasters, for instance, may not air indecent material between 6:00 a.m. and 10:00 p.m. The United States Supreme Court has upheld that rule as it affects broadcasting, but has struck down a similar restriction as applied to the Internet. Print media face no such restrictions.

Likewise, in the political arena, broadcasters are required to provide equal opportunities for candidates to appear on the air. Print and online media have no similar space requirements.

ROBERT D. RICHARDS

References and Further Reading

Carter, T. Barton, et al. The First Amendment and the Fifth Estate. New York: Foundation Press, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)

Miami Herald Pub. Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)

Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)

Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. § 315(a)

Radio Act of 1927, 44 Stat. 1162

See also Broadcast Regulation; Cameras in the Courtroom; Communications Decency Act (1996); Fairness Doctrine; Federal Communications Commission; Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974); Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969); Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)

FREEDOM OF SPEECH: MODERN PERIOD (1917–PRESENT)

Introduction

The U.S. Supreme Court did not decide a case presenting a significant First Amendment free speech question until 1919. Since that time, however, the Court has decided a substantial number of free speech cases and in the process has developed a vast and complex array of legal doctrine that delineates the contours and dimensions of expression protected by the First Amendment. But not all of this doctrine is of equal importance. Consequently, the most prominent and significant doctrinal developments contained in the Court's post-1919 free speech decisions will be analyzed here.

In particular, the essay examines case law in which the Supreme Court developed doctrines that allow the government, in limited circumstances, to use the criminal law to punish individuals for engaging in certain types of expression—especially that which is harshly critical of the current government and its policies. How protective the law is toward such speech is, in many respects, an accurate barometer of how protective the law is of expression in general. As Farber (2003, p. 57) explains: “[e]ver since governments have existed, they have used force to suppress their opponents and quell criticism. Tolerance for enemies of the established order, then, is the acid test for free speech.”

In addition, this essay examines how the Court has developed what might be labeled a neutrality theory of the First Amendment—a theory premised on the idea that a democratic government should be significantly restricted from favoring particular ideas or viewpoints. The neutrality theory posits that constitutional democracies governed by free speech principles should be limited from coercing individuals into subscribing to government-endorsed ideas or views, as well as from enacting policies that systematically favor the private expression of such ideas and views. Nearly all aspects of the Court's current free speech doctrine—particularly that pertaining to time, place, and manner regulations—have been strongly influenced by the Court's deep aversion to content- and viewpoint-biased policies. Indeed, one could easily argue that content and viewpoint neutrality theory has become the central cog in the modern Supreme Court's understanding of the First Amendment—and that Amendment's place in the broader American constitutional regime.

Expression and the Incitement of Criminal Activity

The World War I Era

In the wake of WWI, the U.S. Supreme Court heard several cases involving First Amendment free speech issues. Not surprisingly, these cases dealt with left-wing, anti-war activists who had criticized foreign and defense policies of the U.S. government during WW I. In the first (and most famous) of these cases, Schenck v. United States (1919), the Court addressed whether the free speech clause prohibited the government from prosecuting the expressive activities of anti-war protesters pursuant to the Espionage Act of 1917. Charles Schenck had been charged with “attempting to cause insubordination . . . in the military and naval forces of the United States” (ibid) by mailing circulars critical of the draft to men who recently had been drafted. The document, which drew on the Thirteenth Amendment's prohibition against involuntary servitude, asserted that a conscript was "little better than a convict" and constituted "despotism in its worst form and [was] a monstrous wrong against humanity in the interest of Wall Street's chosen few" (ibid). However, although the document asked its recipients to "not submit to intimidation" and to "assert [their] rights," it did not specifically ask anyone to act violently or to violate the law (ibid).

A unanimous Supreme Court held, in an opinion written by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, that Schenck's conviction did not violate the First Amendment. Although the First Amendment does more than simply prohibit prior restraints on private speech, the Court concluded that it does not provide absolute freedom to expressive activity. Instead, the Court held that the government could regulate speech that presents a "clear and present danger" of bringing "about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent" (ibid). Justice Holmes, having had significant experience with the criminal law as a judge on the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, compared Schenck's expressive activities to the law of criminal attempts. He explained that the government has a right to intervene and punish individuals for expressive activities if those activities are dangerously close to eliciting illegal activities (such as refusing to report for duty when drafted). Justice Holmes noted that it "is a question of proximity and degree" (ibid) as to when the government can intervene and punish individuals on the grounds that they are inciting criminal activity. Moreover, whether the government's intervention is constitutional will depend on the context in which the expression occurs. As Justice Holmes explained, "the character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done," and that Schenck's expression would have been protected by the First Amendment "in many places and in ordinary times" (ibid).

One week after the Schenck decision was announced, the Court handed down decisions in Frohwerk v. United States and Debs v. United States, both of which also involved prosecutions under the Espionage Act of 1917. In Frohwerk, a unanimous Court upheld the defendant's conviction of conspiring to disrupt the war effort by disseminating material critical of the national government's draft policy in a Missouri-based German language newspaper. Similarly, a unanimous Court upheld the conviction of Eugene Debs on the grounds that a speech he had delivered to the 1918 state convention of the Ohio Socialist Party constituted a clear and present danger to the nation's war effort. Justice Holmes approvingly explained in Debs that the trial judge had instructed the jury to convict Debs only if "the words used had as their natural tendency and reasonably probable effect to obstruct the recruiting service...and unless the defendant had the specific intent to do so in his mind." Although the Court interpreted the statute to impose a scienter requirement, this and later cases often assumed that such requirements were satisfied if the speech in question had a reasonable tendency to produce the substantive harm that the government wanted to prevent.

In both Frohwerk and Debs the Court concluded that the government had satisfied the requirements of the clear and present danger test. However, as the quote from Justice Holmes' Debs opinion illustrates, it is certainly questionable whether the Court was sufficiently demanding in its evaluation of the nexus between the speech act for which the defendants were convicted and the illegal action (that is, substantive harm) that the government was seeking to prevent. For example, Justice Holmes indicates that the nexus was satisfied in Frohwerk because "it is impossible to say that it might not have been found that the circulation of the paper was in quarters where a little breath would be enough to kindle a flame." Quite simply, this language does not have much in common with the notion that the expression must present a "clear and present danger" of producing illegal activities.

It was not until the Court decided Abrams v. United States (1919) that we find a member of the Court casting a dissenting vote in favor of free speech. In Abrams, seven members of the Court cited Schenck and its progeny and concluded that Abrams could be punished under the amended Espionage Act of 1918. Abrams had distributed circulars on the streets of New York City and was charged with acting to "incite, provoke, and encourage resistance to the United States' during World War I, and of conspiring 'to urge, incite, and advocate curtailment of production [of] ordnance and ammunition, necessary [to] the prosecution of the war'" (Sullivan and Gunther, 2003, p. 19). The Abrams majority concluded that Abrams intended to disrupt the U.S. military forces because that would be the natural tendency of his expression, and that "[m]en must be held to have intended, and to be accountable for, the effects which their acts were likely to produce." So much for the idea that a scienter requirement would be a major impediment to government prosecutions of speech acts.

The dissenting votes in Abrams were cast by Justices Brandeis and Holmes. In this instance, we see the justices heretofore most responsible for the development of the clear and present danger test conclude that the majority erred in its application. First, Holmes and Brandeis argued that the majority's conception of what constitutes the requisite level of intent under the statute was not sufficiently demanding. Instead, Holmes argued that intent to disrupt the war effort by curtailing the production of munitions is satisfied only if the “aim to produce it is the proximate motive of the specific [expressive] act.” Second, the dissenters argued that the government could prosecute only those expressive acts that “present danger of immediate evil or an intent to bring it about,” neither of which, they believed, was present in this case. As Holmes explains, “Nobody can suppose that the surreptitious publishing of a silly leaflet by an unknown man, without more, would present any immediate danger that its opinions would hinder the success of the government arms or have any appreciable tendency to do so” (Abrams). Some scholars argue that Holmes modified his views about the requirements of the clear and present danger test—by requiring that the danger be immediately and dangerously proximate to the substantive harm targeted by the statute—between the time the Court decided Schenck, Frohwerk, and Debs and the time it decided Abrams (Sullivan and Gunther, 2003, p. 23–24).

As the Supreme Court was developing the clear and present danger test, lower federal court judge Learned Hand was developing his own test for when the government could prosecute individuals for inciting illegal activity. According to Hand, such convictions could occur only in those instances when the speaker “directly advocated” illegal activity (Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten). Hand rejected contextual tests that allowed the government to regulate expression that had a tendency to incite others to engage in illegal activity. Hand did not think that the Justice Holmes’s Abrams version of the clear and present danger test provided adequate protection for expression. Hand feared that contextual tests of the ilk used in Schenck and Abrams were too easily manipulated by prosecutors and judges, especially during periods of social and political unrest. Instead, Hand believed that direct advocacy of law violation was the appropriate standard. Hand explained that as long as “one stops short of urging upon others that it is their duty or their interest to resist the law, [then] it seems to me one should not be held to have attempted to cause its violation” (Masses). This test, which came to be known as “Hand’s ‘incitement’ approach” (Sullivan and Gunther, 2003, p. 28), was not used by the Supreme Court until 1969, when the Court incorporated it into the modern test for incitement of illegal activity.

The Red Scare Era

During the red scare period of U.S. history, the Court decided several additional cases involving speech and criminal attempts and conspiracies. The most famous of these is Gitlow v. New York (1925). Benjamin Gitlow, who was involved with the publication of The Left Wing Manifesto, was prosecuted for violating a New York statute that, in part, authorized the criminal punishment of one who “advises or teaches the duty necessity, or propriety of overthrowing or overturning organized government by force or violence” (Sullivan and Gunther, 2003, p. 29). Although the majority opinion explained that “[t]here was no evidence of any effect resulting from the publication and circulation of the Manifesto” (ibid), the Court nevertheless upheld Gitlow’s conviction. The Court noted that this case was different from the 1919 free speech cases, because Gitlow was charged with violating a state law that expressly forbade the use of certain language and the expression of certain ideas. In contrast, the 1919 cases involved prosecutions under statutes that only prohibited certain actions (for example, disrupting the war effort or the production of munitions); unlike the law involved in Gitlow, the 1919 statutes did not codify certain language or ideas that could not be articulated. The defendants in the 1919 cases were prosecuted because their expression was deemed to constitute an attempt to complete one of the acts prohibited by the criminal law.

As a result of this difference, the Court argued that it should be deferential toward the state legislature and its decision to statutorily proscribe certain types of expression. Consequently, the Gitlow majority rejected the notion that the clear and present danger test was applicable, and instead developed what came to be known as the “bad tendency test.” In language quite similar to that used by Justice Holmes in Debs, the majority explained that a “single revolutionary spark may kindle a fire that, smoldering for a time, may burst into a sweeping and destructive conflagration,” and that the government can legitimately punish the defendant’s “specific utterance...if its natural tendency and probable effect was to bring about the substantive evil which the legislative body might prevent” (Gitlow). The Gitlow majority did not require the government to provide evidence demonstrating that the Left Wing Manifesto caused anyone to take steps toward overthrowing the government by force and violence or that the publication created a clear and present danger of inciting individuals to take such steps. The fact that Gitlow had engaged in expression that the state legislature considered dangerous was enough to sustain his conviction. Indeed, given Gitlow’s expression, his conviction probably would have been upheld by the Court if it had used Judge Learned Hand’s direct advocacy test—a test that Hand thought was more protective of speech than the clear and present danger test. In any event, Gitlow did expand speech protections in the United States by holding—for the first time—that free speech was a fundamental right entitled to protection from state governments by the Fourteenth Amendment.

In their dissenting opinion in Gitlow, as well as their concurring opinion in Whitney v. California (a 1927 case in which the Court upheld convictions pursuant to a California statute similar to the one involved in Gitlow), Justices Holmes and Brandeis argued that the Court should apply the clear and present danger test in all free speech cases involving the incitement of criminal activity. The two justices, who had worked since Abrams to strengthen the speech protective capacities of the clear and present danger test, believed that only that speech that had a high probability (clear) of producing imminent (present) violations of serious laws (danger) could be subjected to criminal punishment by the government. In his concurring opinion in Whitney, Justice Brandeis explained that “[w]henver the fundamental rights of free speech and assembly are alleged to have been invaded, it must remain open to a defendant to present the issue whether there actually did exist at the time a clear danger; whether the danger, if any, was imminent; and whether the evil apprehended was one so substantial as to justify the stringent restriction interposed by the legislature.”

The World War II and McCarthy Era

Despite the economic and military crises faced by the United States in the two decades after Gitlow, the Supreme Court became, somewhat surprisingly, more protective of free speech. For example, in De Jonge v. Oregon (1937) and Herdon v. Lowry (1937) the Court reversed, on free speech grounds, convictions under state laws prohibiting individuals from organizing to incite or attempting to incite others to violate the law (Sullivan and Gunther, 2003, p. 39). In those cases, as well as others (see Thornhill v. Alabama and Cantwell v. Connecticut), it seemed that the Court was using a test similar to the clear and present danger test. What is not clear is whether this shift toward speech protection was because the ideological predispositions of the justices toward free speech issues were becoming more liberal or whether the Court was beginning to see its role as one revolving around the protection of rights essential for democratic government (see footnote four, Carolene Products Co. v. United States). Whichever the case, free speech reached a new high water mark in the late 1930s and throughout the 1940s.

The case that best captures this libertarian perspective toward freedom of speech came near the end of this period in Terminiello v. Chicago (1949). Father Arthur Terminiello, a Catholic priest who one might characterize as a Christian nationalist, was charged by municipal authorities for disturbing the peace as a result of a speech he delivered to a capacity crowd of 800 sympathizers in a Chicago auditorium. Terminiello’s speech was filled with negative references to racial, ethnic, religious, and political groups, and for these and other reasons relating to his views, a hostile crowd of more than 1,000 people had convened in the streets outside the auditorium. The crowd, which Terminiello on several occasions disparaged in his speech, soon grew restive and began throwing stones, bricks, and stink bombs. The police feared that they were losing control of the situation and arrested Terminiello for inciting the crowd to act disorderly.

Over four dissenting votes—and a passionate dissenting opinion from Justice Jackson—five members of the Supreme Court overturned Terminiello’s conviction. Writing for the majority, Justice Douglas argued that speech is “protected against censorship or punishment, unless shown likely to produce a clear and present danger of a serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance, or unrest.” Given the circumstances of this case, especially the fact that violent acts had already begun to occur—seemingly as a result of Terminiello’s speech—the majority’s conclusion demonstrates that its members subscribed to something akin to Justice Holmes and Brandeis’s Abrams-Gitlow-Whitney conceptualization of the clear and present danger test. Thus, entering the 1950s, it seemed that the Court was poised to be very protective of free speech claims.

But that was not to be. As a result of rapid turnover in the Court’s membership, and the rise of Joseph McCarthy’s efforts to expose alleged Communist sympathizers within the United States, the Court became much less inclined to question government regulation of expressive activities. For example, in 1952, the Court upheld a disorderly conduct conviction for expressive behavior that, compared with the circumstances in Terminiello, seemed quite tame (Feiner v. New York, 1951). Soon thereafter, the Court indicated that it was in no mood to protect individuals who were critical of the government and who were expressly advocating that it be violently overthrown and replaced with a socialist state.

The preeminent case of this era is Dennis v. United States (1952). In Dennis, the Court upheld the Smith Act prosecution of Eugene Dennis and other upper-echelon members of the U.S. Communist Party. The Smith Act, passed by Congress in 1940, was similar to the New York statute upheld by the Court in Gitlow. However, the one distinction was that the Smith Act made it “unlawful for any person to attempt to commit, or to conspire to” advocate—or organize for the purpose of advocating—the overthrow of the U.S. government by force and violence (Dennis). Because criminal attempts and conspiracies are incomplete offenses in which the substantive harm has not yet occurred, this is not a trivial distinction. Indeed, as Justice Black noted in his Dennis dissent:

At the outset I want to emphasize what the crime involved in this case is, and what it is not. These petitioners were not charged with an attempt to overthrow the Government. They were not charged with overt acts of any kind designed to overthrow the Government. They were not even charged with saying anything or writing anything designed to overthrow the Government. The charge was that they agreed to assemble and to talk and publish certain ideas at a later date: The indictment is that they conspired to organize the Communist Party and to use speech or newspapers and other publications in the future to teach and advocate the forcible overthrow of the Government. No matter how it is worded, this is a virulent form of prior censorship of speech and press, which I believe the First Amendment forbids.

Unfortunately for Black, six members of the Court did not see it this way.

Instead, the Court upheld the Smith Act prosecutions by purportedly relying on the clear and present danger test. In reality, however, the Court used on a watered-down version of the clear and present danger test that has subsequently become known as the “clear and probable danger” test. This test, first articulated by Judge Learned Hand when the Dennis case was before the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, posited that the government could punish conspiracies that organize to advocate the violent overthrow of the government if “the gravity of the ‘evil,’ discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger” (183 F.2d at 212). Hand’s clear and probable danger test is, like the Holmes/Brandeis clear and present danger test, one that is based on context. However, Judge Hand’s clear and probable danger test allows judges and prosecutors to balance—or trade-off—the serious danger, high probability, and imminence prongs of the clear and present danger test. In other words, if the danger is severe enough (for example, overthrow of civil government by force), then it does not need to be something that is likely to imminently occur. Similarly, if the danger that the government wants to avoid is likely to imminently occur, then the danger does not need to be serious. In contrast, Holmes and Brandeis argued that the government had to meet each element (severity, probability, imminence) of the clear and present danger test in their strictest forms.

From the 1960s to the Present

Beginning in the late 1950s and throughout the 1960s, the Court became less inclined to uphold convictions of individuals either because they advocated (or were organizing to advocate) the overthrow of the government by force and violence or because they expressed support for violating the criminal law (see, Sullivan and Gunther, 2003, pp. 47–50). But during this period the Court was unable (or unwilling) to articulate a test to govern First Amendment challenges to such prosecutions. In most cases it engaged in a form of ad hoc balancing, whereby it examined the government’s interests vis-à-vis the speaker’s interests and ruled in favor of that party whose interests were deemed greater.

This situation came to an end, however, when the Court announced in Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969) that the government could not punish individuals for speech advocating illegal activity “except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action.” Some have argued that this test combines elements of the Holmes/Brandeis clear and present danger test with Hand’s direct advocacy test (Sullivan and Gunther, 2003). The test requires that individuals advocate law violation (direct advocacy) and that the danger be probable/likely and imminent (the latter two being two of the three elements of the clear and present danger test). It is unclear, however, whether any advocacy of law violation qualifies, or whether the law violation must be one that poses a serious and substantial danger (which was deemed necessary under the Holmes/Brandeis conception of the clear and present danger test). Although the Brandenburg test has been used by the Court for the past thirty-six years in incitement cases, the number of such cases has been sparse. As a result, it is not fully clear how the current Court conceptualizes the test, how protective it is of free speech, or how firmly entrenched it is in First Amendment law.

Freedom of Expression, Democratic Theory, and Government Neutrality

The Relation of Free Speech to Democratic Government

Another crucial doctrinal development since 1919 is the Court’s conclusion that the First Amendment’s free speech clause imposes content and viewpoint neutrality requirements on the government. In a plethora of cases decided since the mid-twentieth century, the Court has argued that free speech is integrally related to democratic government. For democracy to work correctly—for the citizenry to engage in effective self-rule—the people must be afforded ample freedom to discuss the merits and demerits of all types of political, social, and economic ideas. In most instances, public policies will be tailored around those ideas that, in the end, are endorsed by the largest segment of the population. Democracy does not mean much, and probably does not truly exist, if the citizenry is not allowed to debate ideas and then enact policies that are consistent with the views garnering majority support. Of course, democracy does not mean the majority should be allowed to ensconce its views into public policy in all instances, but it does mean that in most situations there is a presumption in favor of allowing such a result. To be sure, democracy is often defined as majority rule with minority rights. But clearly there must be significant latitude for the former if a regime is going to be considered democratic.

However, allowing free and fair debate often comes hard to those in power. After all, those in power typically do not want to lose their grip on the levers of government control. Therefore, dominant groups—and their representatives in government—often have an incentive to maintain their authority by preventing others from criticizing their policies, actions, and agendas. Indeed, these tendencies are what led to the long line of cases pertaining to the incitement of illegal activity that was discussed earlier. Current laws normally represent the choices of those in power, and it is a potential threat to their status if outsiders are allowed to advocate that those laws be intentionally violated.

But there are more subtle techniques available to those in power to prolong their control. More subtle methods, that is, than crushing those who advocate illegal activity. For example, the dominant governing coalition could decide to enact policies that directly promote the ideological worldview and political orthodoxy to which it subscribes. These policies, if successful, will persuade members of the citizenry—perhaps even those who were initially not supportive of the dominant coalition's ideology—that the current regime's ideology is correct and (as a corollary) that its representatives in government ought to be retained at the next election. In West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette (1943), a majority of the Supreme Court argued that the state of West Virginia was engaging in just such an effort and that it had contravened core principles underlying the First Amendment.

The West Virginia state school board had enacted a policy requiring students, at the commencement of each day's public school classes, to rise and recite the pledge of allegiance while offering a stiff-arm salute to the American flag. Students who refused to engage in this activity could be suspended from school, and their parents could be subjected to fines. In Barnette, the parents of two school children challenged the state's pledge policy by arguing that it violated the tenets of their religious beliefs—and thus the First Amendment's free exercise clause. However, rather than relying on the free exercise clause, the Supreme Court—which at the time was a staunch supporter of the First Amendment—concluded that the state's policy violated the free speech interests of the school children.

In a stirring opinion for the Court, Justice Robert Jackson argued that the free speech clause protects a person's right to both speak and to remain silent. The government, according to Jackson, cannot force individuals to articulate support for or subscribe to any particular beliefs, ideologies, or orthodoxies. This principle, Jackson explained, is one of the primary differences between democratic and totalitarian governments, and that the latter have frequently resorted to extreme measures in their efforts to induce political consent. In his Barnette opinion Justice Jackson wrote that “[t]hose who begin coercive elimination of dissent soon find themselves exterminating dissenters. Compulsory unification of opinion achieves only the unanimity of the graveyard.” In subsequent decisions, the Supreme Court has affirmed its commitment to prevent the government, in most circumstances, from forcing individuals to express their support for particular political, social, religious, or economic viewpoints (see Wooley v. Maynard, 1977, where the Court upheld the right of a New Hampshire resident to cover the motto “Live Free or Die” on his vehicle's license plate).

First Amendment First Principles: Content and Viewpoint Neutrality

One can argue that the Barnette case constitutes the earliest doctrinal foundations for the Supreme Court's conclusion that the First Amendment requires government regulations touching on private expression be content and viewpoint neutral. What the Court feared in Barnette, and what it fears in the presence of any content- and viewpoint-biased regulations of expression, is the possibility that the government is attempting to tilt the free speech playing field so that the government's preferred views will “win” the battle in the marketplace of ideas. If such behavior is allowed, then the ruling majority coalition can tailor government policies to inculcate its ideological worldview among members of the public—thus orchestrating its continued political support and, ultimately, perpetuating its rule of the regime. Such machinations smell more of fascism than democracy.

To challenge such efforts, the Supreme Court has developed the content and viewpoint neutrality doctrines. The former looks unfavorably on speech regulations that limit the types of subjects and topics that can be discussed in a particular setting. For example, in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992), the Supreme Court concluded that a St. Paul, Minnesota, hate speech ordinance was unconstitutional, because it was content biased. The R.A.V. majority noted that the ordinance only prohibited hate speech pertaining to “race, color, creed, religion, or gender.” The law was content biased because it did not prohibit all types of hate speech. However, during that same Term the Court upheld a law that the each justice agreed was content biased. The policy being challenged in Burson v. Freeman (1992) prohibited individuals from soliciting votes or displaying and distributing campaign paraphernalia within 100 feet of a polling place entrance. The law was upheld because the Court concluded that the state had a compelling state interest in promoting the integrity, fairness, and accuracy of elections, as well as in protecting the citizen’s fundamental right to vote. Moreover, the policy was narrowly tailored to further those objectives.

Viewpoint neutrality doctrine is concerned with regulations that favor particular viewpoints about a particular subject or topic. For example, a regulation that allowed supporters (but not opponents) of the nation’s defense policy speak in a public park would be a prime example of a viewpoint-biased law. Similarly, in 1989 and 1990, the Supreme Court concluded that state and federal flag desecration laws were viewpoint biased—and thus unconstitutional (see Texas v. Johnson, 1989 and United States v. Eichman, 1990). The Court argued that the only government interests being furthered by these laws were those pertaining to the sanctity and image of the flag and the government’s desire to prohibit its disrespectful treatment. After all, neither law punished those who burned a flag in a respectful and dignified manner (for example, to dispose of a soiled flag). Punishment only resulted if the flag’s desecration was disrespectful and likely to anger those who witnessed the event. Clearly, the application of the laws hinged on the views being conveyed by the person burning the flag.

The Supreme Court considers problematic both content- and viewpoint-biased regulation of expressive activities, and the presence of either typically results in the policy being declared unconstitutional. However, the justices consider viewpoint bias the worst of the two, because in that instance the government is openly seeking to promote one side of a political debate. Consequently, as of 2005, the Supreme Court has never upheld a viewpoint-biased regulation of expressive activity. In fact, even in those instances when the government is regulating a form of expression not considered entitled to significant First Amendment protection (for example, obscenity, libel, fighting words), or when it enacts an otherwise legitimate time, place, and manner regulation (for example, constraints on the use of sound trucks), the government will normally encounter insurmountable First Amendment obstacles if it has created a content- or viewpoint-biased regulatory scheme. The content and viewpoint neutrality doctrines, along with the Court’s larger effort to curb government attempts to manipulate the chorus of voices in the marketplace of ideas, represent bedrock principles of the Supreme Court’s interpretation of the First Amendment in the modern era.

MARK KEMPER

References and Further Reading

- Farber, Daniel A. The First Amendment. 2nd Ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2003.
 Sullivan, Kathleen, and Gerald Gunther. First Amendment Law. 2nd Ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States* 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
Brandenburg v. Ohio 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
Burson v. Freeman 504 U.S. 191 (1992)
Cantwell v. Connecticut 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
Carolene Products Co. v. United States 304 U.S. 144 (1937)
De Jonge v. Oregon 299 U.S. 353 (1937)
Debs v. United States 249 U.S. 211 (1919)
Dennis v. United States 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
Feiner v. New York 340 U.S. 315 (1951)
Frohwerk v. United States 249 U.S. 204 (1919)
Gitlow v. New York 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
Herdon v. Lowry 301 U.S. 242 (1937)
Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten 244 Fed. 535 (S.D.N.Y., 1917)
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
Schenck v. United States 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
Terminiello v. Chicago 337 U.S. 1 (1949)
Texas v. Johnson 491 U.S. 397 (1989)
Thornhill v. Alabama 310 U.S. 88 (1940)
United States v. Eichman 496 U.S. 310 (1990)
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette 319 U.S. 624 (1943)
Whitney v. California 274 U.S. 357 (1927)
Wooley v. Maynard 430 U.S. 705 (1977)

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS: MODERN PERIOD (1917–PRESENT)

Freedom of the press is a work in progress. The U.S. Constitution's First Amendment provides that the U.S. Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of the press. State constitutions predating the adoption of the Bill of Rights in 1791 provide similar protection. Nevertheless, press freedom had limited scope and meaning when the United States entered World War I in 1917. At the time, courts and the vast majority of legal scholars held the view that the press clause protected only against government censorship, or prior restraint. Government, however, could rightfully punish after publication, as English jurist Sir William Blackstone (1723–1780) noted in his influential Commentaries on the Laws of England.

In June 1917, Congress passed the Espionage Act. The Act targeted, among other activities, the mailing of materials advocating treason, insurrection, or resistance to U.S. laws. The following year, Congress amended it with the Sedition Act of 1918. The Sedition Act criminalized statements intended to provoke or encourage resistance to the war effort. Many states passed similar statutes, resulting in more than 2,000 prosecutions and more than 1,000 convictions under federal and state laws. The repressive laws were part of the overall government attack on civil liberties during our nation's first red scare (1917–1920).

Sometimes, government repression breeds unanticipated results. Because several defendants appealed their convictions to the U.S. Supreme Court, some of the justices—notably Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. (1841–1935) and Louis D. Brandeis (1856–1941)—reexamined their theories about dissent and national security. (Similarly, during this era, which included the Palmer Raids, the American Civil Liberties Union was formed.)

But post-WWI defendants did not benefit from the justices' emerging theories on free press and free speech. The Court upheld the convictions of defendants in cases involving leafleting and periodicals: Schenck v. U. S., 249 U.S. 47 (1919), Frohwerk v. U. S., 249 U.S. 204 (1919), Abrams v. U.S., 250 U.S. 616 (1919), and Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925). (At the same time, in Schenck, Holmes, writing for a unanimous court, said a person might be convicted of a conspiracy to obstruct recruiting by mere words of persuasion. He said, “free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theater and causing a panic,” a now well-worn phrase. He also used the phrase clear and present danger, an expression that has found a place in popular culture.

Holmes also delivered the opinion in Frohwerk v. U.S. He acknowledged that the circulation of the German-language newspaper in question was too small to have an impact on recruiting. Nevertheless, he said, the paper posed a threat to national security because it “represented a little breath that could ‘kindle a flame’ in the ‘tinder box’ of the Germany community...”

A Clear and Present Danger

That summer, intellectuals whom Holmes respected took issue with his view of the appropriate limits of government authority to punish subversive advocacy. Law professors Zechariah Chafee (1885–1957) at Harvard and Ernst Freund (1864–1932) at the University of Chicago and political scientist Harold Laski (1893–1950), also at Harvard, sharply criticized Holmes' reasoning in Schenck and Frohwerk in articles published in the New Republic and Harvard Law Review, letters and in conversation. Laski, Chafee, and Holmes met for tea and discussion on July 23. It is not known what they said, but Holmes' First Amendment position took a libertarian turn that October in Abrams v. United States. Seven justices upheld the convictions of Russian immigrant Jacob Abrams and others for circulating leaflets urging opposition to the war. Their writings posed a clear and present danger, the majority found.

But Holmes and Brandeis dissented, setting the Court on a decades-long search to establish a test to judge the point at which inflammatory words posed a danger to national security and community safety sufficient to justify state punishment. In Abrams, Holmes contended that the First Amendment protected the expression of political opinions “unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purposes of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country.” Holmes also first articulated what he said was a core value of the First Amendment, the marketplace theory of ideas, “that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market...” The free expression theory undergirded much of the Court's free press-free speech rulings in the 1960s and 1970s and has been invoked by proponents of broadcast deregulation.

Congress repealed parts of the espionage and sedition laws in 1921. Much of the Espionage Act remains in Title 18 U.S.C. 793, 794. (Fifty years later, the federal government unsuccessfully argued before the Court that the New York Times violated Title 18 U.S.C. 793, 794 by publishing the Pentagon Papers in New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971).

In the 1930s, a majority of the Court clung to the bad tendency test. By the early 1950s, however, a majority applied various incarnations of the clear and present danger test. Finally, in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), the justices developed a doctrine combining Holmes and Brandeis's immediacy component with a requirement that expression must incite unlawful action to justify government restriction. The serious and imminent threat test is substantially more protective of subversive expression than any of the clear and present danger variants; some scholars contend it is yet another variation of the clear and present danger test. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, the Brandenburg serious and imminent doctrine remains the test for determining the constitutional limits on laws that punish political speech.

For the most part, the Brandenburg test also has protected the entertainment media against liability in incitement lawsuits—wrongful death and other kinds of negligence actions seeking monetary damages. Starting in the mid-1970s, such incitement lawsuits contended, for example, that disk jockey banter, sexually and violently explicit Rock lyrics, on-air stunts, and graphically vicious movie scenes instructed, urged, or inspired a family member to commit crimes leading toward death. The overwhelming number of the suits failed because appeals courts required that plaintiffs show specific intent to promote criminal activity and a direct causal link between exposure to words and resulting deaths.

But the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit allowed a jury award to stand against a magazine publisher in Braun v. Soldier of Fortune Magazine, 968 F.2d 1110 (1992). The appeals court ruled that an advertisement placed in Soldier of Fortune Magazine by a gun-for-hire offering his services to kidnap and murder was an obvious offer of criminal activity. The Court declined to review the ruling. In Rice v. Paladin, 128 F.3d 233 (4th Circuit 1997), cert. denied, 523 U.S. 1074 (1998), the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit reversed a grant of summary judgment favoring a book publisher and sent an aiding and abetting lawsuit back to trial. The appeals court said the publisher had stipulated that he had intended that “the book would immediately be used by criminals and would-be criminals in the solicitation, planning, and commission of murder...” The Court declined to hear the publisher's appeal.

Prior Restraint

Government may impose prior restraints under certain conditions. In Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S.

697 (1931), the leading Court ruling on prior restraint, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes held that prior restraints are legitimate to prevent the obstruction of military recruiting, the dissemination of troop locations, transport dates and numbers, incitements of violence, and publication of obscenity. In the Pentagon Papers case, the Near doctrine protected the right of the New York Times to continue to publish classified government papers. Journalists and civil libertarians hailed Near and the Pentagon Papers rulings as major victories for press freedom.

In Snepp v. U.S., 444 U.S. 507 (1980), the Court ruled that nondisclosure agreements requiring former CIA agents from publishing without government approval were legitimate prior restraints. The Court also ruled that public school officials have the authority to impose prior restraints on student newspapers in Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988). Government's authority to license broadcasters; to limit public protest by time, place, and manner; and court injunctions to prevent violation of copyright laws are other forms of permissible prior restraints.

Sexual Expression

When does sexual expression become obscene? In 1917, such a determination was based on the Hicklin rule established in a British Parliamentary measure in 1868 and adopted by courts in the United States. The rule imposed a version of the highly restrictive bad tendency test; materials that had a tendency to deprave and corrupt minds open to immoral influences could be banned as obscene. Hicklin remained the leading test of obscenity until U.S. Judge John Woosley's ruling in U.S. v. One Book Called "Ulysses," 5 Supp. 182 (S.D.N.Y. 1933). A book is obscene, the judge said, only when it arouses lust in a person with average sexual instincts, rather than to minds open to immoral influences such as abnormal adults and children as the Hicklin rule required. Woosley ruled that James Joyce's Ulysses, now acclaimed as a literary masterpiece, was not obscene.

In 1959, the Court handed down its first opinion on obscenity in U.S. v. Roth, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), establishing a nationwide standard. Justice William Brennan (1906–1997) fashioned the following test for obscenity: “whether to the average person, applying contemporary standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest.” Brennan also declared that obscenity enjoys no protection under the law because it is “devoid of redeeming social importance.”

Over the course of sixteen years, the Court wrestled with its definition of obscenity until it reached consensus in Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973). Under the Miller guidelines—still the predominate test for obscenity—a judge or jury must weigh whether the “average person, applying contemporary community standards” would find that a work in its entirety appeals to prurient interests; whether the work depicts patently offensive sexual conduct; and whether it lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.

Miller did not put to rest legal efforts to redefine obscenity. Feminists led by novelist Andrea Dworkin and law professor Catharine McKinnon waged an assault on pornography, persuading the Indianapolis–Marion County City–County Council to pass an ordinance banning pornography as sex-based discrimination. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit struck down the ordinance as unconstitutional in American Booksellers Association, Inc. v. Hudnut, 771 F.2d 323 (1985). In New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982), the Court placed the production and sale of child pornography outside the First Amendment’s protection.

Starting in the mid-1990s, the U.S. Congress pursued several mostly unsuccessful efforts to censor adult entertainment in cyberspace. The Court, for example, struck down two provisions of the Communications Decency Act (CDA) in Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997), ruling that the Internet was entitled to a level of First Amendment protection historically enjoyed by print. Two decades after Ferber, the Court—acknowledging that computer technology allows one to make realistic human images without the use of live models—ruled the Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996 unconstitutional. In Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002), Justice Anthony M. Kennedy ruled that child sexual abuse recorded in child pornography is not the same as the expression of the idea of child sexuality created by digital technology.

In American Civil Liberties Union v. Ashcroft, 535 U.S. 564 (2004), the Court affirmed a lower court finding that the Child Online Protection Act (COPA) violated the First Amendment. Earlier, the Court ruled the Children’s Internet Protection Act (CIPA) constitutional in U.S. v. American Library Association, 539 U.S. 194 (2003). CIPA requires public libraries to place filters on computers to prevent children from accessing adult content.

Meanwhile, by one count, the number of pornographic Web pages grew from fourteen million in 1998 to 420 million within five years. In 2004, it was estimated that Americans spent $10 billion a year on adult entertainment.

Libel

For 173 years, courts considered libel—defamatory statements that harm reputation—outside the protection of the First Amendment. Consequently, citizens and journalists risked criminal prosecution and civil liability by accusing government officials of misconduct. Under most states’ seditious libel laws, truth was no defense. Under most states’ civil libel laws, truth was a defense, but a statement’s minor inaccuracies rendered an entire news report untrue. Thus, public officials could and did use such laws to intimidate or punish critics and muckrakers. In the early 1960s, the threat of such suits dampened news coverage of the civil rights movement.

That changed after the Court handed down its ruling in New York v. Sullivan, 375 U.S. 254 (1964), one of the Court’s most significant free press rulings. The ruling stemmed from a libel action brought by L. B. Sullivan, a public affairs commissioner in Montgomery, Alabama. Inaccurate and false statements published in a political advertisement in the New York Times in 1960 falsely defamed him, Sullivan charged. Sullivan won a $500,000 judgment against the Times.

Overtaking the judgment, Brennan sought to create breathing space for the erroneous statements that are inevitably part of political debate and journalism reportage by creating a test for defamatory statements targeting public officials in their public capacity. The First Amendment, Brennan declared, required a public official to show with clear and convincing evidence that a defamatory statement about an official’s public conduct was made with actual malice or with knowing or reckless disregard for the truth. The ruling also declared the Sedition Act of 1798 unconstitutional, deemed that advertisements addressing social issues were political speech worthy of full First Amendment protection, and made libel law a federal constitutional matter. In following years, the Court required non-governmental, public figures to meet the same standard in libel actions.

The ruling had an immediate impact beyond the legal sphere; it is widely believed that soon after, news coverage of the civil rights struggle increased. It has had long-term consequences. The Media Law Resource Center, for example, reports that since 1980, the annual average number of trials in each decade declined, and media defendants’ win percentage has increased during the same period.

Free Press v. Privacy

The press's right to report on matters of public concern may be checked by an individual's right to privacy, the right to be left alone. In 1890, Brandeis, then a Boston lawyer and Samuel Warren, also a lawyer, proposed a theory of a right to privacy to check what they saw as the press's excessive gossip mongering. Their theory gave rise to civil actions (torts) in which plaintiffs sued for the emotional and physical harm resulting from invasion of privacy. In the early 1900s, the New York legislature and Georgia Supreme Court were the first to recognize such legal actions.

In 1960, another law review article sparked renewed interest in invasion of privacy torts. In that article, legal scholar William L. Prosser defined four types of invasion of privacy torts: intrusion, false light, appropriation, and publication of private matters. Most states allow plaintiffs to sue based on Prosser's four legal actions.

Free press advocates are troubled by the intrusion and publication of private torts because, unlike libel, truth is not necessarily a defense in such cases. In the 1990s, plaintiffs recast intrusion complaints and other allegations of wrongdoing such as fraud and misrepresentation into news-gathering torts. Such new legal theories threatened to handcuff the press's ability to gather news, particularly to conduct undercover investigations.

News-Gathering Torts

In its landmark ruling in Cohen V. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663 (1991), the Court held that journalists must obey laws that apply to everyone—laws of general applicability. In Cowles Media, the general applicable law was contract. Two newspaper reporters broke their promise of confidentiality to a source. As a result, the source lost his job.

Within a few years after Cowles Media, plaintiffs—mostly corporations—targeted journalists for alleged wrongs committed during news gathering. In the mid-1990s, a lawsuit brought by the Food Lion, Inc. supermarket company against Capital Cities/ABC Inc. threatened to make investigative reporting too costly to pursue. Food Lion sued ABC-TV's Prime Time Live for fraud, trespass, misrepresentations, and breach of loyalty stemming from the television magazine shows' undercover probe of food preparation at a Food Lion store. The allegations of unsanitary food preparation were apparently true; they were caught on camera. Nevertheless, a jury awarded the company an astounding $5,545,750 in punitive damages and $1,400 in actual damages in 1997.

The size of the punitive damage award, many in the media argued, posed a grave threat to freedom of the press. Two years later, however, an appeals court reduced the award to a mere two dollars. The court ruled that undercover journalists did not defraud the company in Food Lion, Inc. v. Capital Cities/ABC, Inc., 194 F.3d 505 (4th Cir. 1999).

As a general rule, the First Amendment does not license journalists to break the law to obtain information. The Court, however, held in Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001) that the First Amendment protects news media outlets that disseminate information about a matter of public significance when a stranger breaks a law to obtain the information.

A small minority of state courts also allow a journalist to mount a substantive First Amendment defense during a criminal trial; that is, a judge allows a journalist to argue to a jury that he broke the law solely to publicize a publicly significant matter, did not benefit from the illegal act, or cause the harm the statute was designed to prevent. Typically, however, courts reject the notion that the First Amendment provides a defense to a criminal charge.

Access

It is almost universally accepted that governments have a legitimate interest in keeping sensitive military, espionage, and diplomatic information from the public. In the United States, laws establishing federal departments called “housekeeping statutes,” passed as early as 1789, allowed such departments to keep certain information secret. Even so, it was not until the cold war period that the news media and government clashed over public access to government documents.

Such conflicts led to the formation of a Special Subcommittee on Government Information, more popularly known as the Moss subcommittee after its chair, California Democratic Representative John E. Moss (1915–1997) in 1955. Meanwhile, prominent journalists and the American Society of Newspaper Editors (ASNE) spearheaded efforts to fight government secrecy. The ASNE formed the Freedom of Information Committee. Their combined efforts led to the passage of the Federal Public Records Law, known as the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) in 1966.

The act provides a right of access to government information, although it provides nine categories of exemptions. The 1972 Federal Advisory Committee Act requires executive branch federal advisory committees to be open. The 1976 Government in the Sunshine Act requires public access to federal boards, commissions, and councils subject to the nine exemptions provided by FOIA. The 1996 Electronic Freedom of Information Act requires access to electronically stored databases. States and the District of Columbia have passed similar acts and Sunshine Laws requiring open access to public meetings.

The First Amendment, however, does not guarantee the press or the public a right to government information or access to meetings and places. From a free press advocate's view, such lack of constitutional protection weakens the right to know, because statute-guaranteed rights are quite vulnerable to politics. Such advocates also argue that FOIA exemptions are so broad as to make the disclosure requirements almost meaningless.

In its September 2004 edition of Homefront Confidential: How the War on Terrorism Affects Access to Information and the Public's Right to Know, the Reporter's Committee for Freedom of the Press claimed the Bush Administration's post-9/11 security measures severely threatened public access to government-held information. The committee identified Attorney General John Ashcroft's 2001 memo, instructing agency heads on how to use FOIA exemptions to deny access by claiming invasion of privacy or breach of national security and new federal laws and regulations that override state open records laws as part of the effort limiting access. The committee, however, noted that the highly controversial USA Patriot Act had not had an impact on news gathering.

In the 1990s, the popularity of personal computers, allowing anyone access to the Internet, launched the Information Age. But quick and easy access to a wealth of government-collected data and information raised concerns about invasion of privacy. Privacy right advocates argued that the universal and almost effortless access to public records containing information such as social security numbers that the Internet provides posed a threat to privacy that did not exist when the same public records were stored in files in government buildings. Acting on that logic, access to driver's license information that the public and press enjoyed for many decades was restricted under the federal Drivers Privacy Protection Act of 1994 and similar state statutes.

Fair Trial–Free Press

A presumption that local and federal trials are open to the public and the press predates the U.S.

Constitution. Of course, the Founding Fathers did not contemplate photography cameras or radio and television broadcast equipment. But during the first four decades of the twentieth century, many judges allowed reporters to use photography cameras and radio transmission equipment at criminal trials. In 1937, the American Bar Association (ABA) adopted Judicial Canon 35 and spurred the federal government and all states to ban cameras and broadcasting equipment from courtroom proceedings. The ABA adopted Canon 35 in response to what many saw as the largely media-created chaos of the Bruno Hauptmann trial of 1937.

No court has held that the news media have a First Amendment right to televise courtroom proceedings. The Court, however, ruled in Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560 (1981) that states may televise trials as long as a defendant's right to a fair trial is protected. Under Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure 53, only the Court and Congress have the authority to permit cameras at federal criminal trials. The Court exercised that authority when it declined to allow the oral arguments of Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000) to be televised.

Although some reporter's tools might be banned, the Court has held that reporters and the public have a First Amendment right to attend pretrial proceedings, jury selection, and trials. Lower federal and state courts have held that reporters have a right to attend other proceedings such as bail and plea hearings.

The constitutional right of access does not extend to civil proceedings nationwide. Only a handful of federal appeals courts have ruled that reporters and the public have a constitutional right of access to such proceedings. Since the late 1980s, reporters and free press advocates have been highly critical of the practice by some judges of sealing files to prevent news of filings and settlements of lawsuits and the practice of deleting opinions from the public record.

Under the Constitution, judges have the authority to impose gag orders—another form of prior restraint—on reporters to protect a defendant's right to a fair trial. But judges are required to adhere to a balancing test established in Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976). Can court-imposed injunctions effectively work as prior restraints in the Internet era? Any one with a website, access to e-mail, or access to chat groups can disseminate confidential government and court documents to thousands within minutes. The risk remains, however, that courts may use their contempt power to punish after publication.

Electronic Media

Radio did not start as a mass medium. In its earliest incarnation in 1900, mostly shipping vessels used radio wave transmitters and receivers to communicate ship to ship. Even then, governments recognized the need to regulate the airwaves, particularly for maintaining safety on the high seas. The radio wave spectrum is limited, and a frequency is useless when more than one entity transmits on or near it simultaneously. Consequently, the U.S. government started to regulate use of the airwaves in 1910.

By 1923, radio had become a mass medium; there were 556 broadcasting stations operating and 550,000 radio receivers that year. With the growing popularity of radio broadcasting, interference problems resurfaced. In response, Congress passed the Radio Act of 1927, which established the Federal Radio Commission. The Act authorized the commission to issue and revoke licenses to ensure clear radio transmission, to regulate programming for the public interest, convenience, and necessity, but not to censor broadcasters.

In 1934, Congress passed the Communications Act, folding the FRC and its authority into the newly created Federal Communications Commission (FCC). But the Act failed to clarify whether the authority to regulate in the public interest infringed on a broadcaster's right to control its programming. The Court issued its first response to that question in National Broadcasting Co. v. U.S., 319 U.S. 190 (1943), noting that potential broadcasters far outnumbered the availability of radio frequencies and, consequently, government regulation was necessary. Under that rationale—otherwise known as spectrum scarcity—radio and television broadcasters do not enjoy the full First Amendment rights accorded print journalists.

The Court reaffirmed the doctrine's legitimacy in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. Inc. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969). In its ruling, the Court upheld the FCC's fairness doctrine that requires radio and television outlets to allow targets of on-air personal or political attacks to reply. The Court also noted that the public's First Amendment rights are paramount to broadcasters'. The FCC eliminated the fairness doctrine in 1987. Nevertheless, it is still constitutionally valid, having never been struck down by the Court. In contrast, the Court struck down a similar right-to-reply imposed on newspapers in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974).

The Court held in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), that the uniquely pervasive presence of broadcasting in the home justifies FCC authority to fine licensees for indecent broadcasting. In contrast, print publishers and writers of sexually explicit expression are subject only to prosecution for obscenity.

Civil libertarians and free market advocates argue that spectrum scarcity is not a valid rationale for government regulation of broadcast because cable and satellite television, the Internet, and the technological capability to splice the spectrum have dramatically increased consumers' choices of electronic media. In the 1970s and 1980s, the Court seemed as though it was open to reexamine its spectrum scarcity-public trustee rationale in its ruling in CBS, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973) and FCC v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364 (1984). Yet as of 2005, the Court had not abandoned the spectrum rationale.

It has, however, ruled that spectrum scarcity does not provide a rationale for government licensing of cable TV outlets, communication satellites in Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622 (1994), and or the Internet in Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997). Under Reno v. ACLU, the Court held that the Internet enjoys the substantial First Amendment protections afforded the print media.

The Court has not made clear the precise contours of cable's First Amendment protections. The government, for example, has the authority to require some cable operators to set aside channel capacity for local broadcasters as the Court held in Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC, 520 U.S. 180 (1997). On the other hand, in U.S. v. Playboy Entertainment Group, 529 U.S. 803 (2000), the Court declined to apply the restrictions of FCC v. Pacifica Foundation on cable television.

Reporter's Privilege

The press argued that reporters should be shielded from forced testimony as early as 1848 when the U.S. Senate put New York Herald reporter John Nugent under arrest, the first recorded jailing of a journalist for refusing to identify a confidential source. Nugent refused to reveal the identity of the source who gave him a copy of a secret draft treaty between the United States and Mexico. After a month, the Senate released Nugent. Most historians believe then-Secretary of State James Buchanan was the source of the leak.

In 1957, the same newspaper—then the New York Herald Tribune—engaged in another dispute over the reporter's privilege to remain silent. The newspaper argued in Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545 (1958), that journalists enjoy a reporter-source privilege under the First Amendment. The Herald Tribune was the first to make a First Amendment argument for such a testimonial privilege for journalists, but to no avail. A federal appeals court rejected the argument.

Twelve years later in Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 444 (1969), the Court declined to find a testimonial privilege for an agreement a journalist makes with a source to conceal information. The ruling was five to four, and a plurality opinion said prosecutorial bad-faith investigations amounted to impermissible harassment. A concurring opinion noted that courts would protect journalists “where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection.” In addition, Justice Potter Stewart’s (1915–1985) dissent offered a rationale for striking the proper balance between freedom of the press and the general obligation to respond to a subpoena.

By the early years of the twenty-first century, eleven of twelve federal appeals courts recognized some form of qualified reporter’s privilege, with the Eighth Circuit as the exception. Courts and legislatures in forty-nine states and the District of Columbia also recognized a qualified reporter’s privilege. Most used Stewart’s balancing test. Statutes that provide protection against forced testimony by reporters are called shield laws, and in response to the scandal stemming from the outing of Valerie Plame, a CIA operative, by a newspaper columnist, federal legislators proposed two versions of a federal shield law in 2005.

In 1791, few doubted that freedom of the press entitled pamphleteers to protection under the newly adopted Bill of Rights. Yet in the first decade of twenty-first century, bloggers—the modern-day counterpart to pamphleteers—had yet to earn the full protections and privileges enjoyed by traditional reporters. In 2005, for example, a California appeals judge in Apple Computer, Inc. v. Doe, 1-04-CV-032178 (2005), declined to address whether bloggers were qualified to invoke the reporter’s privilege to remain silent. Freedom of the press is a work in progress.

ARTHUR S. HAYES

References and Further Reading

- Blackstone, William. Commentaries on the Laws of England. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1991.
- Cornwell, Nancy C. Freedom of the Press: Rights and Liberties under the Law. Santa Barbara: ABC-CLIO, Inc. 2004.
- Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press. Homefront Confidential: How the War on Terrorism Affects Access to Information and the Public’s Right to Know, <http://www.rcfp.org/homefrontconfidential>, (2005).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abrams v. U.S., 250 U.S. 616 (1919)

American Booksellers Association, Inc. v. Hudnut, 771 F.2d 323 (1985)

American Civil Liberties Union v. Ashcroft, 322 F. 3d 240 (3d Cir. 2003)

Apple Computer, Inc. v. Doe, 1-04-CV-032178 (2005)

Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)

Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001)

Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)

Braun v. Soldier of Fortune Magazine, 968 F.2d 1110 (1992)

Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000)

CBS, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973)

Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560 (1981)

Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663 (1991)

FCC v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364 (1984)

FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)

Food Lion, Inc. v. Capital Cities/ABC, Inc., 194 F.3d 505 (4th Cir. 1999)

Frohwerk v. U.S., 249 U.S. 204 (1919)

Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545 (2d Cir., 1958)

Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)

Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)

Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)

Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)

National Broadcasting Co. v. U.S. 319 U.S. 190 (1943)

Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976)

Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)

New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)

New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971)

New York v. Sullivan, 375 U.S. 254 (1964)

Red Lion Broadcasting Co. Inc. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)

Reno v. ACLU, 521 U. S. 844 (1997)

Rice v. Paladin, 128 F. 3d 233 (4th Cir.1997), cert. denied, 523 U.S. 1074 (1998)

Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622 (1994)

Schenck v. U.S., 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

Snepp v. U.S., 444 U.S. 507 (1980)

U.S. American Library Association, 539 U.S. 194 (2003)

U.S. v. Playboy Entertainment Group, 529 U.S. 803 (2000)

U.S. v. One Book Called “Ulysses,” 5.Supp. 182 (S.D.N. Y.1933)

U.S. v. Roth, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

FREUND, PAUL A. (1908-1992)

Paul A. Freund, an eminent constitutional law scholar at Harvard Law School, was born in St. Louis, Missouri on February 16, 1908. After graduating from Washington University in 1928 and receiving his L.L.B and S.J.D. from Harvard Law School in 1931 and 1932, he served as law clerk to Justice Louis D. Brandeis (1932–1933). He spent most of the next dozen years serving in the executive branch of the federal government—in the Treasury Department, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and twice in the Solicitor’s General’s office. He joined the Harvard Law School faculty first in 1939, and then permanently in 1946, where he taught until his retirement in 1976. Freund declined the entreaty of President John F. Kennedy to serve as Solicitor General in December 1960. Kennedy later considered, but passed over, Freund for two Supreme Court appointments in 1962. Freund died February 5, 1992.

Freund wrote widely on the Supreme Court and its justices and the constitutional issues of the era, including those relating to civil liberties. He frequently testified before Congressional committees considering such matters.

Freund generally supported the Warren Court's decisions that took on expansive view of civil liberties. He thought they made America more participatory and less hierarchical. He did not usually embrace the absolute tests of many of those opinions, believing that the cases often involved competing principles. He tended to strike the balance in a way that protected civil liberties but thought the Warren Court sometimes prescribed one approach when a range of solutions would protect the constitutional norm.

Freund defended the Court's decisions in the early 1960s that banned organized school prayer and classroom Bible reading. He thought these outcomes reflected a proper balance between the claims of the establishment and free exercise clauses consistent with the concept of religious voluntarism implicit in American traditions. The classroom presented an area where psychological pressures to conform were most likely to be coercive. Freund did not view the establishment and free exercise clauses as absolutes. They must yield at times to public concerns and to each other.

Freund helped develop and defend the constitutional basis for the public accommodations section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. In a 1963 brief requested by the Senate Committee on Commerce, Freund argued that Congress had power under the Commerce Clause to outlaw racial discrimination in places of public accommodation. He thought that resting the legislation on § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment was riskier and more problematic jurisprudentially. Congress adopted Freund's rationale, and the Supreme Court upheld the legislation on that basis.

Freund gave early defense to race conscious remedies to address past discrimination against African Americans. In 1964, when affirmative action was in its infancy, he argued that the Constitution did not preclude transitional measures to provide favored treatment to racial minorities to correct for past disadvantage. The Constitution mandated equal protection of the law, not color blindness. The latter was simply a metaphor, and a misleading one at that.

JOEL K. GOLDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

Freund, Paul A. On Law and Justice. Cambridge: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1968.

———. The Supreme Court of the United States: Its Business, Purposes, and Performance. Cleveland: World Publishing Company 1961.

In Memoriam: Paul A. Freund. (Essays by Hon. William J. Brennan, Jr., Hon. Lewis F. Powell, Jr., Archibald Cox, James Vorenberg, and Anthony Lewis) Harvard Law Review 106 (1992): 1–18.

See also Affirmative Action; Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Civil Rights Act of 1964; Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses; Warren Court

FRISBIE v. COLLINS, 342 U.S. 519 (1952)

Frisbie v. Collins involved the forcible capture of Collins in Illinois by Michigan law enforcement agents and his subsequent murder conviction in that state. Collins alleged that “Michigan officers forcibly seized, handcuffed, blackjacked and took him to Michigan” in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment and the Federal Kidnapping Act, thus voiding his conviction. The Supreme Court, with Justice Black writing for the majority, rejected Collins’ argument that the illegal nature of his apprehension denied the Michigan Court jurisdiction, thus reaffirming a position first articulated in the 1886 case Ker v. Illinois. Frisbie reified the concept of male captus bene detentus, otherwise known in Court jurisprudence as the Ker-Frisbie rule, applying it to cases of domestic and extraterritorial abduction. Despite lower court attempts to limit the rule’s scope and application, the precept seems to have survived later constitutional development unscathed.

The Court in Ker affirmed the conviction of a defendant who had been forcibly abducted in Peru by a U.S. agent acting ultra vires and brought back to the United States to stand trial. In Frisbie, Justice Black announced that the Court had “never departed from the rule announced in Ker v. Illinois,” which allowed law enforcement officers personal jurisdiction over an accused, despite the commission of illegal acts in bringing him or her to trial. Had Congress added a sanction to the Kidnapping Act denying states’ jurisdiction to prosecute defendants brought to Court in violation of one of its provisions, a different result the Justices concluded, might obtain. Nor do such abductions enhance the State’s case at trial, as would be the case with illegally seized evidence, for example. But Black’s opinion focused on the fairness of the trial as the critical issue in the due process analysis, finding no Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment violations in the presumably illegal rendition of the defendant across state lines. “Due process of law” wrote the Court, “is satisfied when one present in court is convicted of crime after having been fairly apprised the charges against him and after a fair trial in accordance with constitutional procedural safeguards.”

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit leveled the first major attack on Ker-Frisbie in United States v. Toscanino, holding that recent Supreme Court decisions expressed an “expanded and enlightened” interpretation of due process to cover the pretrial treatment of a defendant. Toscanino had allegedly been tortured by American officials, among others, en route to trial in the United States from Uruguay. The Second Circuit held that the Constitution would require the Court to divest itself of jurisdiction in the face of “unreasonable invasion of the accused’s constitutional rights” where such conduct “shocked the conscience.” However, the demise of Ker-Frisbie in the wake of Toscanino proved illusory. The Fifth, Seventh, and Eleventh Circuit Courts of Appeals have been unreceptive to such an interpretation, whereas the Supreme Court later refused to void a conviction due to “illegal arrest or detention” in Gerstein v. Pugh.

The continuing vitality of the rule does prevent it from being challenged by publicists who argue that it condones detainee abuse by law enforcement officials. But the Ker-Frisbie rule will likely remain relevant, especially in so far as it concerns extraterritorial abduction, because the United States prosecutes its war on terrorism and combats drugs abroad.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Campbell, Andrew, The Ker-Frisbie Doctrine: A Jurisdictional Weapon in the War on Drugs, Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law 23 (1990–1991): 385.
- Semmelman, Jacques, Due Process, International Law, and Jurisdiction over Criminal Defendants Abducted Extraterritorially: The Ker-Frisbie Doctrine Reexamined, Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 30 (1992): 513.
- Torcia, Charles, ed. Wharton’s Criminal Procedure. 13th Ed. Rochester, NY: Lawyers Co-Operative Publishing Co., 1989.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gerstein v. Pugh*, 420 U.S. 103 (1975)
- Ker v. Illinois*, 119 U.S. 436 (1886)
- United States v. Toscanino*, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974)

FRISBY v. SCHULTZ, 487 U.S. 474 (1988)

A town enacted an ordinance prohibiting picketing “before or about” any residence. Abortion foes who wished to picket on the public street outside the residences of abortion providers brought suit, contending that the ordinance was invalid on its face. Substantial precedent supported their position: all public sidewalks, streets, and parks are considered traditional public forums—presumptively open for peaceful marches and protests. The town, however, urged that the Court treat residential picketing differently.

The initial question was the exact reach of the ordinance. Did it prohibit all picketing in residential areas? Or just “targeted” picketing—that is, directed to a particular residence? Because it preferred to avoid addressing substantial constitutional difficulties raised by the broader interpretation, the Court reviewed only the narrower “targeted picketing.”

Place regulations may be upheld only if “narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest” and must “leave open ample alternative channels of communication.” Here, other “channels” remained open: protesters could solicit door-to-door, by phone, or through the mails. Moreover, preserving residential privacy and the tranquility of the home justified the restriction on targeted residential picketing. In public spaces, one can often avert one’s eyes or avoid the controversy. This becomes difficult when one is targeted at home.

The Court’s holding effectively protects residential picketing, yet acknowledges the capacity of government to reduce the din outside a target’s home. Picketers have a right to cycle throughout residential neighborhoods, including in front of a “target’s” home, but the government may prohibit picketing focused on a specific residence.

JOHN NOCKLEBY

See also Public Forum Doctrines

FRUIT OF THE POISONOUS TREE

When the police seize evidence in violation of a defendant’s constitutional rights, the courts have historically applied an exclusionary evidence rule that prevents the prosecutor from using the evidence to convict the defendant (See Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 [1961]). They apply this rule to deter the police from violating citizen’s constitutional rights. A corollary to the exclusionary evidence rule is provided by the “fruit of the poisonous tree” doctrine (a/k/a the “derivative evidence” rule). The fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine provides that, not only is the prosecution prohibited from introducing evidence obtained “directly” from illegality (the poisonous tree), they are also prohibited from using evidence “derived” from the illegality (the fruit) (See Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 [1975]).

Although the derivative evidence rule has been applied in a variety of contexts, it frequently arises in several contexts. One is when the police illegally interrogate a suspect and obtain a confession from which they are able to locate and seize other evidence (for example, a murder weapon). Because the confession was illegally obtained, it constitutes the “poisonous tree,” and the weapon constitutes derivative evidence because the police learned of its existence only because of the illegally obtained confession. A second context in which the derivative evidence rule applies is when the police illegally seize a defendant and obtain a confession as a result of the seizure. For example, suppose that the police illegally stop a motorist who they take to the police station for questioning. The initial seizure may be illegal if the police lacked adequate grounds to make the stop (the police generally must have a “reasonable suspicion” that the motorist was involved in criminal activity), and the decision to take the suspect to the police station may be illegal if the police lacked probable cause. As a result, both the decision to seize and the decision to transport the suspect to the police station constitute “poisonous trees.” If the suspect is then interrogated at the police station and confesses, the confession might be regarded as a “fruit” of the poisonous tree. A third context is when the police illegally stop a motorist (again, perhaps, without a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity) and then develop probable cause to search the motorist’s vehicle, which leads them to find contraband. The illegal search might be regarded as a “fruit” of the illegal stop.

Although the derivative evidence rule is an important part of modern criminal procedure, it is important to realize that it is not slavishly or routinely applied. If the police can show that the fruit of the illegal conduct would have “inevitably” been discovered, or that they have an “independent source” for the information, the courts will sometimes allow it into evidence.

RUSSELL L. WEAVER

References and Further Reading

- Weaver, Russell L., et al. Principles of Criminal Procedure. Thomson/West, 2004, pp. 253–258.
- Weaver, Russell L., et al. Criminal Procedure: Cases, Problems & Exercises. 2nd Ed. Thomson/West, 2001, pp. 662–671.

See also Exclusionary Rule; Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Seizures

FULLER COURT (1888–1910)

The Supreme Court under the leadership of Melville W. Fuller (1888–1910) decided more constitutional controversies than all previous Courts combined. From a contemporary perspective, however, the Fuller Court’s jurisprudence was flawed in a number of respects. For example, it decided Plessy v. Ferguson, which adopted “separate but equal” as an interpretation of the equal protection clause. In the field of civil liberties, it was not an aggressive champion of the noneconomic rights protected by the Constitution but instead a defender of property rights. Even so, the Fuller Court decided a number of significant civil liberties cases and laid much of the groundwork for contemporary constitutional doctrine. Twenty justices served during the Fuller Court, including justices nominated by presidents from Lincoln to Taft and such important figures as John Marshall Harlan I, David Brewer, and Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.

The Fuller Court was the first to use the theory of substantive due process to invalidate state legislation. In 1905, it decided the case that often provides the name for this entire period in Court history, Lochner v. New York. The Fuller Court’s substantive due process decisions were largely limited to economic rights, but these cases laid the fundamental-rights groundwork for much of the Court’s later civil liberties jurisprudence. Perhaps most importantly, the Fuller Court’s substantive due process jurisprudence established, despite great controversy, judicial enforcement of fundamental rights as part of the Supreme Court’s role. Many members of the Court believed that this included protection of unenumerated rights against government invasion. Commentators have traced the origins of modern Privacy decisions to the Fuller Court’s substantive due process jurisprudence.

At the same time as it was protecting unenumerated economic rights, however, the Fuller Court consistently rejected incorporation of the criminal procedural protections found in the Bill of Rights into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Fuller Court, in other words, resisted the various efforts of litigants to federalize state criminal procedure, often over dissents by the first Justice Harlan. It rejected incorporation of the guarantee against cruel and unusual punishment in O’Neil v. Vermont and In re Kemmler, the confrontation clause in West v. Louisiana, the right to a twelve-member jury in criminal cases in Maxwell v. Dow, and the privilege against self-incrimination in Twining v. New Jersey. But its legacy here is complicated. In Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Co. v. Chicago, the Fuller Court held for the first time that a provision in the Bill of Rights applied to the states. That case involved, not surprisingly, property rights protected by the Takings Clause; indeed, this was just one of many significant Takings Clause cases during this period. In addition, Twining, decided in 1908, clarified the fundamental-rights analysis that would be applied in deciding whether to apply Bill of Rights safeguards to the states in future cases.

The Fuller Court did decide some important cases of first impression involving constitutional safeguards in federal criminal cases. Few such cases reached the Supreme Court before extension of its appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases in 1889 and 1891. In two cases, the Fuller Court was the first to address the constitutionality of immunity statutes in light of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, although it is worth noting that both involved business prosecutions. In Counselman v. Hitchcock, a unanimous Court held that the privilege against self-incrimination applies to grand jury witnesses and that immunity statutes must provide at least as much protection as the constitutional privilege. Counselman was not very clear, however. In its immediate aftermath, Congress adopted an immunity statute providing transactional immunity for compelled testimony in federal proceedings. In Brown v. Walker, a narrowly divided Court upheld this statute. But the Court has since held, most significantly in Kastigar v. United States, that the Fifth Amendment only requires use/derivative use immunity, the Kastigar majority concluding that the broad transactional-immunity language in Counselman was merely dicta. The Fuller Court also applied the protection against unreasonable searches and seizures to corporations, while rejecting application of the privilege against self-incrimination to corporations in Hale v. Henkel. The Insular Cases held that constitutional guarantees did not apply in territories acquired in the Spanish-American War. Finally, in Weems v. United States, the Court inserted a proportionality standard into the protection against cruel and unusual punishment.

In religion cases, in Bradfield v. Roberts, the Court rejected a taxpayer's Establishment Clause challenge to a contract between the District of Columbia and a Roman Catholic hospital, holding that institutions with secular purposes may receive governmental aid, as long as they are not pervasively sectarian. The Fuller Court's most notable free-exercise cases, both decided in 1890, involved laws burdening the practice of plural marriage among members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. In Davis v. Beason, the Court upheld an Idaho territory law denying voting rights to members of the church, following the 1878 precedent Reynolds v. United States. A closely divided Court upheld a federal law abolishing the Utah church and expropriating its property in Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. United States. In the latter case, involving property rights, Chief Justice Fuller and three other members of the Court dissented.

The Fuller Court decided two early speech cases, both against speech rights. In Turner v. Williams, the Court upheld the deportation of an English anarchist based on his political beliefs. In Patterson v. Colorado, in an opinion by Justice Holmes, the Court upheld a conviction for criminal contempt based on criticism of the state high court.

The Fuller Court's greatest contribution to civil liberties jurisprudence arguably came in Ex Parte Young, which held that the Eleventh Amendment does not bar suits to enjoin state officials from violating the Constitution and federal law. The legal fiction created in this case has been used by litigants seeking to protect civil liberties and other rights in a great number of cases.

EMERY G. LEE, III

References and Further Reading

- Bernstein, David E., Lochner Era Revisionism, Revised: Lochner and the Origins of Fundamental Rights Constitutionalism, Georgetown Law Review 92 (2003): 1:1–60.
- Currie, David P. The Constitution in the Supreme Court: The Second Century 1888–1986. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- Ely, Jr., James W. The Chief Justiceship of Melville W. Fuller, 1888–1910. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.
- Fiss, Owen M. History of the Supreme Court of the United States, Volume 8: Troubled Beginnings of the Modern State, 1888–1910. New York: Macmillan, 1993.
- King, Willard L. Melville Weston Fuller: Chief Justice of the United States 1888–1910. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967.
- Yarbrough, Tinsley E. Judicial Enigma: The First Justice Harlan. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bradfield v. Roberts*, 175 U.S. 291 (1899)
- Brown v. Walker*, 161 U.S. 591 (1896)
- Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy R. Co. v. Chicago*, 166 U.S. 226 (1897)
- Counselman v. Hitchcock*, 142 U.S. 547 (1892), overruled by Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 411 (1972)
- Davis v. Beason*, 133 U.S. 333 (1890), overruled by Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)
- Ex Parte Young*, 209 U.S. 123 (1908)
- Hale v. Henkel*, 201 U.S. 43 (1906), overruled by Murphy v. Waterfront Commission, 378 U.S. 52 (1964)
- In re Kemmler*, 136 U.S. 436 (1890)
- Kastigar v. United States* 406 U.S. 411 (1972)
- Late Corp. of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints*, 136 U.S. 1 (1890)
- Lochner v. New York*, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)

Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581 (1900), overruled by Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970)
O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U.S. 323 (1892)
Patterson v. Colorado 205 U.S. 454 (1907)
Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
Turner v. Williams 194 U.S. 279 (1904)
Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78 (1908), overruled by Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349 (1910)
West v. Louisiana, 194 U.S. 258 (1904), overruled by Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400 (1965)

See also Incorporation Doctrine; Mormons and Religious Liberty; Substantive Due Process; Waite Court; White Court

FURMAN v. GEORGIA, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)

Furman v. Georgia began the modern era of Capital Punishment jurisprudence in the United States. The broad issue in the case was whether the death penalty was unconstitutional, but the narrower issue concerned capital sentencing procedures. A majority of the Justices did not resolve the first issue, but the Court held that the procedures used to impose the death penalty violated the constitution.

At the time of Furman, death penalty statutes gave juries complete discretion on the issue of whether or not to impose the death penalty. The previous year, in McGautha v. California, the Supreme Court held that such systems do not violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, in Furman, the Court in a five-to-four decision held that these discretionary systems do constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Furman left open several issues because there was no clear consensus among the Justices. In addition to the short per curiam opinion striking the death penalty in the cases at issue, each of the nine Justices wrote a separate opinion, creating the longest decision ever issued by the Court.

Two of the Justices in the majority concluded that the death penalty itself is unconstitutional, but the other three Justices in the majority did not go so far, focusing on the arbitrariness and racial discrimination resulting from the process. Furman ended the death penalty in the United States until the Court approved of new death penalty statutes approximately four years later in Gregg v. Georgia.

JEFFREY L. KIRCHMEIER

References and Further Reading

Kirchmeier, Jeffrey L., Another Place Beyond Here: the Death Penalty Moratorium Movement in the United States, Colorado Law Review 73 (2002): 1:1–116 (article available at <http://www.colorado.edu/law/lawreview/issues/summaries/73-1.htm>).

Woodward, Bob, and Scott Armstrong. The Brethren: Inside the Supreme Court 260. New York: Avon Books, 1981.
 Zimring, Franklin E., and Gordon Hawkins. Capital Punishment and the American Agenda, New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183, 196 (1971)

See also Capital Punishment; Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)

FW/PBS, INC. v. CITY OF DALLAS, 493 U.S. 215 (1990)

Young v. American Mini-Theatres (1976) and Renton v. Playtime Theatres (1986) upheld the constitutionality of zoning ordinances regulating the locations of movie theaters specializing in sexually explicit films to counter the theatres' negative secondary effects on adjacent neighborhoods or nearby places of worship or schools. In the wake of these decisions, localities adopted more comprehensive regulations, including licensing schemes as well as zoning restrictions that focused on a wider array of "adult businesses."

Dallas, Texas, the respondent in this case, adopted a regulatory regime involving zoning, licensing, and inspections of sexually oriented businesses that included adult arcades, bookstores, video stores, cabarets, motels, theaters, and, before the Supreme Court reviewed the ordinance, escort agencies, nude model studios, plus "sexual encounter centers." Three separate lawsuits were filed by an array of businesses in federal district court that upheld most of the ordinance. The cases were subsequently appealed to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, which affirmed the lower court, viewing it as a content-neutral time, place, and manner regulation under Renton.

Critical to the Supreme Court's review was the circuit court's conclusion that, despite the absence of the procedural safeguards mandated in the film censorship case, Freedman v. Maryland (1965), the ordinance was constitutional. Brennan's majority opinion in Freedman struck down Maryland's law because the procedures for censoring and licensing the presentation of films created the risk of delay while lacking prompt judicial review of decisions censoring or banning films. Prompt judicial review was needed whenever "unduly onerous" procedures for judicial review mean the “censor’s determination may, in practice, be final.”

Brennan proposed three procedural protections in Freedman. First, a censorship scheme must assure the exhibitor, “by statute or authoritative judicial construction, that the censor will, within a specified brief period, either issue a license or go to court to restrain showing the film.” Second, the censorship scheme must “assure a prompt final judicial decision” after a refusal to license because, Brennan reasoned, “only a judicial determination in an adversary proceeding ensures the necessary sensitivity to freedom of expression.” Third, “the burden of proving that the film is unprotected expression must rest on the censor.”

FB/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas resulted in a complex, divided ruling that affirmed in part, reversed in part, and vacated in part with the cases remanded for further consideration. One issue dividing the Court was whether the Dallas ordinance constituted a censorship regime with regard to the regulation of adult businesses. Another issue, if the Dallas law was a censorship regime, was whether Freedman applied and if so whether all three parts of Brennan’s test were also applicable.

O’Connor authored the fractured opinion. Stevens and Kennedy joined her opinion declaring the Dallas ordinance unconstitutional because it constituted a prior restraint on protected expression. According to O’Connor, a regulatory regime placing “unbridled discretion in the hands of a government official or agency” with respect to the location, licensing, or inspection of adult businesses “constitutes a prior restraint.” Such restraints are not unconstitutional per se, but “any system of prior restraint...comes to this Court bearing a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity.”

Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun agreed with O’Connor that the ordinance was unconstitutional, giving her six votes on this question. The three justices, however, balked at her conclusion that because the Dallas ordinance did not pose the “grave ‘dangers of a censorship system’” that only Freedman’s first two elements, particularly “the possibility of prompt judicial review,” were applicable. The three justices argued the burden of proof element also applied.

White and Rehnquist, agreeing with the Fifth Circuit Court, felt the ordinance as a time, place, and manner restriction was not subject to strict scrutiny and thus Freedman was inapplicable. Scalia dissented from the judgment and developed an alternative argument that the Dallas ordinance legitimately regulated the “pandering” activity of adult businesses, consistent with Ginzburg v. United States (1966).

The difficulties the decision in FW/PBS created for the lower courts surfaces in the litigation leading to City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts (2004).

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-Clio, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D-4, L.L.C.*, 2003-058 (2004)
- City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.*, 475 U.S. 41 (1986)
- Freedman v. Maryland*, 380 U.S. 51 (1965)
- FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas*, 493 U.S. 215 (1990)
- Ginzburg v. United States* 383 U.S. 463 (1966)
- Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc.*, 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

G

GAG ORDERS IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

Gag orders are judicial commands that restrict the media's right to publish stories about a case or a trial participant's right to talk about the case outside the courtroom. The Supreme Court in Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966), endorsed gag orders as a tool for combating prejudicial publicity, but media gag orders have rarely been used since 1976, when the Court in Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976), held that they are a form of prior restraint and presumptively unconstitutional. The Court ruled that media gag orders should be used only in exceptional circumstances; in order to issue such an order, a judge must show that the nature and extent of the publicity would jeopardize a fair trial, that the proposed gag order would be effective, and that there are no less restrictive alternative measures available to prevent the harm (such as change of venue, continuance, or jury sequestration).

After Nebraska Press Association, judges turned to more indirect ways to prevent prejudicial publicity by issuing gag orders limiting the out-of-court statements of parties, attorneys, witnesses, police officers, and other trial participants for the duration of the trial. The Supreme Court has not specifically addressed the constitutionality of participant gag orders, although in Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991), the Court ruled that out-of-court statements by attorneys may be punished after the fact if it can be shown that the statements posed "a substantial likelihood" of materially prejudicing a trial. The case involved not a gag order but a state ethics rule that barred attorneys from making prejudicial statements outside the courtroom. In finding that the rule's "substantial likelihood of material prejudice" standard was a constitutionally permissible balance between an attorney's free speech rights and a defendant's right to a fair trial, the Court indicated that attorneys may enjoy reduced speech rights as officers of the court.

In the absence of clear guidance from the Supreme Court, no consensus exists among lower courts about the constitutionality of participant gag orders, nor even about the constitutional standard that should be used to examine them. Some courts have extended the reasoning of Gentile and allowed the imposition of participant gag orders in criminal and civil trials as long as the judge finds a "substantial" or "reasonable" likelihood of prejudice without them. Other courts have applied strict scrutiny, requiring a showing that the publicity represents a "clear and present danger" or "serious and imminent threat" to the fairness of the proceedings for a gag order to be imposed.

Lower courts are divided on whether participant gag orders violate the First Amendment rights of the press and public as recipients of speech. The Supreme Court has recognized some constitutional protection for newsgathering, and lower courts have generally granted standing to the media to challenge participant gag orders. Courts are split, however, on whether participant gag orders constitute a prior restraint on the media and whether the media can assert trial participants' First Amendment rights when those directly affected have not challenged the gag order.

KATHLEEN K. OLSON

References and Further Reading

- Bernabe-Riefkohl, Alberto, Prior Restraints on the Media and the Right to a Fair Trial: A Proposal for a New Standard, Kentucky Law Journal 84 (1995/1996): 259–316.
- Chemerinsky, Erwin, The Sound of Silence: Reflections on the Use of the Gag Order: Lawyers Have Free Speech Rights, Too: Why Gag Orders on Trial Participants Are Almost Always Unconstitutional, Loyola of Los Angeles Entertainment Law 17 (1997): 311–331.
- Swartz, Michael E., Trial Participant Speech Restrictions: Gaggling First Amendment Rights, Columbia Law Review Journal 90 (1990): 1411–1444.
- Todd, Rene L., A Prior Restraint by Any Other Name: The Judicial Response to Media Challenges of Gag Orders Directed at Trial Participants, Michigan Law Review 88 (1990): 1171–1208.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada*, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991)
- Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart*, 427 U.S. 539 (1976)
- Sheppard v. Maxwell*, 384 U.S. 333 (1966)

See also Clear and Present Danger Test; Disciplining Lawyers for Speaking about Pending Cases; Free Press/Fair Trial; Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991); Media Access to Judicial Proceedings; Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976); Prior Restraints; Standing in Free Speech Cases

GAG RULE

In an effort to provide low-income women in the United States with greater access to family planning advice from skilled health care and social service professionals, Congress passed—and President Richard Nixon signed into law—the Public Health Service Act of 1970. To help assist in its implementation, Title X of the act authorized the secretary of Health and Human Services to “make grants to and enter into contracts with public or nonprofit private entities to assist in the establishment and operation of voluntary family planning projects which shall offer a broad range of acceptable and effective family planning methods and services” (Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 1991). However, Title X prohibited the secretary from making grants that fund “programs where abortion is a method of family planning” and enabled him to enact rules and regulations to ensure that this and other aspects of the provision were followed by Title X grantees.

In 1988, acting pursuant to Title X's delegation of authority, the secretary of Health and Human Services published detailed regulations (subsequently labeled the “gag order” by their detractors) designed to eliminate the possibility of federal funds being used by Title X grantees to engage in, or counsel clients about the use of, abortion procedures as a form of family planning. According to the regulations, while working within the confines of a federally subsidized project, the employees of a Title X service provider were prohibited from counseling clients or disseminating material to clients about abortion; lobbying or litigating for policies that would make abortion more widely available; employing speakers to discuss the benefits of abortion; paying dues to organizations that promote abortion; or referring pregnant women to abortion providers. The regulations proved to be quite controversial, and in Rust v. Sullivan (1991), the U.S. Supreme Court was faced with a challenge to their legality.

Chief Justice William Rehnquist, writing in Rust, noted that the 1988 HHS regulations “reverse[d] a long-standing agency policy that permitted nondirective counseling and referral for abortion, and thus represented a sharp break from the department's prior construction of the statute.” The Rust Court explained how the regulations emphasized Title X's focus on preconception aspects of family planning (as opposed to postconception issues like prenatal care, childbirth, and pregnancy). Title X grantees were not supposed to provide pregnant women directly with health care services or advice. Instead, the regulations held that all “Title X projects must refer every pregnant client ‘for appropriate prenatal and/or social services by furnishing a list of available providers that promote the welfare of the mother and the unborn child’” (Rust).

Moreover, in keeping with its nonpromotion of abortion philosophy, the new HHS regulatory scheme held that the list of service providers could not be biased in favor of providers that perform or advocate abortion as a family planning option and that a pregnant woman could not be referred to an abortion provider—even if that was her specific request. Finally, the regulations required that grantees be able to demonstrate a clear separation between their projects subsidized by federal monies and their nonsubsidized projects involving abortion. A provider could attempt to comply with this requirement by using separate budget and accounting systems, different personnel, and distinct physical facilities and equipment for its abortion-related and non-abortion-related projects.

The Rust challengers—a group of doctors suing on behalf of themselves and their patients—argued that the secretary’s regulations violated the congressional intent behind Title X. In particular, they argued that Congress’s goal in writing Title X’s ban on projects using abortion as a “method of family planning” was to prohibit Title X grantees from using federal money to perform—as opposed to counsel clients about—abortions. However, the Supreme Court rejected this contention and instead affirmed the lower court’s conclusion that judges must give significant deference to a federal agency that has been delegated significant regulatory authority, and that the agency’s new rules were based on a reasonable and legitimate interpretation of the statute and its legislative intent. The fact that the new regulations constituted a “sharp break” from past interpretations of the statute did not trouble the Court; the majority explained that expert administrators need to be provided ample leeway to modify and improve agency rules.

The challengers also believed that the new HHS regulations violated several aspects of the U.S. Constitution. First, they asserted that the regulations impinged to an unacceptable degree on a woman’s constitutional right to obtain an abortion. The Court rejected this idea by drawing on those precedents in which it had upheld state laws that prohibited the use of government money, employees, or facilities in the performance of abortions (see Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 1977; Harris v. McCrae, 448 U.S. 297, 1980; Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490, 1989). In those cases the Court held that the laws being challenged did not erect barriers to a pregnant woman’s right to obtain an abortion that did not exist prior to their enactment. For example, a poor woman who could not afford an abortion prior to the enactment of these laws would be just as likely not to be able to afford one afterward. The Rust majority held that the new HHS regulations were analogous by arguing that the “difficulty that a woman encounters when a Title X project does not provide abortion counseling or referral leaves her in no different position than she would have been if the Government had not enacted Title X.”

Since the new regulations prohibited doctors from providing all pertinent information to their patients, the Rust challengers argued that they constituted an unwarranted governmental intrusion into the doctor–patient relationship. This, in turn, infringed upon the fundamental constitutional right to make personal medical decisions free from governmental interference—a right that is enhanced if the medical decision pertains to a procedure that, like abortion, has been categorized as a fundamental constitutional right. For legal authority the challengers cited Akron v. Akron

Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983), and Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986).

In those decisions the Court struck down state regulations that required health care personnel to inform each patient who considered having an abortion about the potential health risks of abortion vis-à-vis childbirth; the nature of the abortion procedure being contemplated; the status and potential viability of the patient’s fetus; the presence of state assistance for prenatal, childbirth, and neonatal care; and the availability of printed materials discussing the gestation of fetuses. The states argued in both cases that they were merely attempting to provide women with all pertinent information necessary for them to make rational decisions that would best fit their individual circumstances. Nevertheless, the Court held that the laws unjustifiably interfered with the constitutional right of women to obtain abortions.

The Rust majority, however, did not believe that the Secretary’s regulations posed the same problems as the regulations involved in Akron and Thornburgh. Specifically, the majority drew attention to the fact that the Akron and Thornburgh regulations applied to all women and their respective health care providers within each state’s respective jurisdiction. In contrast, the HHS regulations only apply to women seeking family planning advice from an agency operating pursuant to a Title X grant. Women are free to seek alternative family planning advice—free from Title X constraints—from providers who are not in any way associated with Title X or who have erected a firewall between their Title X projects and their other family planning programs.

As the majority in Rust explained, a “doctor’s ability to provide, and a woman’s right to receive, information concerning abortion and abortion-related services outside the context of the Title X project remains unfettered.” The petitioners countered by arguing that the regulations violate the constitutional rights of poor women since they will often find it impossible to afford family planning assistance outside of clinics subsidized with Title X funds. The majority rejected this idea by again emphasizing that poor women are “in no worse position than if Congress had never enacted Title X.”

Another argument proffered by the Rust petitioners was that the secretary’s regulations violated free-speech principles of the First Amendment. As the Rust majority explained:

Petitioners contend that the regulations violate the First Amendment by impermissibly discriminating based on viewpoint because they prohibit “all discussion about abortion as a lawful option—including counseling, referral, and the provision of neutral and accurate information about ending a pregnancy—while compelling the clinic or counselor to provide information that promotes continuing a pregnancy to term.”

The majority rejected this claim by explaining that employees of family planning clinics that accept Title X funds do not forfeit their ability to engage in discussion of abortion in contexts outside of Title X projects. Moreover, it explained that clinics are not coerced by the government to seek and accept Title X funds; if a clinic’s staff does not want to be constrained in how it counsels patients, then it should not apply for a Title X grant.

Drawing again on its decisions in Maier (Maier v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 1977) and Harris, the majority concluded that the government’s legitimate interest in protecting fetal life justified family planning policies that did not promote abortion. The First Amendment does not require that the government act neutrally by giving all family planning methods equal recognition. Such a principle would be hard to contain, the Court argued, because all government laws are viewpoint biased in the sense that they reflect the government’s decision to select and promote a single policy option (and that option’s corresponding views about proper behavior) from what is typically an infinite menu of alternatives. The government would be forced to give up passing laws and thereby close its doors if the Court were to enforce such a broad principle.

One can reasonably argue that employees of family planning agencies who are participating in the implementation of a legitimate government program should not have the ability to articulate views that directly conflict with (and potentially undermine) that program’s policy goals. Just as the government can limit what its employees are allowed to say in their capacity as government employees (see Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 1983), it should also be allowed to regulate what a family planning agency’s employees can say while they are working within the confines of a Title X project. Although the majority did not expressly employ this reasoning, it did imply that personnel working on Title X projects take on the status of “quasigovernment” employees, with many of the potential speech constraints that that status sanctions.

In 1992, President George H. W. Bush lifted the counseling and referral bans on doctors working in the context of Title X programs—the bans were left in effect for other employees working for Title X providers (see National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association, Inc. v. Sullivan, 1992). However, on January 22, 1993, the newly inaugurated President Clinton suspended the regulations and asked the secretary of Health and Human Services to start the rulemaking process in order to have them permanently replaced. This was eventually accomplished on July, 3, 2000, when the Department of Health and Human Services published new regulations nearly identical to the pre-1988 regulations. These regulations granted Title X service providers the authority to offer their clients nondirective counseling and referral advice about all aspects of family planning—including abortion. The regulations continue to remain in effect as of the time of this writing.

MARK KEMPER

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc.*, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)
- Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market of Massachusetts, Inc.*, 366 U.S. 617 (1961)
- Harris v. McCrae*, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
- Maier v. Roe*, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
- National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association, Inc. v. Sullivan*
- Rust v. Sullivan*, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
- Thornburg v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists*, 476 U.S. 747 (1986)
- Webster v. Reproductive Health Services*, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

See also Sunday Closing Cases and Laws

GANG ORDINANCES

In 1988, California enacted the Street Terrorism Enforcement and Prevention Act (STEP Act) to address participation in gang street crime activity. STEP has spurred the adoption by the vast majority of states of two primary types of measures to stem gang problems, particularly drug sales. One type, adopted in Chicago, uses the so-called “antigang loitering ordinance.” A second type, initiated in Los Angeles and now present in many California communities, uses “antigang public nuisance injunctions.”

The Chicago 1992 city loitering ordinance essentially permitted police to arrest any group of two or more people who remained in a public place with no apparent purpose, if the police reasonably believed the group included a gang member and if loiterers failed to disperse. Enforcement of the ordinance led to thousands of dispersal orders and arrests. The U.S. Supreme Court in the 1999 case of City of Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1999), addressed the constitutionality of the ordinance and held that it was unconstitutional under the “void for vagueness” doctrine. That is, the ordinance allowed police too much discretion as to who would be arrested and when that would take place.

Those who championed the decision maintained that the ordinance had been used in a discriminatory fashion to target and harass minority youngsters. Those who criticized the decision believed that efforts to curtail gang activity had now been inhibited. In reaction to the decision, Chicago city officials in 2000 enacted a new antigang loitering ordinance that they suggested would withstand constitutional “vagueness” examination due to its being more narrowly written and only keying on so-called “gang hot spot blocks,” while additionally limiting street officer discretion.

California cities have enacted “antigang public nuisance injunctions,” which are generally considered more resilient to constitutional attack. These civil injunctions usually apply only to named defendants and prevent the individuals from engaging in such acts as standing, sitting, walking, driving, gathering, or appearing anywhere in public view with any other known member of a gang. It is crime preventative in nature and the injunction generally designates a specific square mile area, or “safety zone,” that is off limits to the designated gang member. Violation of the injunction generally results in the imposition of minor criminal sanctions. Proponents claim the injunctions are highly successful in reducing gang crimes in Los Angeles and other California communities.

The 1997 California Supreme court case of People ex rel. Gallo v. Acuna, 929 P.2d 596 (Cal 1997), upheld such an injunction, indicating that it did not violate the San Jose defendants’ First Amendment rights to associate or Fifth Amendment guarantee of due process. Moreover, it found that the injunction was not vague or overbroad and that the conduct of the gang members qualified as a public nuisance and was the proper subject of an injunction. Those opposing the decision argue that such injunctions prohibit otherwise “innocent conduct” and amount to “racial profiling” because most of the identified gang members are African-American or Hispanic individuals.

Obviously, antigang ordinances and public nuisance injunctions will need to be written clearly if they are to be effective in reducing or disrupting gang activity, while also ensuring individual civil liberties.

RICK M. STEINMANN

References and Further Reading

Egley, Arlen, Jr., Cheryl L. Maxson, Jody Miller, and Malcolm W. Klein, eds. The Modern Gang Reader, 3rd ed. Los Angeles: Roxbury Publishing, 2005.

Strosnider, Kim, Anti-Gang Ordinances After City of Chicago v. Morales: The Intersection of Race, Vagueness Doctrine, and Equal Protection in the Criminal Law, American Criminal Law Review 39 (Winter 2002): 1:101–146.

Cases and Statutes Cited

City of Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1999)
People ex rel. Gallo v. Acuna, 929 P.2d 596 (Cal 1997)
 Chicago Gang Congregation Ordinance, Chicago IL, Mun. Code Section 8-4-015 (1992)
 Chicago Gang Loitering Ordinance, Chicago IL, Mun. Code Section 8-4-015, (a), (e) (2000)
California Public Nuisance Act, 1892 (& amendments), West’s Ann. Cal.Civ. Code section 3479
California Street Terrorism Enforcement and Prevention Act, 1988, West’s Ann. Cal. Penal Code section 186.20

See also Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983); Void for Vagueness

GARDNER v. FLORIDA, 430 U.S. 349 (1977)

Gardner was argued November 30, 1976, and decided on March 22, 1977, by a vote of seven to two. Justice Stevens wrote for the Court, joined by Justices Stewart and Powell; Chief Justice Burger and Justices White and Blackmun concurred; Justice Brennan concurred and dissented; Justices Marshall and Rehnquist dissented. Although the Court had previously condoned Florida’s capital sentencing procedure in Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976), Gardner held a judge’s use of a confidential pre-sentence report in sentencing a defendant to death to be unconstitutional. After he was convicted of murdering his wife, Gardner’s capital jury returned an advisory verdict of life in prison. Thereafter, relying in part on a pre-sentence investigation report with a confidential portion not disclosed to defense counsel, the trial judge overrode the jury’s verdict and sentenced Gardner to death.

The Supreme Court concluded that Gardner was denied due process of law because he was sentenced to death on the basis of information that he did not have the opportunity to deny or explain. In response to Florida’s contention that confidentiality was required to facilitate the availability of personal information for the pre-sentence report, Justice Stevens replied that the interest in reliability outweighed any such desire for information. Justice Stevens reminded Florida that a judge’s unbridled discretion in sentencing was forbidden under Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), and thus full disclosure of the basis for a death sentence was required so that a reviewing court could examine the considerations motivating the sentence in every case in which it was imposed. Gardner pronounced that due process required the full disclosure of the information upon which any death sentence was based.

EARL F. MARTIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)

Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics

GARRISON, WILLIAM LLOYD (1805–1879)

Raised in a Massachusetts Quaker family, William Lloyd Garrison served apprenticeships as a shoemaker, a cabinetmaker, and a typesetter before deciding that his talents and passions lay in print. Beginning during his adolescence, he was acutely aware of and offended by injustice, and he spent most of his life trying to effect reform in society; intemperance, slavery, women's rights, and peace movements were particular causes.

In 1829, Garrison was convicted of libel after printing an editorial in which he accused a prominent businessman of participating in illegal slave trade. He spent nearly two months in a Baltimore jail, where he became acquainted with several escaped slaves who had been caught and sent to jail to wait for their masters to retrieve them. He later said that conversations with those slaves led him to believe in the intellectual and biological equality of African slaves.

After his release, Garrison began publishing The Liberator, an antislavery paper that he would oversee for thirty-five years. Although as a pacifist he eschewed violence as a means for social change, he was very much an agitator. Calling not only for the immediate emancipation of slaves, but also for the social and legal equality of African Americans, Garrison often found himself out of touch with other abolitionists, who favored gradual emancipation or believed in the inferiority of blacks. He also helped form the New England Anti-Slavery Society.

His activism was not limited to abolitionism. He supported the women's rights movement, and he abhorred violence and war. Indeed, although he applauded the end of slavery brought on by the Civil War, he regretted that it could not have happened peacefully. Hated by southerners and supporters of slavery, Garrison nevertheless made a career out of confronting what he believed to be the primary moral failure of Americans to end slavery. His rejection of violence while he supported confrontation and agitation was influenced by his friends Henry David Thoreau and Ralph Waldo Emerson and, in turn, influenced twentieth-century activists such as Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

Mayer, Henry. All on Fire: William Lloyd Garrison and the Abolition of American Slavery. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Merrill, Walter M. Against Wind and Tide. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1963.

Thomas, John L. The Liberator: William Lloyd Garrison, A Biography. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1963.

GAY AND LESBIAN RIGHTS

From the outset of U.S. history under English colonization, the legal climate for persons who loved others of their sex was inhospitable. The common law of England prohibited sodomy, and the criminal laws of the colonies in at least one case included lesbian sexual activity within their scope. Death was sometimes prescribed as punishment for sodomy, and people were in fact executed for that offense.

These laws targeted nonreproductive and "deviant" sexual activity, but as recognizable gay identities and communities developed in the United States, the regulatory gaze of government and, in particular, of vice enforcement was trained upon lesbian, gay, and bisexual (collectively termed "lesbigay") people and their meeting places, especially gay bars. State disorderly conduct laws were also used against the founder of the nonprofit Society for Human Rights, which Illinois chartered in 1924 and which was the first organization devoted to protect the rights of lesbigay persons.

Thereafter, the first nationally focused homophile organizations were not formed until the 1950s. Roughly contemporaneously with the formation of the Mattachine Society and the Daughters of Bilitis, the federal government was engaged in a post-World War II campaign to expel not only communists but also "sex perverts" or homosexuals from federal employment. The federal government also excluded homosexual persons as "sexual psychopaths," and this provision of the immigration laws was upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court in Boutilier v. Immigration and Naturalization Service (1967). State and local governments as well as the federal government censored gay publications, ultimately leading to the Supreme Court's decision in One, Inc. v. Olesen (1958), which held that a homophile magazine produced by some members of the Mattachine Society was not obscene and therefore could lawfully be mailed.

The step-up of governmental suppression of homosexuality responded to an increased visibility in the postwar era, with gay bars springing up all over the country. States sometimes stripped bars catering to lesbian clientele of their liquor licenses, and state and local police targeted the bars for raids and shakedowns.

A turning point came in the early morning hours on June 28, 1969. When police raided the Stonewall Inn, an unlicensed mixed gay bar, its patrons unexpectedly resisted. The riot or uprising sparked by the actions of customers, including black and Puerto Rican effeminate gay men and butch lesbians, continued for days. This event is often taken as the advent of the modern lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) movement in the United States, first in the form of "gay liberation," which particularly argued for sexual freedom.

Yet lesbian people were not at all uniformly libertine. One area in which emboldened gay people sought legal rights in the wake of Stonewall was marriage. Starting in the very early 1970s, a number of same-sex couples filed suits arguing that it violated the U.S. Constitution to deny them the right to marry. These arguments were uniformly rejected, often on conclusory grounds invoking the "traditional" definition of "marriage," the validity of which was precisely what the litigation contested.

At the same time as these early marriage challenges, the first civil rights law to prohibit sexual orientation discrimination was enacted by East Lansing, Michigan, in 1972. Although Representative Bella Abzug introduced a federal bill to do likewise in 1974, it was not adopted. Through 2005, the sponsors in Congress of the Federal Employment Non-Discrimination Act (ENDA) were unable to secure its passage, although it did come within one vote in the Senate in 1996. More success has been enjoyed on the state and local levels: by the end of 2005 some seventeen states and the District of Columbia prohibited sexual orientation discrimination in employment, with many local governments doing likewise, seeming to signal a maturity of the gay and lesbian rights movement.

Then came AIDS. Although the pandemic brought many people in LGBT communities closer together, it also occasioned rampant discrimination against HIV-positive persons and gay men, who were often taken to be synonymous with HIV infection. In this climate the Supreme Court decided Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), the infamous decision that curtailed the constitutional right of privacy and upheld Georgia's law against oral and anal sex as applied to "homosexuals." Bowers was bad enough for the gay rights movement on its own terms, but it was also used in defense of all manner of legal discriminations against lesbian people.

As one example, criminal restrictions on sodomy have been used to justify the exclusion of lesbian persons from the armed forces. During his 1992 presidential campaign, William Jefferson Clinton pledged to repeal the ban. Once he took office, however, Clinton found strong resistance within military leadership and Congress, which ultimately enacted the statute known as "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." This ostensible compromise removed mere sexual orientation as an official disqualification, but allowed even a bare statement of gay identity to be used as a basis for separation from the services. Although frequently challenged on equal-protection, privacy, and free-speech grounds, the suits against the policy have been unsuccessful to date.

Starting shortly after Don't Ask, Don't Tell, the movement for equal marriage rights for same-sex couples took off, galvanized by the Hawaii Supreme Court's decision in Baehr v. Lewin, 852 P.2d 44 (1993), that the restriction of marriage to different-sex couples was sex discrimination subject to the most searching form of judicial scrutiny. This led to litigation in other states that ultimately resulted in Vermont's adopting "civil unions" for same-sex couples and Massachusetts opening marriage to same-sex partners. In addition, other states adopted domestic partnership or reciprocal beneficiaries laws to provide same-sex couples with some but not all the legal rights of marriage.

In reaction to the Hawaii decision, however, the federal government in 1996 enacted the Defense of Marriage Act, or DOMA. This statute defines "marriage" as a mixed-sex institution for federal law purposes, thus preemptively refusing to give effect to any state law that would allow same-sex couples to marry. It also purports to authorize individual states to refuse to recognize same-sex marriages performed in other states.

Reacting to activists' achieving legal protections against sexual orientation discrimination on the local level in Colorado, conservative activists in the early 1990s successfully campaigned to amend the state constitution to repeal all such laws and prohibit every level of government from taking any action to protect lesbian people from discrimination. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled this backlash effort unconstitutional in Romer v. Evans (1996), which held that amendment two's far-reaching legal restrictions violated the guarantee of equal protection of the laws.

Then, in 2003, the Supreme Court decided Lawrence v. Texas, No. 02-102 (2003), overruling Bowers v. Hardwick and holding that Texas's same-sex-only criminal ban on oral and anal sex was unconstitutional. Lawrence brought the U.S. treatment of sodomy laws into line with that of England, which statutorily repealed them as applied to consenting adults in 1967, and indeed of the European Union, whose Court of Human Rights had held such laws to violate the right to respect for private life as early as 1981.

Lawrence removed the crutch of Bowers from opponents of lesbian rights; yet, in its first few years as precedent its consequences have been limited. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts cited Lawrence in Goodridge v. Department of Public Health (2003), the case that held the exclusion of same-sex couples from civil marriage to violate the state's constitution. The Supreme Court of Kansas relied on Lawrence when it invalidated an age-of-consent law that discriminated in favor of different-sex couples in State v. Limon (2005). However, Limon refused to apply heightened scrutiny to the sexual orientation discrimination reflected in the criminal statute, and other courts have similarly minimized the import of Lawrence.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, for example, criticized Justice Kennedy's opinion for the Court in Lawrence in Lofton v. Secretary of Department of Children and Family Services (2004). Lofton upheld Florida's categorical ban on adoption by homosexual persons, the only law of its kind in the country, and the Supreme Court let that decision stand. Apparently, the justices were of the view that only a limited amount of progress in the area of gay and lesbian rights could come from the federal courts at that moment and that more work would need to be done through state court litigation and through the political process.

DAVID B. CRUZ

References and Further Reading

- Arriola, Elvia R., Faeries, Marimachas, Queens, and Lez-zies: the Construction of Homosexuality Before the 1969 Stonewall Riots, Columbia Journal of Gender and Law (1995): 33.
- Eskridge, William N., Jr. Gaylaw: Challenging the Apartheid of the Closet. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Eskridge, William N., Jr. and Nan D. Hunter. Sexuality, Gender, and the Law, 2nd ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2004.
- Katz, Jonathan Ned. Lesbians and Gay Men in the U.S.A., rev. ed. New York: Penguin Books, 1992.

Koppelman, Andrew. The Gay Rights Question in Contemporary American Law. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.

Lambda Legal, Antidiscrimination, <http://www.lambdalegal.org/cgi-bin/iowa/issues/record?record=18>.

Richards, David A. J. The Case for Gay Rights: From Bowers to Lawrence and Beyond. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2005.

GENERAL WARRANTS

One of the most fundamental aspects of the constitutional right of privacy—that embodied in the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures—was born as a constitutional remedy for a legacy of the evils of one aspect of British law, the general warrant. As early as 1335, in Britain the general warrant permitted government to search without limitation on location and without having to describe with any specificity the person or object sought. Instead, British authorities were given free reign to break into any shop or place, wherever and whenever they chose.

Such a powerful tool could be and was employed often to intimidate. During the reign of Charles I, general warrants were employed to harass dissidents, authors, and printers of what was considered seditious material by ransacking homes and seizing personal papers. By 1765, British courts declared general warrants unlawful, and Parliament followed suit a year later.

Through their government of the colonies, royal officials threatened the privacy of the colonists by employing writs of assistance, equivalent to general warrants. At the time, English law did not recognize a personal right of privacy, leaving the colonists' complaints of royal abuses without a legal remedy. The Virginia Declaration of Rights declared that general warrants were "grievous and oppressive," and colonial leaders shared the growing antipathy toward their abuse. This particular form of governmental overreaching was fresh in the minds of the delegates to the constitutional convention in Philadelphia in 1787.

WILLIAM C. BANKS

References and Further Reading

- Banks, William C., and M. E. Bowman, Executive Authority for National Security Surveillance, American University Law Review 50 (2001): 2–3.
- Cuddihy, William, and B. Carmon Hardy, A Man's House Was Not His Castle: Origins of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, The William and Mary Quarterly 37 (1980): 371–400.

- Fribourg, Marjorie. The Bill of Rights: Its Impact on the American People. 1967.
- Lasson, Nelson B. The History and Development of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins Press, 1970.
- O'Brien, David. Privacy, Law and Public Policy. New York: Praeger Publishers, 1979.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Entrick v. Carrington, 95 Eng. Rep. 807, 818 (K.B. 1765)

GENTILE v. STATE BAR OF NEVADA, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991)

This case found that the First Amendment protected political comments made by a lawyer during a press conference, while holding that attorneys' speech could be restricted if they knew their comments would create a "substantial likelihood of material prejudice" in a court proceeding.

Dominic Gentile, a lawyer in Nevada, was reprimanded by the state bar for holding a press conference on behalf of a client. Gentile held the press conference to counter negative publicity against his client, who was accused of theft, and to present his theory that corrupt police were actually responsible for the crimes. The Nevada bar said Gentile should have known that his statements were likely to prejudice his client's coming trial.

The U.S. Supreme Court dismissed Gentile's reprimand and voided Nevada's court rule for violating the First Amendment. The state failed to show that Gentile should have known that his press conference would bias his client's case; on the contrary, the Court favored Gentile's argument that he did not believe his comments would prejudice a jury. The Court also concluded that the Nevada rule was unconstitutionally vague and raised suspicions of selective enforcement by the authorities, given that Gentile implicated police corruption in his comments. The Court categorized his criticism of the government as political speech, deserving of special protection under the First Amendment as a check on state power. However, commentators afterwards focused less on the Court's forgiveness of Gentile and more on the possibility that other lawyers' free speech could still be restricted if their comments were likely to affect a court proceeding.

DAVID D. BURNETT

References and Further Reading

Campbell, L. C., Gentile v. State Bar and Model Rule 3.6: Overly Broad Restrictions on Attorney Speech and Pretrial Publicity, Georgetown Journal of Legal Ethics 6 (1993): 583–608.

Daly, J. L., What Can the Defense Attorney Say at a "Pre-Formal Charge" Press Conference? Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada Puts a Porous Gag on Trial Lawyers, The American Journal of Trial Advocacy 15 (Winter 1991/1992): 269–291.

Day, Suzanne, Note: The Supreme Court's Attack on Attorneys' Freedom of Expression: The Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada Decision, Case Western Reserve Law Review 43 (1993): 1347–1409.

Porter, Lester, Jr., Note: Leaving Your Speech Rights at the Bar—Gentile v. State Bar, 111 S. Ct. 2720 (1991), Washington Law Review 67 (1992): 733–753.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991)

See also Application of First Amendment to States; Disciplining Lawyers for Speaking about Pending Cases; Threats and Free Speech

GERSTEIN v. PUGH, 420 U.S. 103 (1975)

Two individuals being held in custody under an information (a formal criminal charge made by a prosecutor without a grand jury indictment) charging them with various state offenses brought a class action claiming they had a federal constitutional right to a judicial hearing to determine whether probable cause for their further detention existed.

The Fourth Amendment permits police officers to arrest an individual only when they have probable cause to believe that the individual is committing, or has committed, an offense (Beck v. Ohio). While the existence of probable cause generally must be determined by a neutral and detached judicial officer (Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 1948), practical necessities require that police be allowed to make arrests based upon their assessment of probable cause. Accordingly, police do not need an arrest warrant to arrest an individual in a public place (United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411, 1976).

In Gerstein v. Pugh, however, the U.S. Supreme Court explained that once a person arrested without a warrant is in custody, the reasons justifying dispensing with a judge's determination of probable cause evaporate, while the arrestee's need for such a neutral determination increases significantly. It therefore held that the Fourth Amendment requires a judicial determination of probable cause, before or "promptly" after arrest, as a prerequisite for any extended restraint of liberty following arrest. Nevertheless, it further held that this determination need not be made in an adversary proceeding at which the arrestee has the right to counsel or the rights of confrontation and compulsory process.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- LaFare, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 4th ed., vol. 3. St. Paul, MN: Thomson-West, 2004, pp. 52–64.
- LaFare, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure, 4th ed., St. Paul, MN: Thomson-West, 2004, pp. 176–177.
- Winter, Stephen D., Probable Cause for Pretrial Detention: Does Gerstein v. Pugh Adequately Insure Its Existence? Golden Gate University Law Review 6 (1975): 1:139–178.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Beck v. Ohio*, 379 U.S. 89 (1964)
- Johnson v. United States*, 333 U.S. 10 (1948)
- United States v. Watson*, 423 U.S. 411 (1976)
- See also Arrest; Arrest without a Warrant; Incorporation Doctrine; Probable Cause; United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976)

GERTZ v. ROBERT WELCH INC., 418 U.S. 323 (1974)

Throughout history, there has been considerable controversy regarding how to strike the proper balance between speech and reputation. The English common law cut the balance decisively in favor of reputation, thereby making it easy for defamation plaintiffs to recover damages for defamation. Even in the United States, until the mid-1960s, the courts preferred defamation plaintiffs over free speech. Some states allowed the imposition of liability based on strict liability principles.

The balance between speech and reputation shifted decisively when the U.S. Supreme Court rendered its landmark decision in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 367 U.S. 254 (1964). In Sullivan, the Court held that certain defamation plaintiffs, in particular “public officials” and so-called “public figures,” must prove that the defendant had acted with “actual malice” in defaming them in order to recover. Actual malice required a showing that a defendant “knew” that the allegations were false or acted in “reckless disregard” for whether they were true or false. The Court applied this heightened standard of proof in an effort to ensure adequate “breathing room” for speech. Because of the actual malice standard, it became virtually impossible for public official or public figure defamation plaintiffs to recover for defamation.

In Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1974), the Court reassessed the balance between speech and reputation. In that decision, the Court concluded that a state might be justified in applying a lower standard of proof in defamation cases brought by private individuals. The Court distinguished private individuals from those “who, by reason of the notoriety of their achievements or the vigor and success with which they seek the public’s attention, are properly classed as public figures and those who hold governmental office.” The Court noted that the actual malice standard exacts a “high price” from the victims of defamatory falsehood because many “deserving plaintiffs, including some intentionally subjected to injury, will be unable to surmount the barrier of the New York Times test.”

The Court found that the “New York Times rule states an accommodation between this concern and the limited state interest present in the context of libel actions brought by public persons.” However, the Court concluded that the “state interest in compensating injury to the reputation of private individuals requires that a different rule should obtain with respect to them.” The Court noted that private individuals do not have access to the media and therefore cannot easily reply to defamatory allegations. In addition, public officials and public figures necessarily seek out greater public notoriety and therefore must accept the consequences of greater criticism and comment that come with that notoriety.

In Gertz, the Court ultimately concluded that the states could not impose liability without fault in defamation cases brought by private individuals, but otherwise could “define for themselves the appropriate standard of liability for a publisher or broadcaster of defamatory falsehood injurious to a private individual.” The Court found that this approach would provide a more “equitable boundary between the competing concerns” by recognizing the “strength of the legitimate state interest in compensating private individuals for wrongful injury to reputation,” but yet shielding “the press and broadcast media from the rigors of strict liability for defamation.” However, the Court concluded that the states could not compensate private individuals for anything more than actual injury and could not “permit recovery of presumed or punitive damages, at least when liability is not based on a showing of knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth.”

RUSSELL L. WEAVER

References and Further Reading

- Weaver, Russell L., and Arthur E. Hellman. The First Amendment: Cases, Materials & Problems. New York: LexisNexis, 2002, pp. 747–761.
- Weaver, Russell L., and Donald E. Lively. Understanding the First Amendment. New York: LexisNexis, pp. 2003, 121–132.

GIBSON v. FLORIDA LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATION COMMITTEE, 372 U.S. 539 (1961)

It has long been accepted that the state has the power to use legislative investigations to protect its vital interests. However, in Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, the Supreme Court held that the state may not use this power to infringe upon individual First and Fourteenth Amendment rights of free speech and association of its citizens, unless it can show that such infringement serves a “compelling and subordinating governmental interest.”

In 1959, five years after the Court’s decision in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), the Florida State Legislature established a legislative investigation committee to study “subversive organizations.” As part of its work, the committee subpoenaed Gibson, president of the Miami branch of the NAACP, and asked him to produce a membership list of his organizations. He refused and was found in contempt.

The state of Florida’s purported reason for requesting the NAACP’s membership list was to determine whether it had been infiltrated by communists. The Court recognized that inquiring about the actions of a subversive group such as the Communist Party might qualify as a state effort to protect its vital interests. However, the committee made no claim that the NAACP was a subversive organization. Its failure to establish a “substantial connection” between the “Miami branch of the NAACP and communist activities” meant that the Court could not find the “compelling and subordinating state interest which must exist if” the essential freedoms of the First and Fourteenth Amendments “are to be curtailed” (emphasis in original).

LAWRENCE D. NORDEN

References and Further Reading

- Entin, Jonathan L., Litigation, Political Mobilization, and Social Reform: Insights From Florida’s Pre-Brown Civil Rights Era, Florida Law Review 52 (2000): 497.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)

GIDDINGS, JOSHUA REED (1795–1864)

Joshua Giddings, a lawyer and abolitionist congressman, was born in Bradford County, Pennsylvania, to farmers Joshua Giddings and Elizabeth Pease. Despite a childhood plagued with hard work, financial instability, and minimal education, Giddings taught himself to read and write. After his family moved to the Western Reserve, Giddings studied law under Elisha Whittlesey, a future U.S. representative. In 1838, Giddings quit law and successfully ran for U.S. Congress for Ohio’s Sixteenth District under the Whig nomination. He maintained the position until 1859, although he ran under the Free Soil and Republican Party tickets in ensuing years. Giddings continued to live in Ashtabula County until his death in 1864.

Giddings adhered to radical politics and was a staunch supporter of the abolitionist cause. By attempting reform within the confines of the U.S. Congress, Giddings became known as a radical and supported John Quincy Adams’s campaign against the gag rule, which severely limited debate on anti-slavery issues. This censure of the antislavery topic lasted from 1836 to 1844.

The gag rule did not stop Giddings’s efforts. In 1842, he introduced his Creole Resolutions, a declaration that supported the rebellion of slaves on the high seas. This resulted in a censure from the House of Representatives and, subsequently, a resignation from Giddings. Shortly after the incident Giddings’s district reelected him and he successfully returned to Congress. As years passed, Giddings became even more determined in his antislavery views and continued to work towards emancipation. Despite obstacles such as the gag rule and his censure, Joshua Giddings and other antislavery politicians managed to have their abolitionist views heard.

HEIDI SCOTT GIUSTO

References and Further Reading

- Gamble, Douglas A. “Joshua Giddings and the Ohio Abolitionists.” Ohio History 88 (Winter 1979): 37–56.
- Giddings, Joshua R. An Expose of the Circumstances Which Led to the Resignation by the Hon. Joshua R. Giddings. Painesville, OH: J. Leonard & Co., Printers, 1842.
- . Speeches in Congress. Boston: J. P. Jewett and Company, 1853.
- . The Exiles of Florida: or, The Crimes Committed by our Government Against the Maroons, Who Flew From South Carolina and the Other Slave States, Seeking Protection Under Spanish Laws. Columbus, OH: Follett, Foster, 1858.

———. History of the Rebellion; Its Authors and Causes. New York: Follett, Foster, 1864.

Julian, George W. The Life of Joshua R. Giddings. Chicago: A. C. McClurg and Co., 1892.

Stewart, James Brewer. Joshua R. Giddings and the Tactics of Radical Politics. Cleveland, OH: The Press of Case Western Reserve University, 1970.

See also Gag Rule

GIDEON v. WAINWRIGHT, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)

In Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), the Court held that the Sixth Amendment requirement of the assistance of counsel was obligatory on the states under the Fourteenth Amendment. In Gideon, then, the Court overruled its earlier decision in Betts v. Brady, 315 U.S. 455 (1962). Justice Black wrote the majority opinion. Justices Douglas, Clark, and Harlan each concurred in separate opinions.

In Gideon, the defendant, Clarence Gideon, was charged in Florida state court with breaking into and entering a poolroom with intent to commit a misdemeanor inside. This was, of course, a noncapital offense under Florida law. He appeared in court without any money and without a lawyer and asked the court to appoint a lawyer for him at state expense. The court refused to do so. The defendant then went to trial and, like Betts, defended himself. Although the courts observed that he did a fairly good job, he was found guilty of the charges. Gideon appealed, seeking review of the lower court's order refusing to appoint counsel for him. Not surprisingly, the conviction was upheld on appeal because the state courts properly followed the existing Supreme Court opinion in Betts v. Brady, discussed earlier.

However, the U.S. Supreme Court took Gideon's case and reversed his conviction. Returning to the issue of whether counsel is required in noncapital cases, the Court changed its mind and overruled their decision in Betts.

The Court held that Betts v. Brady had been wrongly decided and that the right to counsel was fundamental. In doing so, it relied on Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), and Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936), as two cases that had recognized the fundamental nature of the right, although limiting the holdings to the facts of those cases. Accordingly, the Court held that Betts was an "abrupt break with its own well-considered precedents." In addition to relying on its precedents, the Court held that "reason and reflection" require the recognition that any person who is haled into court without an attorney cannot be assured a fair trial. The court recognized that the government hires lawyers to prosecute people and defendants hire the best lawyers they can to represent them and that these are evidence "of the widespread belief that lawyers in criminal courts are necessities, not luxuries."

Justice Douglas concurred, restating his long-held position on the so-called "total incorporation" theory. Under that theory, Justice Douglas believed that the Bill of Rights was incorporated as a whole and applicable on the states as it was to the federal courts through the Fourteenth Amendment. Justice Clark concurred in the result, indicating that, as far as he was concerned, the Court had already held that the Fourteenth Amendment required counsel in all capital crimes and that the majority's decision did no more than "erase a distinction which has no basis in logic and an increasingly eroded basis in authority." That is, the Constitution "makes no distinction between capital and noncapital cases."

Justice Harlan also concurred, agreeing that Betts should be overruled. But he did not view Betts as a break with precedent. According to Justice Harlan, Betts simply held that special circumstances could require the appointment of counsel in noncapital trials, but required that such circumstances be present. As Justice Harlan explained, the special circumstances rule exists but its substance has been eroded. "The court has come to recognize, in other words, that the mere existence of a serious criminal charge constituted in itself special circumstances requiring the services of counsel at trial. In truth the Betts v. Brady rule is no longer a reality."

LISSA GRIFFIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Betts v. Brady, 315 U.S. 455 (1962)

Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)

Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936)

Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)

GIDEON, CLARENCE EARL (1910–1972)

Born in Hannibal, Missouri, in 1910, Clarence Earl Gideon secured the right to counsel for indigent criminal defendants charged with felonies in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963). Gideon experienced extreme poverty throughout his lifetime. He ran away from home in the eighth grade and was first arrested for a petty crime as a juvenile. He spent one year in reform school. At eighteen, he was arrested, charged with burglary, robbery, and larceny, and sentenced to ten years. For the next thirty years, Gideon served several more prison terms in Kansas, Missouri, and Texas and worked as an itinerant laborer when he was free. Just before the arrest that led to his historic appeal, he lost three children to the Florida welfare authorities.

In June 1961, a pool hall in Panama City, Florida, where Gideon was a frequent customer, was burglarized. Some beer and wine and $65.00 in change were stolen. An eyewitness told police that he had seen Gideon, his pockets full of change, exit the pool hall carrying a bottle of wine. The eyewitness said he saw Gideon make a phone call, then get into a cab and leave. The police arrested Gideon at a nearby tavern with his pockets full of coins.

Because he was too poor to hire an attorney, Gideon asked the trial judge to appoint an attorney for him. The judge denied Gideon's request because Florida law, unlike that in forty-five other states and the federal courts at the time, authorized court-appointed counsel only for indigent defendants charged with capital crimes. Gideon represented himself, was convicted, and sentenced to serve five years.

While he was incarcerated, Gideon began reading the law and decided to pursue an appeal based on his belief that the denial of counsel violated his Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. He wrote to the Florida Supreme Court and the FBI, but neither gave Gideon any relief. He then wrote a five-page petition to the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court granted cert and appointed Abe Fortas to represent Gideon on appeal. The Warren Court reversed, holding that all defendants charged with felonies were entitled to counsel, and ordered a new trial for Gideon. As a result of his appeal, Florida released over two thousand convicted felons who had been tried without the assistance of counsel.

W. Fred Turner represented Gideon at the new trial, and the jury acquitted Gideon after one hour of deliberation. Turner located the cab driver and called him as a witness at the new trial. He testified that, when Gideon got into his cab, he did not see Gideon carrying any bottles. Moreover, Turner impugned the credibility of the eyewitness by suggesting that he had been a lookout for the real thieves.

Upon his acquittal Gideon returned to a life of poverty and died in 1972. He was buried in an unmarked grave, though a granite headstone was later added. Gideon has become a patron saint of criminal defense attorneys, especially public defenders, with numerous celebrations honoring his appeal and awards in his name.

J. AMY DILLARD

GIGLIO v. UNITED STATES, 405 U.S. 150 (1972)

References and Further Reading

Lewis, Anthony. Gideon's Trumpet. New York: Random House, 1964.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1962)

GIGLIO v. UNITED STATES, 405 U.S. 150 (1972)

In Giglio, the Supreme Court held that the prosecution violates the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause when it fails to disclose exculpatory evidence to the defense, even if the individual prosecutors are unaware of the undisclosed information.

The prosecution's star witness at Giglio's forgery trial was his alleged coconspirator, Taliento. Taliento testified that the prosecution had not promised him immunity from prosecution in exchange for his testimony. However, after Giglio's conviction, the defense learned that another prosecutor had indeed promised Taliento that he would not be prosecuted.

Giglio's motion for a new trial was denied, but the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously reversed. The Court held that the government's failure to disclose its promise to Taliento violated Giglio's due process right, established in Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), to receive exculpatory information from the prosecution in advance of the trial. In addition, as in Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959), the undisclosed information proved that the government violated Giglio's due process rights by presenting testimony from Taliento that it knew to be false. Finally, the Court stressed that it was irrelevant that the prosecutor who tried Giglio did not personally know of the promise to Taliento because the prosecution has a duty, as an entity, to disclose exculpatory information.

Giglio is therefore an important case because it establishes that a prosecutor's duty to disclose exculpatory evidence extends beyond information that he or she personally possesses. Instead, a prosecutor has a duty to find and disclose any exculpatory information in the hands of the government.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Imwinkelried, Edwin, and Norman Garland. Exculpatory Evidence, 2nd ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie Publications, 1996.

Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963)

Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959)

See also Brady v. Maryland*, 373 U.S. 83 (1963); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment; Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959)

GILMORE, GARY (1940–1977)

On January 17, 1977, Gary Gilmore, a habitual criminal who, at age thirty-six, had spent more than half of his life incarcerated was executed by a Utah state firing squad. His death, the first in the state in sixteen years and the first in the nation in ten years, ignited renewed and heated debate over the legitimacy of capital punishment.

In April 1976, Gilmore, a talented, intelligent, though violent high school drop-out, had been released from the Oregon State Penitentiary into the state of Utah, where a cousin lived, after serving a sentence for armed robbery. In just three months, however, Gilmore was back in jail, accused of two armed robberies and the brutal, unprovoked murders of a gas station attendant and a motel clerk. In November, after a two-day trial, Gilmore was convicted of first-degree murder and sentenced by the trial jury to be executed the next month. Given a choice of execution by hanging or by firing squad, Gilmore chose the latter.

Gilmore's sentencing provoked nationwide debate over capital punishment on several fronts. In 1972, the U.S. Supreme Court had ruled in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), that the arbitrary and capricious way in which states applied the death penalty was cruel and unusual punishment as forbidden by the Eighth Amendment. That ruling had effectively suspended executions in the United States. By 1976, however, states had significantly revised their death penalty statutes to meet the Court's constitutional objections. Utah's had just become law on July 2, 1976, only three weeks before Gilmore committed his murders.

Death penalty opponents had long argued that capital punishment was an anomaly in civilized society, where the deliberate taking of human life could not be morally sanctioned. Anticapital punishment groups insisted that the death penalty was an irreversible sentence that did not function as an effective deterrent against future crime. Over Gilmore's objections, the American Civil Liberties Union and the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, among other parties, including Gilmore's mother, entered appeals of the sentence.

Those appeals raised another objection to Gilmore's sentence that also disturbed death penalty opponents. Gilmore had refused to sanction the appeals. He argued that he had no desire to spend the remainder of his life in prison and considered the penalty to be fair and proper. The underlying problem here, however, was whether or not Gilmore's execution would amount to state-assisted suicide, for Gilmore was putting the full burden of his death upon the state. It was even suggested that Gilmore had committed the murders, for which he was bound to get caught, to force the state to kill him. Gilmore offered the most articulate answer to those arguments. In a last hearing before the Utah pardon board, Gilmore contended that he accepted his fate, bluntly saying to all those attempting to have his sentence commuted, "I'd like them to butt out. It's my life and my death."

Gilmore was executed, according to his wishes, by firing squad, on January 17, 1977. According to author Norman Mailer, when asked for his final words, Gilmore, with a phrase that would enter American popular culture, replied simply, "Let's do it."

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

Banner, Stuart. The Death Penalty: An American History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, p. 202.

Gilmore, Mikal. Shot in the Heart. New York: Doubleday, 1994.

Johnson, Kathleen L., The Death Row Right to Die: Suicide or Intimate Decision? Southern California Law Review 54 (1980): 575–631.

Mailer, Norman. The Executioner's Song. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1979.

White, Welsh S., Essay: Defendants Who Elect Execution, University of Pittsburgh Law Review 48 (Spring 1987): 853–877.

See also Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: Methods of Execution

GINSBERG v. NEW YORK, 390 U.S. 629 (1968)

Is a state law constitutional when it prohibits the sale to minors of publications that may not be obscene to adults? The appellant, who operated a luncheonette on Long Island in New York and sold magazines, was convicted of selling "girlie" magazines to a sixteen-year-old boy. The boy's mother sent him to the luncheonette to buy the material so that Ginsberg would be prosecuted under New York's law prohibiting the sale of obscene material to persons under seventeen years of age.

New York's statute declared that various representations of female nudity were harmful to persons under the age of seventeen if the representations (1) appealed predominantly to the prurient, shameful, or morbid interest of minors; (2) were patently offensive to prevailing standards in the adult community as a whole with respect to what was suitable material for minors; and (3) were utterly without redeeming social importance to minors. The New York Court of Appeals turned back Ginsberg's challenge to the state's authority to define obscenity based on its appeal to minors.

In doing so, the court of appeals followed the "variable concepts" notion of obscenity that Justice Brennan introduced in Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966), which adapted the Roth standard (Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 1957) according to the "sexual interests" of the "intended and probable recipient group," including "sexually immature persons." As Justice Brennan argues for the majority in affirming the New York court's decision, the ethical or moral development of youth is an important interest of the state and accordingly within the state's constitutional authority to regulate. Thus, it was "rational" for New York's legislature to limit exposure to sexual material in order to avoid its harmful effects on minors even if this material would not be considered obscene from an average adult's perspective. Justice Brennan dismisses in passing Ginsberg's claim that New York's statute was vague as well as his challenge to the scienter requirements of the law.

Justice Fortas dissented and objected to the majority's unwillingness to determine whether the magazines in question were in fact obscene. Although the justice did not object to the variable obscenity standard, he complained that the majority failed to define what made the material in question obscene for persons under seventeen, but not obscene for those who are seventeen and older. In making this argument, Justice Fortas ignored the content of the New York statute and asked for an independent assessment by the Court. (Ginsberg's lawyer did not claim the magazines were not obscene in the lower courts, and the Supreme Court majority chose not address this question.)

The question of scienter was also left unresolved from Justice Fortas's perspective since Ginsberg was prosecuted for selling magazines that, under previous Supreme Court decisions, he had a right to sell. Finally, Ginsberg did not persuade the minor to buy the magazines and thus he was not guilty of pandering. The justice concluded that the majority's decision meant that a state "may convict a passive luncheonette operator of a crime because a 16-year-old boy maliciously and designedly picks up and pays for two girlie magazines which are presumably are not obscene."

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
 Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
 Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ginsberg v. New York*, 390 U.S. 629 (1968)
Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966)

GINSBURG, RUTH BADER (1933–)

Ruth Bader Ginsburg, legal scholar, successful advocate for gender equality, and jurist, currently serving as an associate justice on the U.S. Supreme Court, was born Joan Ruth Bader in Brooklyn, New York, on March 15, 1933. She was the daughter and granddaughter of Jewish immigrants from Central and Eastern Europe. Ginsburg's life has shaped both of the main phases of her career as an advocate and a judge. Her personal experiences of unfairness undoubtedly spurred her to fight for greater equality for women. These experiences also led to her determination not to read her personal values into the Constitution. An early job researching another legal system led to a comparative perspective on American law. Additionally, personal tragedy gave Ginsburg great strength, as well as a strong commitment to family. She has said, "The smell of death was strong in my life," but has still described herself as a lucky person, fortunate in love, motherhood, and a highly successful career in the law.

Ginsburg's parents, Celia Bader, a garment district bookkeeper, and Nathan Bader, a furrier and haberdasher, were loving and supportive. But tragedy marred Ginsburg's childhood. Her only sibling, Marilyn, died when Ginsburg was a toddler, and her mother fell seriously ill with cervical cancer when Ginsburg entered high school, dying the day before Ginsburg's graduation. These losses made Ginsburg aware of the uncertainty of life and caused her to treasure her family, which has now expanded to include several grandchildren. She gave a third birthday party for one beloved granddaughter at the Supreme Court and has recalled that it was the only time that the main menu item on the buffet table was child-sized peanut butter and jelly sandwiches.

Ginsburg's mother was her greatest inspiration. Despite the fact that Celia did not have the opportunity to attend college, she valued learning and believed that women should have the same educational opportunities as men. Ginsburg attended Brooklyn public schools, where she excelled as a student and obtained a scholarship to attend Cornell University.

At Cornell, Ginsburg met her husband, Martin Ginsburg, also an undergraduate there. They married in 1954. The gregarious Martin is the reserved Ginsburg's polar opposite in temperament, but their long marriage has been happy. After their wedding, Martin interrupted his studies at Harvard Law School to complete his military service, and the couple spent two years at Fort Sill, Oklahoma. Ginsburg worked in a Social Security office where she experienced workplace gender discrimination, receiving a job demotion after announcing her pregnancy. Following the birth of her daughter, Jane Carol, in 1955, Ginsburg spent a year as a full-time mother, the only time in her life that she did not hold a job outside her home.

Bolstered by the support of Martin and his family, Ginsburg decided to pursue a legal career and gained admission to Harvard Law School. When she started there in 1956, she was one of only nine women in a class of more than five hundred students. Martin's willingness to share childcare and other household duties, most famously by acquiring gourmet cooking skills, gave Ginsburg time to study. She reciprocated by supporting Martin through his successful battle with a life-threatening cancer diagnosed in his third year of law school. After Martin graduated, the couple moved to New York City, where he had accepted a position with a law firm. Ginsburg transferred to Columbia Law School after Harvard refused to grant her a degree if she spent her last year at Columbia, even though male students usually received permission for similar arrangements.

Despite excelling in law school, being elected to the Harvard and Columbia Law Reviews, and tying for first place in her graduating class at Columbia in 1959, Ginsburg's legal career got off to a difficult start as a result of the institutionalized gender discrimination in existence at the time. None of the many law firms to which she applied was willing to hire a woman, mother, and Jew. Finally, Judge Edmund L. Palmieri of the Southern District of New York agreed to take Ginsburg as his law clerk, though only after receiving an assurance from one of her professors that if her work was unsatisfactory, a male graduate was waiting in the wings to take over. This backup proved unnecessary. Judge Palmieri later rated Ginsburg one of his best law clerks.

After her two-year clerkship, Ginsburg's career can be divided into two phases. During the first stage, which lasted just under two decades, she worked in law schools. For the second ten years, she also worked as an activist and highly successful advocate for gender equality. In the second phase of her career, she has served as a federal appellate judge for twenty-five years.

In her first law school position, Ginsburg focused on comparative law as a research associate in Columbia University's International Procedure Project from 1961 to 1962 and as its director from 1962 to 1963. Her work there led to her 1965 book, Civil Procedure in Sweden, coauthored by Anders Bruzilius. In 1963, she obtained a position as a tenure track assistant law professor at Rutgers University, where she was only the second woman on the law faculty. She published a number of articles and book chapters on aspects of civil procedure, conflicts of law, private international law, and comparative law, as well as a 1968 translation of the Swedish Code of Judicial Procedure, also coauthored with Bruzilius.

While at Rutgers, Ginsburg experienced gender discrimination, receiving substantially less pay than male colleagues on the stated justification that her husband had a well-paying job. But the Equal Pay Act was already in force, and around 1970 Ginsburg joined a class action lawsuit brought by a number of women employees against Rutgers that ended in a settlement giving the plaintiffs a large pay increase. Fearing additional discrimination, Ginsburg hid her pregnancy with her son, James Steven, born in 1965, until she received a contract renewal. Ginsburg taught at Rutgers until 1971, when she moved to Columbia Law School where she was the first woman law professor to obtain tenure.

During the 1970s, Ginsburg shifted her attention to gender discrimination, inspired in part by students who wanted a course in women and the law. She taught courses on women's rights, authored articles on that subject, and coedited the first casebook on sex-based discrimination. She combined her academic work with activism in support of the proposed equal rights amendment as well as advocacy in many gender discrimination cases, serving as codirector of the American Civil Liberties Union's (ACLU's) Women's Rights Project. She was the ACLU's general counsel from 1973 to 1980 and a member of its National Board of Directors from 1974 to 1980.

Believing that gender stereotypes are irrational and harmful, Ginsburg sought "to help place women's rights permanently on the human rights agenda."

She worked to attack discrimination as an activist for ratification of the equal rights amendment and also through litigation brought under the equal protection clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Although the states failed to ratify the equal rights amendment, Ginsburg's work as an advocate resulted in much success. She authored the ACLU's brief in Reed v. Reed (1971), the first case in which the Supreme Court ruled in favor of a woman on an equal-protection claim. Ginsburg was the principal author of briefs in eight other gender discrimination cases argued before the Court, and she also coauthored fifteen amicus curiae briefs. She personally argued six gender discrimination cases before the Court, winning five of them.

These successful cases challenged laws that gave women special benefits but were based on stereotypical assumptions about women's inferiority. Prominent among them was Frontiero v. Richardson (1973), a challenge to a statute that gave the families of men serving in the military automatic benefits while requiring the families of women in military service to prove that a woman provided more than half of her husband's support. Another case, Duren v. Missouri (1979), attacked a law giving women an automatic exemption from jury service on request.

Ginsburg brought some of these cases on behalf of male plaintiffs in a successful effort to show that statutory gender-based classifications based on stereotypes harmed men as well as women. One example is Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636 (1975), in which a widower with a young child sued the Social Security Administration to obtain survivor benefits then available only to widows. Another is Califano v. Goldfarb (1977), in which a widower sued to obtain survivor benefits that were only payable if he could prove that he received at least half his support from his wife, but which a widow would have automatically obtained.

The Court never accepted Ginsburg's arguments that gender was a suspect classification requiring the same strict scrutiny that has been applied to classifications based on race or national origin. But by using alternative arguments, she was instrumental in persuading the Court to establish gender as a category for heightened constitutional scrutiny. In Craig v. Boren (1978), a case in which Ginsburg coauthored an amicus curiae brief, the Court endorsed a heightened intermediate level of scrutiny for official gender classifications, and it continues to apply a version of this test today.

Ginsburg's work as an advocate ceased in 1980 after President Carter nominated her to the federal bench. She became a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. In thirteen years there, she wrote over seven hundred published and unpublished opinions. A White House report assessed her as "tough on crime, committed to free speech and freedom of religion, and supportive of civil rights." In cases that were not unanimous, the judge voted more often with Republican colleagues than with Democrats. Judge Ginsburg earned a reputation for being a careful judge, meticulous with facts, committed to respecting precedent, and devoted to maintaining collegiality with her colleagues.

In 1993, President Clinton nominated Judge Ginsburg to serve as the 107th justice on the U.S. Supreme Court. The Senate easily voted to confirm her, by a vote of ninety-seven to three. Justice Ginsburg filled the seat vacated by Justice Thurgood Marshall, which seemed particularly appropriate to commentators who had nicknamed her the "Thurgood Marshall of gender equality law." They drew a parallel between her advocacy and activism in gender discrimination cases and Marshall's fight against race discrimination as chief counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense Fund.

Justice Ginsburg clearly views her role on the bench as fundamentally different from the adversarial job of an advocate. She has cited the words of Alexander Hamilton that "the mission of judges is to secure a steady, upright and impartial administration of the laws." According to the justice, "one of the most sacred duties of a judge is not to read her convictions into the Constitution." She believes that a judge should limit herself to deciding the case before her. Justice Ginsburg has described courts as "reactive institutions" that respond to societal problems brought to them. Protecting civil rights is thus not the sole responsibility of the judiciary, but depends on the people in society. Within these parameters of judicial restraint, she has retained her commitment to advancing gender equality and fighting discrimination.

Justice Ginsburg's most significant Supreme Court opinion on gender equality was United States v. Virginia (VMI) (1996). She wrote a seven-to-one majority opinion finding it unconstitutional, under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, for the state of Virginia to bar women from admission to the Virginia Military Institute. The justice found the applicable level of constitutional review to be a flexible version of the intermediate scrutiny test endorsed by the Court in Craig v. Boren. She called this test "skeptical scrutiny." Under it, a government gender-based classification will only be upheld if the government can establish an "exceedingly persuasive justification" for it. The government must show that the classification serves important governmental objectives and that the discriminatory means used are substantially related to achieving those objectives.

The justice has expressed disapproval of a rigid categorical approach to the equal protection clause in discrimination cases of any sort. She has voiced concern that the Court's higher standard of review for race-based classifications has undesirable consequences for affirmative action. Justice Ginsburg views a formal tier-based approach to equal protection as undesirable for making government attempts to assist historically disadvantaged racial minorities through affirmative action less likely to fend off constitutional attacks than similar efforts to aid women. She views the core idea underlying the equal protection clause as the human rights principle of respect for essential human dignity. Justice Ginsburg believes that basic notions of fairness should guide the Court in resolving discrimination cases. This view is manifested in her dissenting opinion in the case successfully challenging the University of Michigan's undergraduate affirmative action program, Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244 (2003).

As this opinion shows, the justice still retains her belief in the value of analyzing legal issues comparatively, a method that she has endorsed since her very first academic position. In one of her lectures, Justice Ginsburg said:

In my view, comparative analysis emphatically is relevant to the task of interpreting constitutions and enforcing human rights. We are the losers if we neglect what others can tell us about endeavors to eradicate bias against women, minorities, and other disadvantaged groups. For irrational prejudice and rank discrimination are infectious in our world. In this reality, as well as the determination to counter it, we all share.

SUSANNA FISCHER

References and Further Reading

- Bayer, Linda. Ruth Bader Ginsburg. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2000.
- Baugh, Joyce Ann et al., Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg: A Preliminary Assessment, University of Toledo Law Review 26 (1994): 1.
- Celebrating the Jurisprudence of Ruth Bader Ginsburg*, New York City Law Review 7 (2002).
- The Day, Berry and Howard Visiting Scholar, An Open Discussion with Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg*, Connecticut Law Review 36 (Summer 2004): 1033.
- Ginsburg, Ruth Bader, Remarks for the Celebration of 75 Years of Women's Enrollment at Columbia Law School, Columbia Law Review 102 (October 2002) 1441.
- Ginsburg, Ruth Bader, and Deborah Jones Merritt, Fifty-First Cardozo Memorial Lecture Affirmative Action: An International Human Rights Dialogue, Cardozo Law Review 21 (October 1999): 253.
- Gunther, Gerald, Ruth Bader Ginsburg: A Personal, Very Fond Tribute, University of Hawaii Law Review 20 (Winter 1998): 583.

Pressman, Carol, The House That Ruth Built: Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Gender, and Justice, New York Law School Journal of Human Rights 14 (1997): 311.

Symposium: Celebration of the Tenth Anniversary of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's Appointment to the Supreme Court of the United States, Columbia Law Review 104 (January 2004).

GINZBURG v. UNITED STATES, 343 U.S. 463 (1966)

Can the marketing and advertising of printed material constitute "pandering" that under the Roth test for obscenity prohibits the material from being mailed? Ginzburg was convicted of mailing publications and unsolicited circulars that indiscriminately pandered to "erotic interests." He was sentenced to five years in prison. The majority led by Justice Brennan affirmed the lower court convictions and the appellate decision upholding them. This was one of three obscenity decisions handed down on the same day by majorities led by Justice Brennan. Justices Black, Douglas, Harlan, and Stewart wrote separate dissenting opinions in this case.

Justice Brennan's opinion drew from Justice Warren's concurring opinion in Roth (Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 1957) in which the chief justice suggested the focus should be on the defendant's behavior and not on the character of the material in question. Justice Warren's view was that current laws forbade persons from "purveying textual graphic matter openly advertised to appeal to the erotic interest of their customers." Justice Brennan thus accepted the government's argument that the setting in which the publications are presented can be assessed for obscenity using the Roth test. A background of "commercial exploitation of erotica solely for the sake of their prurient appeal" could be obscene.

The advertisements in this case deliberately represented the publications as "erotically arousing" and "stimulated the reader to accept them as prurient" with no expectation of "saving intellectual content." Moreover, the advertisements gave the material a "salacious cast." Evidence of pandering, particularly in "close cases," may be "probative" under Roth since appeals to prurient interests indicate the transactions in question "involved sales of illicit merchandise, not sales of constitutionally protected matter."

Justice Black's dissent attacked the Roth test for its vagueness. He concluded by pointing out that the justices deciding Ginzburg and its two companion cases wrote fourteen separate opinions, which, the justice claimed, by themselves revealed the interpretative challenges posed by Roth. Justice Douglas similarly attacked Roth and reviewed the lower court testimony to make the point that the publications were not obscene by Roth's standards. Justice Harlan criticized the Court for exceeding the bounds of a federal statute that focused "solely" on the character the material deemed to be unmailable because it was obscene. He also restated his position that the statute only authorized banning "hard-core pornography," a test, he said, that the majority and lower courts agreed the publications at issue did not meet.

Agreeing with Justice Harlan on the need to prove "patent indecency" before someone can be convicted for mailing obscene material, Justice Stewart went on to claim that the majority upheld Ginzburg's convictions on the newly developed grounds under Roth of pandering even though he was not charged for this offense. As a consequence, this decision, the justice maintained, denied Ginzburg his due process rights. The companion cases to Ginzburg are Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure v. Attorney General of Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966), and Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966).

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- A Book Named John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure v. Attorney General of Massachusetts*, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)
- Ginzburg v. United States*, 383 U.S. 463 (1966)
- Mishkin v. New York*, 383 U.S. 502 (1966)
- Roth v. United States*, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

GITLOW v. NEW YORK, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)

The right to criticize the government and to argue for a change is an essential aspect of the First Amendment's freedom of speech. This freedom is not unlimited, however. In Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), Justice Holmes said there is a boundary between allowable speech and prohibited speech. That is, there are certain substantive evils that the government has the right to prevent, and the government can criminalize words that create a "clear and present danger" of bringing about that evil.

A range of unrests marked the early years of the twentieth century. The labor union movement, the rise of anarchist and socialist political groups, the antiwar movement during World War I, and the Russian Revolution, with its accompanying development of Bolshevik and Communist Parties led to the enactment of anti-anarchy and antisindicalism acts. The usual definition of "criminal anarchism" was the advocacy of the overthrow of the government by violent or unlawful means.

Bernard Gitlow had served in the New York state legislature in 1918 as a member of the Socialist Party. In 1919, Gitlow split from the Socialist Party because he was dissatisfied with the socialist approach to change and joined what became the Communist Party. Gitlow soon became business manager of The Revolutionary Age, the Communist Party's official publication, which published a copy of the Communist Manifesto. The Manifesto explained the reason for this split: "Moderate socialism" advocated social change by peaceful, parliamentary means—the ballot box. This will not work, said the Manifesto. "Revolutionary socialism," or Communism, "insists that the democratic parliamentary state can never be the basis for the introduction of socialism; it is necessary to destroy the parliamentary state," by violence and unlawful means, as was recently demonstrated by the Communist Revolution in Russia.

Gitlow was arrested in November 1919 and accused of violating New York's criminal anarchy statute, which prohibited a number of acts, including publication of a document "containing or advocating, advising or teaching the doctrine that organized government should be overthrown by force, violence or any unlawful means" (N.Y. Penal Law sec. 161). Gitlow was convicted and sentenced to a term of five to ten years. He appealed, challenging the statute's constitutionality.

In a seven-to-two decision, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the statute, relying on "the principle that the state is primarily the judge of regulations required in the interest of public safety and welfare" and that a statute should be declared unconstitutional only when it is arbitrary or unreasonable:

A single revolutionary spark may kindle a fire that, smoldering for a time, may burst into a sweeping and destructive conflagration. It cannot be said that the state is acting arbitrarily or unreasonably when . . . to protect the public peace and safety, it seeks to extinguish the spark without waiting until it has enkindled the flame or blazed into the conflagration.

Justices Holmes and Brandeis dissented. Justice Holmes argued that the proper test was the rule in Schenck—that the state could prohibit speech only if that speech presented a “clear and present danger” to the state’s continued existence. Publication of the Communist Manifesto presented “no present danger of an attempt to overthrow the government by force on the part of the admittedly small minority who shared the defendant’s views.”

Six months later, New York Governor Al Smith commuted Gitlow’s sentence. Smith said Gitlow’s conviction was proper, noting that while the Supreme Court had upheld the constitutionality of the statute, two and a half years in prison was sufficient punishment for “a political crime.” In addition, the governor said he agreed with the reasoning in the Holmes dissent.

Gitlow immediately returned to his prominent position in the Communist Party. He later split with the party and even became an active anticommunist, testifying against the party before the House Un-American Activities Committee. He died in 1965.

Although the Supreme Court upheld Gitlow’s conviction, the clear-and-present-danger test became the standard by which most free speech cases have been decided ever since. The language in the dissent, that Gitlow’s group was too small to be a threat to the government, was distinguished in the 1951 case of Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951), when the cold war made the strength of the Communist Party seem more worrisome.

A second interesting aspect of the decision is that it is one of the first in which the Supreme Court incorporated a First Amendment guarantee into the Fourteenth Amendment. Almost as an aside, the Court said, “we . . . assume that freedom of speech and of the press . . . are among the fundamental personal rights and ‘liberties’ . . . protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.”

ELI C. BORTMAN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)

Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

N.Y. Penal Law sec. 161, Consol. Laws 1909, c. 40

See also Anti-Anarchy and Anti-Syndicalism Statutes; Application of First Amendment to States; Clear and Present Danger Test; Communist Party; House Un-American Activities Committee

GLORIOUS REVOLUTION

In what is sometimes called the Revolution of 1688 (or 1689), a specially convened “Convention Parliament” recognized William of Orange, Dutch Prince of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation and champion of Europe’s Protestants, and Mary, Protestant daughter of James II by Anne Hyde, as king and queen of England. The Convention Parliament established its own legitimacy and proceedings (as did the two preceding convention parliaments of 1399 and 1660); it also barred all Catholics from future succession to the throne. Though the Glorious Revolution is typically described as the resolution of more than one hundred years of religious and political strife, historians continue to debate the extent to which the events of 1688 and 1689 were glorious or revolutionary.

Background

From the time in 1685 when James II became the last Catholic king of England, all of Britain seemed mired in the simultaneous tensions between Catholics and Protestants and the rising political struggles over divine right vs. parliamentary power. Neither of the two parties in Parliament, Whigs and Tories, was willing to accept James’s Catholicism, particularly when his Catholic second wife, Mary of Modena, gave birth to a son (subsequently the Old Pretender) in June 1688. The newborn son was whisked to France, and the Convention Parliament convened, while James struggled to retain the crown.

Shortly thereafter, six noblemen and the bishop of London (remembered as the Immortal Seven) conspired against James by inviting William of Orange to take the throne and, in so doing, protect the liberties and religion of England. The small army James raised saw only a few minor skirmishes that ended in defeat and the defection of a lead commander to William. All seemed lost when James’s other daughter Anne, a Protestant, also deserted (for which she was later rewarded with a senior position in the line of royal succession). In December James attempted to escape from England but was captured and returned, after which he escaped yet again with greater (perhaps allowed) success.

The question of how to transfer power to William of Orange divided members of the convention between Whigs, who were willing to depose James and treat the throne as vacant, and Tories (previously Stuart loyalists), who refused to acknowledge that any subordinate power could in any way tamper with the historically determined succession. A compromise was reached stating that when James took flight from England he had essentially “abdicated,” thereby leaving the throne vacant. In February 1689, William and Mary were granted the crown jointly, but William became sole ruler so long as he lived, limited only by the liberties of England as articulated by the Declaration of Right (stipulating the rights of Parliament as against the Crown). On December 16, 1689, an act of Parliament formalized the declaration as the Bill of Rights and a permanent buttress to England’s newfound constitutional monarchy.

How Revolutionary Was the Glorious Revolution?

It is often suggested that the Glorious Revolution was too orderly, too deliberate, too prescriptive, and too bloodless to have been revolutionary. Lord Macaulay insisted, “We cannot but be struck by its peculiar character,” the reason for which “is sufficiently obvious, and yet seems not to have been understood either by eulogists or censors.” Indeed, historians have long debated who won, and the magnitude of change brought about by, the revolution. Old Whig historians characterize William of Orange as the “deliverer,” a “savior,” and the “soul of Protestantism”; they see the Revolution as the climax of a century-long battle for parliamentary rule.

Subsequent scholars represented the revolution as a rather conservative affair, with Tories facilitating the change in monarchs without any significant redefinition or diminution of royal authority. The revolution is perhaps best understood as something of a compromise, offering victory for both Whig and Tory. It is certainly too simplistic to cast the revolution as a showdown between conservative Tories and liberal Whigs since either side proved capable of challenging the Crown or supporting royal prerogative. Likewise, it would be too narrow to suggest that no significant results were achieved—witness the validation of exclusion (a virulent decade-old attempt to prevent “popish” successors to the throne) as well as the establishment of a sovereign Parliament and a constitutional monarchy.

In the end, “the settlement” (including the Declaration of Rights, the Mutiny Act, the Toleration Act—all in 1689; the 1690 Land Tax Act; the Triennial Act of 1694; and the 1701 Act of Settlement) was a compromise intended to appeal to as many people as possible; it remained to be seen just how it would get worked out in practice. The next twenty-five years saw a refashioning of the state that, by 1714, developed into a structure different from what anyone anticipated in 1689.

R. OWEN WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

- Harris, Tim. Politics Under the Later Stuarts. London: Longman Group, 1993.
- Hopppit, Julian. A Land of Liberty? England 1689–1727. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Macaulay, Thomas B. The History of England (first published 1848–1861). London: Penguin Books, 1968.
- Pincus, Steven. The First Modern Revolution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2006.
- Trevelyan, G. M. England Under the Stuarts. London: Folio Society, 1996.
- Underdown, David. A Freeborn People: Politics and the Nation in 17th Century England. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996.

GODFREY v. GEORGIA, 446 U.S. 420 (1980)

Upon reexamining the Court’s prior acceptance of Georgia’s capital sentencing scheme in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), Godfrey held that a catch-all statutory aggravating circumstance was unconstitutionally vague. Godfrey was convicted of the murder of his wife and mother-in-law. His jury sentenced him to death after finding, consistent with a statutory aggravating circumstance, that his offenses were “outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman.” The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the sentence.

In Gregg, the Supreme Court found that the language of the catch-all statutory aggravating circumstance could apply to all murders, but that the Georgia Supreme Court could adopt a more limited construction. In Godfrey, Justice Stewart found that Georgia had limited the application of that aggravating circumstance to murders involving torture or aggravated battery, resulting in serious physical abuse before death. Justice Stewart concluded that Godfrey’s case, however, did not involve any of these characteristics because his victims died instantaneously. Therefore, the Georgia Supreme Court failed to follow the standards that it had set forth in order to limit discretion and thus avoid the arbitrary and capricious application of the death penalty. Justice Stewart found that there was no way to distinguish the imposition of the death penalty in this case from other cases in which the penalty was not imposed.

Godfrey further limited the possibility of the arbitrary and capricious application of the death penalty by holding that a vaguely constructed aggravating circumstance provided constitutionally inadequate guidance for the jury.

EARL F. MARTIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics

GODINEZ v. MORAN, 509 U.S. 389 (1993)

In Godinez v. Moran, the U.S. Supreme Court held that a criminal defendant who is competent to stand trial under Dusky v. United States, 362 U.S. 402 (1961), is also competent to enter a guilty plea and to waive the right to counsel. Thus, a defendant who has a basic understanding of the criminal process, his charges, and their consequences and who can recount pertinent facts to his attorney—the criteria for competency to stand trial—is also competent to waive his rights to trial by jury, remain silent, and confront accusers (the rights waived when one pleads guilty) and competent to decide to represent himself. The Court also held that a defendant who pleads guilty or waives counsel must do so “knowingly and voluntarily,” which requires that defendants actually understand the relevant facts (but does not necessarily require that the decision be “rational”).

Applying this standard, the Court refused to overturn the death sentences of Moran, who was found competent to stand trial by the evaluating psychiatrists and the trial judge, but who clearly was extremely depressed when he fired his attorneys, pleaded guilty, and presented no evidence at his capital sentencing proceeding. This case increases the risk that defendants who are irrational, but who can demonstrate a basic understanding of the criminal process, will be allowed to make important decisions and to represent themselves, to their obvious detriment.

CHRISTOPHER SLOBOGIN

References and Further Reading

Slobogin, Christopher, and Amy Mashburn, The Criminal Defense Lawyer's Fiduciary Duty to Clients with Mental Disability, Fordham Law Review 68 (2000): 1581–1642.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Dusky v. United States, 362 U.S. 402 (1961)

See also Dusky v. U.S.*, 362 U.S. 402 (1960); Guilty but Mentally Ill; Guilty Plea; Insanity Defense; Right to Counsel

GOLDBERG v. KELLY, 397 U.S. 254 (1970)

In Goldberg v. Kelly (1970), the U.S. Supreme Court held that a state could not terminate welfare benefits without first giving the recipient the opportunity for an evidentiary oral hearing.

Goldberg capped a trio of decisions expanding federal welfare rights. King v. Smith, 392 U.S. 309 (1968), had held that a state may not limit Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) to families headed by married couples. Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969), struck a one-year welfare residency requirement as violating the right to interstate travel. In Goldberg, the Court went beyond scrutinizing the particulars of state welfare programs to articulate the general proposition that welfare enjoys the same legal protection as other property.

The plaintiffs in Goldberg v. Kelly were New York City residents who had been cut from the welfare rolls or were about to be. Under agency rules, they could discuss the proposed termination with a caseworker, submit a written protest and have a supervisor review the decision. A hearing, however, was available only after benefits ended. This, the Court held, was unconstitutional.

Writing for the six-to-three majority, Justice William Brennan noted that welfare benefits are “a matter of statutory entitlement for persons qualified to receive them,” adding that “it may be realistic today to regard welfare entitlements as more like ‘property’ than a ‘gratuity’” (Here cited to Charles A. Reich’s, “The New Property”). Thus, the prohibition against deprivation of property without due process of law contained in the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution applies to benefits termination.

“Due process of law” in this situation requires a pre-termination hearing because of the danger that if aid is terminated pending resolution of a controversy over eligibility, a person who is actually eligible may lose the “very means by which to live while he waits.” The hearing, however, need not be the equivalent of a full-dress trial, but should reflect the needs of the agency and the abilities of the average welfare recipient. The court then articulated a set of “minimum procedural safeguards,” namely, (1) timely notice, giving reasons for the proposed termination; (2) a hearing at which recipients can speak, confront adverse witnesses, and be assisted by counsel (although counsel need not be provided); (3) an impartial decision maker; and (4) a reasoned decision resting on evidence adduced at the hearing.

In its original area of welfare law, the force of Goldberg v. Kelly has been blunted. The Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996 abolished AFDC, replacing it with block grants to states. Indeed, the statute specifies that it creates no federal entitlement to welfare in favor of individuals, leaving the scope of entitlements to state law. Additionally, the Court has retreated from Goldberg's trial-like vision of administrative due process in such cases as Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335 (1976).

Nevertheless, the “procedural due process revolution” started by Goldberg v. Kelly continues. “Fair hearings” are now an established element of the administrative landscape and the importance of statutory and administrative rights—the “new property”—is beyond dispute.

AMY SHAPIRO

References and Further Reading

- Davis, Martha F. Brutal Need: Lawyers and the Welfare Rights Movement, 1960–1973. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993.
- Mashaw, Jerry L. Due Process in the Administrative State. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985.
- Michelman, Frank I., Welfare Rights in a Constitutional Democracy, Washington University Law Quarterly (1979): 659.
- Reich, Charles A., The New Property, Yale Law Journal 73 (1964): 733.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Goldberg v. Kelly*, 397 U.S. 254 (1970)
- King v. Smith*, 392 U.S. 309 (1968)
- Mathews v. Eldridge*, 424 U.S. 319, 335 (1976)
- Shapiro v. Thompson*, 394 U.S. 618 (1969)
- Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996*, Pub. L. No. 104-193, 110 Stat. 2105 (1996)

GOLDBERG, ARTHUR J. (1908–1990)

Over the nearly six decades of his working life, Arthur J. Goldberg was a consummate public citizen. In that period, Goldberg served as a captain and then a major in the U.S. Army Office of Strategic Services during World War II, general counsel to the United Steelworkers of America and Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), secretary of labor to President John F. Kennedy, the nation's ninety-eighth Supreme Court justice, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations under President Lyndon Johnson, the Democratic Party's challenger to incumbent Republican Nelson Rockefeller in the 1970 New York gubernatorial election, and U.S. ambassador to the Belgrade Conference on Human Rights under President Jimmy Carter. Regardless of which post he held, Goldberg's lifetime of public service evidenced conciliation, tolerance, and his dedication to improving the living standards of working Americans and protecting civil liberties.

The Early Years

Goldberg was born on August 8, 1908, on the west side of Chicago. He was the youngest of eleven children born to Jewish Russian immigrant parents. Goldberg's father was a peddler, delivering produce by horse-drawn wagon until his death in 1916. After his death, Goldberg's older siblings quit school and worked full-time to support the family. As the youngest sibling, Goldberg worked in various low-paying jobs—wrapping fish at a fish market, as a shoe salesman, as a vendor at Wrigley Field, and as a part-time library clerk—and continued his education. No doubt, Goldberg's working-class childhood shaped his career-long dedication to the betterment of working Americans' lives.

By the age of sixteen, Goldberg had graduated from Benjamin Harrison Public High School, a feat that none of his siblings had achieved, and, motivated by the well-publicized 1923 murder trial of Nathan Leopold and Richard Loeb, was determined to study law. Goldberg accepted a scholarship at Chicago's Crane Junior College and also enrolled in classes at DePaul University. Despite his almost full-time work schedule, Goldberg continued to excel at school and, in 1926, secured a scholarship to transfer to Northwestern University.

Meanwhile, Goldberg also secured a scholarship to attend the Northwestern University School of Law, where, like many lawyers of his day, he began his study of law without having completed his undergraduate studies. While at Northwestern, Goldberg continued to work, performing hard labor on a part-time basis as a hod carrier in the construction industry. Nevertheless, as he had done throughout his academic career, Goldberg continued to excel, compiling the best academic record in the history of the law school, becoming editor-in-chief of the Illinois Law Review (the journal then jointly edited by Northwestern, the University of Chicago, and the University of Illinois) and graduating at the top of his class with a bachelor of science in law and a doctor of science in law by age twenty-one.

Goldberg's graduation at such a young age posed a problem, however, because the Illinois Bar Association's rules prohibited the admission of someone so young. Ultimately, Goldberg overcame this hurdle by suing the Illinois Bar and, arguing his own case, persuaded an Illinois judge to waive the age restriction.

Lawyer and Patriot

Newly licensed, Goldberg spent four years working as an associate at two Chicago-based firms, where his work focused primarily on legal finance matters. Unexcited by this work and after seeing the Great Depression take its toll on working-class America, in 1933, Goldberg opened his own law firm specializing in labor law. Goldberg's associations with labor leaders and growing skills as a lawyer brought him to the attention of the CIO; in 1938, the organization asked him to advise the American Newspaper Guild during its strike against the Hearst Newspapers in Chicago and to defend guild pickets in court. Consistent with his sympathy and compassion for workers and his evident distaste for the violence that had plagued so many strikes, Goldberg accepted the representation. He prevailed by securing an injunction against the publisher that prevented it from using violence to dispel guild strikers and secured contempt charges against it after it disobeyed the injunction. With these victories, Goldberg emerged as a rising legal star of the nation's labor movement.

After reading about the December 7, 1941, attack on Pearl Harbor, Goldberg demonstrated his patriotism by joining President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's Office of Strategic Services (OSS)—the first civilian-run intelligence agency in modern history. Because of Goldberg's experience with labor unions, his work at the OSS focused on gathering secret information from European labor unions. While at the OSS, Goldberg was commissioned as a captain in the U.S. Army and eventually ascended to the rank of major.

Whereas Goldberg's prior work as a labor lawyer had been confined to the industrial and commercial centers of the Midwest and Pacific Coast, Goldberg made valuable contacts with domestic labor leaders on the East Coast—in particular, New York and Washington, D.C.—and abroad through his work at the OSS. Additionally, his exposure to and work with leading international trade unionists and Socialist Party leaders from every country in western and central Europe solidified his belief that tripartite cooperation (a "social contract") among workers, businesses, and government provided the best model for raising living standards of the working class.

After D-day, Goldberg returned to Chicago to reopen his law practice. He immediately became active in committees working to reelect President Roosevelt and reestablished ties with his former union clients, the membership of which (chief among them, the United Steelworkers of America) had swelled during wartime. But once the war was over, the cancellation of military orders and accompanying layoffs spurred widespread fear of postwar depression. The removal of wartime price controls and accompanying increases in prices without corresponding increases in wages resulted in an estimated 30 percent decline in the real income of those fortunate to still be employed. As a result, by November 1945, America was experiencing the beginning of one of the largest strike waves in history. In response to the strike wave, Congress passed, over President Truman's veto, the Taft-Hartley Act—legislation that the labor movement had labeled a "slave labor law."

After the Steelworkers' and CIO's general counsel resigned in February 1948, the CIO's leadership knew that they would need a brilliant labor lawyer to cope with Taft-Hartley. Goldberg was chosen. His victories on behalf of the Newspaper Guild, impressive earlier work for the Steelworkers, OSS service, contacts in the international labor movement, and open hostility to the Communist Party (which was alleged to have infiltrated the domestic labor movement and motivated, at least in part, the passage of Taft-Hartley) all made him a popular choice.

One of Goldberg's greatest accomplishments during his early years as general counsel was his successful challenge to the steel industry's refusal to bargain over pensions. Rather than advising the Steelworkers to strike over the pensions, which Goldberg believed would be illegal under the National Labor Relations Act, he petitioned to the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), seeking a declaration that the steel industry had a "duty to bargain" over such fringe benefits. In NLRB v. Inland Steel Co. (170 F.2d 247, 7th Cir. 1948, cert. denied, 336 U.S. 960, 1949), the NLRB and Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals accepted Goldberg's position. The Supreme Court denied review, thereby making an employer's duty to bargain over fringe benefits a permanent fixture of the labor-management relationship.

Meanwhile, Goldberg was also working to hold together a domestic labor movement fracturing over allegations of corruption levied by Senator Estes Kefauver's Special Committee to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce and allegations of communist influence levied by Senator Joseph McCarthy. After the Senate's censure of McCarthy in 1954, Goldberg worked with leaders of the CIO and American Federation of Labor (AFL) to create a "no raiding" agreement, which prohibited one union from soliciting membership from another's members. The no raiding agreement ultimately led to the 1955 merger of the two organizations and formation of the AFL–CIO—a partnership that Goldberg had hoped to achieve all along and for which he deserves most of the credit.

Goldberg's most important work as a legal advocate likely came in 1957 in Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills of Alabama (170 F.2d 247, 7th Cir. 1948, cert. denied, 336 U.S. 960, 1949), which established the federal courts' power to enforce arbitration clauses in labor contracts under the Taft–Hartley Act. Because 90 percent of existing labor contracts contained arbitration clauses under which unions promise not to strike if employers promise to submit grievances to an arbitrator, the Court's ruling in Lincoln Mills meant that, rather than strike, unions could sue in federal court over an employer's refusal to arbitrate.

Goldberg and President Kennedy

In 1957, the Senate authorized Senator John McClellan to chair a Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor Management Field that would pick up where Senator Kefauver's Organized Crime Committee had left off: investigating corruption within and organized crime's influence over the American labor movement and business. Although the committee was authorized and directed, as its name indicated, to investigate corruption in labor and management, its members quickly focused primarily on the improper activities of organized labor. For three years, the committee hearings were televised daily, exposing the public to such abuses as collusion between dishonest employers and union officials, extortions and the use of violence by certain segments of labor leadership, and the misuse of funds by high-ranking union officials. By 1959, polls indicated that Americans ranked "labor problems" on par with national defense, the space race, and education among the eight most important concerns facing the nation.

In response to the Committee's revelations, the public, Congress, and Goldberg all agreed that corrective legislation was needed to address weaknesses in labor regulation. As the chief legal representative of the labor movement, Goldberg teamed-up with then-Senator John F. Kennedy and Senator Irving

Ives—the Committee's two most labor-friendly members—to craft an appropriate legislative remedy. Their legislative proposal would require reporting and disclosure for union officers, restrictions on administratorships (the mechanism by which an international union takes control of a local or other subordinate body), and modest election restrictions.

Goldberg believed that these reforms would prevent the kinds of thievery and misconduct uncovered by the McClellan committee from recurring but not go so far as to cripple the labor movement. But to secure support from leaders of many CIO affiliates who were opposed to anticorruption legislation (the CIO leadership believed that corruption was primarily an AFL problem), an additional title was added to the Kennedy–Ives proposed legislation to amend some provisions of Taft–Hartley that the CIO leadership had despised most. These Taft–Hartley "sweeteners," as they became popularly known, led to the death of the Kennedy–Ives bill.

After the Democrats' sweep of the 1958 congressional elections, Goldberg and Kennedy resumed their efforts to create what they thought would be appropriate remedial legislation. This time, Kennedy chose Sam Erwin as his cosponsor, but the bill they proposed was essentially unchanged from the Kennedy–Ives version. Unfortunately for Goldberg and Kennedy, the bill was significantly modified on the Senate floor. The modified version limited organizational picketing; outlawed "hot cargo" agreements, under which union workers could refuse to handle or process struck or nonunion work, in the carrier industry; regulated the conduct of union elections; and imposed strict bonding requirements on union officials. While labor debated whether to support the modified Kennedy–Erwin bill, Phillip Landrum and Robert Griffin sponsored their own version in the House—a version virtually identical to the modified Senate bill. By the first week of September 1959, the bill had passed both houses, thereby becoming the Landrum–Griffin Act of 1959.

Landrum–Griffin has been characterized by many as serving little, if any, benefit to organized labor and therefore as a failure for Kennedy and Goldberg. However, the friendship they forged and confidence that they established in each other would pay huge dividends for Goldberg in the years to come.

Mr. Secretary

After Kennedy's successful presidential campaign in November 1960, which Goldberg forcefully supported, President Kennedy nominated Goldberg to be secretary of labor. Because of their past dealings and friendship and Goldberg's work on Kennedy's campaign, the nomination was not surprising.

With his election, Kennedy inherited a recession, and he gave Goldberg the primary responsibility of fighting it through labor policy. Goldberg's weapons included increasing the minimum wage, extending unemployment benefits, encouraging youth employment, and revitalizing depressed local economies. Meanwhile, Goldberg also believed that while raising the minimum wage was important, keeping higher wages and prices from increasing was equally important. To achieve this latter goal, Goldberg believed that lost productivity due to strikes, which had become so frequent throughout the postwar era, would have to be minimized.

During the first six months of his tenure as secretary of labor, Goldberg personally intervened in and ended three key strikes affecting domestic infrastructure: the New York City tug- and ferryboat strike and related sympathy strikes reaching as far west as St. Louis in the railway industry; a pilots' strike in the commercial airline industry; and a maritime workers' strike over management's efforts to avoid domestic labor laws by registering their vessels overseas. With Goldberg at the helm of the Department of Labor, the United States experienced the fewest working hours lost due to strikes since World War II.

Goldberg's greatest achievement as secretary of labor arguably came, however, as a result of his strategic threat to resign the post in April 1962. In 1961, Goldberg had heard that the steel industry was planning to raise steel prices by over 3 percent. Goldberg took the lead in moderating negotiations for a master steel contract that would raise steelworkers' wages only 2.2 percent and implied that steel prices would remain unchanged.

Just ten days after the contract was announced, U.S. Steel's general counsel announced that U.S. Steel was raising steel prices 3.5 percent. In response, Goldberg offered to resign as secretary of labor and leaked news of his resignation offer to the media. The ploy worked. Business leaders outside the steel industry feared that a new secretary of labor would be much less likely to embrace Goldberg's consensual approach to resolving labor disputes. Accordingly, they pressured U.S. Steel to accede to Goldberg's demand that it not raise prices.

Mr. Justice

On August 28, 1962, just twenty months after Goldberg assumed the secretary of labor position and after Justice Felix Frankfurter resigned from the Supreme Court because of poor health, President Kennedy nominated Goldberg to the Court. Other worthy candidates, such as Solicitor General and former Harvard Law Professor Archibald Cox, Harvard Law Professor Paul Freund, and U.S. Court of Appeals Judge William Henry Hastie, had been available. But Kennedy chose Goldberg as he had chosen Byron R. White in April 1962 to fill Justice Charles E. Whittaker's seat. Kennedy knew Goldberg and White well; he was comfortable with them personally, professionally, and ideologically; he trusted their dedication to the country and to the Constitution; and, in Robert Kennedy's words, they were "his kind of people." One month after his nomination, on September 28, 1962, the Senate confirmed Goldberg for his position on the Court.

Justice Goldberg's tenure on the Court would be one of the briefest in history. After he had served only three terms, President Lyndon Johnson persuaded him (some claim that he was duped by Johnson, though Justice Goldberg vehemently denied this claim) to resign from the Court and become U.S. ambassador to the United Nations in 1965. Certainly, his brief tenure on the Court prevented him from having the direct influence on the Court's jurisprudence that those with longer tenure achieved, and it is tempting to speculate how modern constitutional law might differ had Kennedy survived a two-term presidency and had Justice Goldberg, as is most likely, remained on the Court.

Even during the brief three terms in which he served, Justice Goldberg authored a handful of significant opinions in constitutional criminal procedure that contributed to what scholars have dubbed the "Warren Court Revolution." In Murphy v. Waterfront Commission, 378 U.S. 52 (1964), he wrote that a state witness could not be compelled to give testimony that may be incriminating under federal law unless the compelled testimony and its fruits could not be used in any manner by federal officials in connection with a criminal prosecution against him. In Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), the justice wrote that confessions obtained after a criminal suspect requested but was refused assistance of counsel were in violation of his Sixth Amendment rights and therefore inadmissible against him at trial. Justice Goldberg's opinion in Escobedo paved the way for the Court's landmark 1966 ruling in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966).

Justice Goldberg was the first justice to intimate that the death penalty might be unconstitutional on cruel and unusual punishment and due process grounds—views that were not embraced by the Court until 1972 in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)—in Rudolph v. Alabama, 375 U.S. 889 (1963), and Snider v. Cunningham, 375 U.S. 889 (1963). Additionally, in his concurring opinion in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 488 (1965), he gave an expansive interpretation to the notion that “additional fundamental rights” (such as a right to privacy that extends to marital sexual intimacy) not enumerated elsewhere in the Bill of Rights may rest in the Ninth Amendment. The justice also wrote for the six-to-three majority that held in Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500 (1964), that the denial of passports to members of the Communist Party and its affiliates was an unconstitutional infringement on the right to travel.

In addition to his contributions to the expansion of constitutional civil liberties through his written opinions, Justice Goldberg contributed to the “Warren Court Revolution” by voting with Chief Justice Earl Warren between 85 and 89 percent of the time. Moreover, after his resignation, the five-vote Warren majority hardly changed at all. President Johnson’s replacement for the justice was Abe Fortas, who not unlike Justice Goldberg, agreed with the chief justice between 83 and 92 percent of the time in each of his four years on the Court.

To this end, Justice Goldberg’s appointment turned the Warren Court’s pro-civil liberties wing into a majority by providing the long-awaited fifth vote. Indeed, contemporary and present-day commentators agree that his replacement of Frankfurter had a profound impact on the shape of the Court’s jurisprudence. For example, in 1965, just three years after Justice Goldberg took the bench, Yale Law professor and Frankfurter protégé Alexander Bickel noted that Justice Goldberg’s appointment “does more than merely change a vote; it alters the entire judicial landscape. . . . it is the magnetic field in which the Justices operate that is altered. . . . There is a new Court.” Over thirty years later, in 1998, legal historian Morton Horwitz agreed that “Goldberg’s appointment to replace Frankfurter . . . signaled a major realignment of the Court.” Similarly, as Chief Justice Rehnquist noted in memoriam of Goldberg:

Probably more important than any individual opinion which he wrote was the outlook on constitutional law which he brought to the Court. His succession to the seat of Felix Frankfurter gave the ‘Warren Court’ a solid majority for an expansive reading of the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. He thus contributed far more to the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court than one would think possible in so brief a period of service.

Mr. Ambassador

On July 14, 1965, Adlai Stevenson, who was serving as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, suddenly died. Believing Goldberg to be the strong negotiator he needed at the United Nations and seeing a chance to fill a Supreme Court seat with his friend Abe Fortas, President Johnson asked Goldberg to assume the post. Sensing that the nation needed a negotiated, rather than military, solution to the war in Vietnam, Goldberg accepted (after much hesitation) after Johnson guaranteed him that he would be Johnson’s principal advisor on all decisions leading to a Vietnam settlement.

The ambassadorship proved frustrating for Goldberg as Johnson shifted his support for a negotiated settlement to increased military intervention. Goldberg had supported a de-escalation strategy all along and was not shy about sharing his views within the Johnson administration. After North Vietnam’s Tet Offensive in 1968 cast doubt on the soundness of the United States’ escalating U.S. military involvement, many high-ranking officials within the administration sided with Goldberg’s call for de-escalation. Goldberg’s victory was Pyrrhic, however, because Johnson resented him for his steadfast and public antiwar stance. Perhaps to punish Goldberg, Johnson announced on March 31, 1968, that Averill Harriman—not Goldberg, as he was promised—would be the United States’ chief negotiator on a North Vietnamese peace accord. Three weeks later, on April 23, 1968, Goldberg resigned as United Nations ambassador.

The Emeritus Years

After leaving public service, Goldberg returned to the practice of law by becoming a partner at a prominent New York law firm. In 1969, he decided to run as a Democrat for governor of New York against incumbent Republican Nelson Rockefeller. Rockefeller, a moderate Republican, enjoyed support from both parties and proved a tough incumbent to unseat. He defeated Goldberg by nearly 20 percent of the three-and-a-half million votes cast.

After his humbling loss, Goldberg returned to his farm in Marshall, Virginia, and to his old law firm in Washington, D.C. In 1977, President Jimmy Carter offered Goldberg one final tour as a diplomat when Carter appointed him U.S. ambassador to the Belgrade Conference on Human Rights. Goldberg performed very effectively, “batting the Russians like a tiger,” it has been said. After his return from Belgrade, President Carter awarded Goldberg the Presidential Medal of Freedom for his many contributions to his country in and out of government.

Goldberg died on January 19, 1990, after suffering the second heart attack since the death of his wife, Dorothy, in 1988. After receiving a full military funeral, he was buried at Arlington National Cemetery next to his wife and near his dear friend, Chief Justice Warren.

JEAN-CLAUDE ANDRÉ

References and Further Reading

- Abraham, Henry J. Justices, Presidents, and Senators, new and revised ed. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999.
- Berendt, Gerald, Gil Cornfield, Peter Edelman, Hon. Milton Shadur, David Stebenne, Wesley Wildman, and Willard Wirtz, Lecture: Arthur J. Goldberg's Legacies to American Labor Relations, John Marshall Law Review 32 (Spring 1999): 3:667–723.
- Goldberg, Arthur J. AFL–CIO: Labor United. New York: McGraw–Hill, 1956.
- . Equal Justice: The Warren Era of the Supreme Court. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1972.
- Goldberg, Dorothy. A Private View of a Public Life. New York: Charterhouse, 1975.
- Horwitz, Morton J. The Warren Court and the Pursuit of Justice. New York: Hill and Wang, 1998.
- In Memoriam Arthur J. Goldberg 1908–1990, Northwestern University Law Review 84 (Spring/Summer 1990): 3–4:807–831.
- Lasky, Victor. Arthur J. Goldberg: The Old & the New. New Rochelle: Arlington House, 1970.
- Moynihán, Daniel Patrick, ed. The Defenses of Freedom: The Public Papers of Arthur J. Goldberg. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.
- Rubin, Eva Redfield. “The Judicial Apprenticeship of Arthur J. Goldberg, 1962–1965.” Ph.D. diss., Johns Hopkins University, 1967.
- Stebenne, David L. Arthur J. Goldberg: New Deal Liberal. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Aptheker v. Secretary of State*, 378 U.S. 500 (1964)
- Escobedo v. Illinois*, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479, 488 (1965) (Goldberg, J., concurring).
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Murphy v. Waterfront Commission*, 378 U.S. 52 (1964)
- NLRB v. Inland Steel Co.*, 170 F.2d 247 (7th Cir. 1948), cert. denied, 336 U.S. 960 (1949)
- Rudolph v. Alabama*, 375 U.S. 889 (1963) (Goldberg, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari)
- Snider v. Cunningham*, 375 U.S. 889 (1963) (Goldberg, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari)
- Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills of Alabama*, 353 U.S. 448 (1957)

See also Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500 (1964); Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964); Fortas, Abe; Frankfurter, Felix; Freund, Paul A.; Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, (1965); McCarthy, Joseph; Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Ninth Amendment; Privacy; Right of Privacy; Right to Travel; Taft–Hartley Act of 1947; Warren Court; Warren, Earl; White, Byron Raymond

GOLDMAN v. WEINBERGER, 475 U.S. 503 (1986)

Members of the military take an oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States. However, due to the nature of the military lifestyle and the inherent requirements for discipline and uniformity, military members may not enjoy the same range of constitutional protections as other members of society. In Goldman v. Weinberger, the Supreme Court weighed the free exercise of religion rights of service members against the requirements for uniformity in the military.

Captain (Dr.) Simcha Goldman was an Orthodox Jew whose religion required him to wear his yarmulke at all times. He served in the Navy as a chaplain from 1970 until 1972. After he completed his Ph.D. in psychology, he joined the Air Force as a psychologist. Between 1977 and 1981, Goldman served honorably as an Air Force officer and wore his yarmulke at all times, even in uniform, with no incident. In 1981, based on Air Force uniform regulations, his commander ordered Goldman not to wear the yarmulke outside the hospital in which he worked. Goldman asked his commander to reconsider or to allow him to wear civilian clothes to work, rather than his uniform, so that he could wear his yarmulke without violating the regulation. His commander denied the request.

Goldman sued in federal district court, and the court ordered the Air Force to allow him to wear his yarmulke while in uniform. The district court used reasoning based on the Supreme Court's prior decision in Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57 (1981). In Rostker, the Court held that it was permissible for Congress to exclude women from mandatory Selective Service registration. Congress had made a deliberate decision in weighing the equal protection and due process rights of women vs. the need to raise combat forces (women are precluded from most ground combat roles in the military). Congress decided that an all-male draft was the appropriate mechanism to raise combat forces, and the Supreme Court deferred to the judgment of Congress. However, in this case, the Air Force had not conducted a deliberative process and had not weighed the competing interests of the Free Exercise Clause with the need for uniformity; therefore, the district court would not defer to the regulations of the Air Force in the matter.

The government appealed the decision to the federal appeals court. The appeals court reversed the decision. The appeals court held that rather than balance the competing interests of the Free Exercise Clause and uniformity, it would simply determine whether the regulation served legitimate military ends and had appropriate accommodations for individuals. Since the regulation served a valid military purpose, and there were some exceptions for religious purposes (such as wearing religious apparel, in uniform, during religious services), the appeals court ruled that the Air Force could strictly enforce its regulations. Goldman requested a rehearing of the entire court of appeals, but it was denied. Interestingly, two future Supreme Court justices, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Antonin Scalia, were on the appeals court and voted to rehear the case (in favor of Goldman).

Goldman appealed to the Supreme Court. In a five-to-four decision, the Supreme Court upheld the appeals court and ruled that the Free Exercise Clause did not require the Air Force to grant an exemption from the uniform regulation. The Court relied on Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 296 (1983); Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733 (1974); and Orloff v. Willoughby, 345 U.S. 83 (1953). Taken together, these cases articulate the principle that members of the military have constitutional rights, but due to the special nature of military service, those rights are not the same as those other members of society; the military is a separate society. Furthermore, when courts decide cases regarding military matters, the courts should show great deference to the military and its rules. The Supreme Court showed deference and held that the Free Exercise Clause did not require a uniform exemption.

If this case had been decided just a few months later, when Chief Justice Burger retired (he had voted with the five-vote majority) and Justice Scalia joined the Court, there likely would have been a different outcome. Based on Justice Scalia's vote on the appeals court, it is reasonable to assume the four-vote minority would have become a five-vote majority.

The following year, Congress responded and created a statutory right to a uniform exemption. It passed a law that requires the military to permit wear of religious apparel, in uniform, as long as wearing the item does not interfere with military duties and it is "neat and conservative."

JAMES G. HARWOOD

References and Further Reading

Employment Div. Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 296 (1983)

Orloff v. Willoughby, 345 U.S. 83 (1953)

Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733 (1974)

Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57 (1981)

GOOD NEWS CLUB v. MILFORD CENTRAL SCHOOL, 533 U.S. 98 (2001)

In Good News Club, the Supreme Court considered whether speech can be excluded from a limited public forum on the basis of the religious nature of the speech. The school enacted a policy authorizing local residents to use the school's facilities after school for, among other things, (1) instruction in education, learning, or arts and (2) social, civic, recreational, and entertainment uses relevant to the community's welfare. Following the policy, members of the club submitted a request to use the school's facilities after school hours. The school rejected the request because the club's meetings involved Bible lessons, memorizing scripture, and praying.

The case raised two First Amendment issues. The first issue was whether the school violated the club's free speech rights by prohibiting it from meeting after hours on the school's campus. Following Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School Dist., 508 U.S. 384 (1993), and Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), the Court held the club's First Amendment rights were violated. Although the school is not required to permit every type of speech in a limited public forum, it may not engage in viewpoint discrimination (Rosenberger) and any restriction must be "reasonable in light of the purpose served by the forum" (Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense & Educ. Fund, Inc., 473 U.S. 788, 806, 1985).

The Court rejected the proffered distinction between the activities at issue in this case and Lamb's Chapel—that teaching of moral values from a Christian perspective came from film in Lamb's Chapel, while in this case, the teaching came through live storytelling. The school's policy permitted teaching morals and character development to children and there was no question that the club's activities also taught moral and character development. Thus, the Court held that the school district engaged in impermissible viewpoint discrimination by excluding the club from using campus facilities. Having decided this issue, it did not consider the reasonableness of the restriction in light of the forum.

The school also argued that it would have violated the establishment clause if it had permitted the religious club to meet on campus. Although a state may engage in content based discrimination to satisfy a compelling interest in avoiding violating the establishment clause (Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 271, 1981), the Court found that the school in this case had no such compelling interest. Because the club would meet after school hours and was not sponsored by the school, “there would have been no realistic danger that the community would think that the District was endorsing religion” (533 U.S. at 110 [quoting Lamb’s Chapel, 508 U.S. at 395]). The neutrality of the school towards religion and the lack of coercive pressure were significant factors in dismissing the establishment clause claim. Moreover, in spite of language suggesting that elementary school students were more susceptible to a perceived union between church and state (Grand Rapids School Dist. v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 1985), the mere presence of religious conduct on public elementary school premises is not prohibited.

EMILY R. FROMSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Grand Rapids School Dist. v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)
Lamb’s Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School Dist.,
 508 U.S. 384 (1993)
Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of University of Virginia,
 515 U.S. 819 (1995)
Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 271 (1981)

GOVERNMENT FUNDING OF SPEECH

In a democratic society, the government typically allocates its resources in support of its political agenda. A legislature whose members are elected on a “family values” platform, for example, may finance a campaign against indecency that includes public service announcements delivered by official representatives or hired agents. When the government pays for its own speech, it can say what it pleases without incurring any obligation to finance alternative points of view.

Rather than engage in speech, the government often attempts to advance its policy objectives by selectively subsidizing private speech. For example, the federal government historically has provided second-class mail subsidies to print publications. May the government encourage media decency by denying second-class mailing privileges to magazines that contain sexual material? In other words, may the government use the power of the purse to promote or disfavor certain private viewpoints?

Although the Supreme Court has often said that the First Amendment prohibits the government from using its subsidy power to suppress “dangerous ideas,” the Court has applied this prohibition in an inconsistent, context-specific manner. In the second-class mailing example, the Court in Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc., 327 U.S. 146 (1946), held that second-class mail status could not be denied to publications that postal officials found objectionable. The Court saw the subsidy denial as the imposition of an unconstitutional condition: the state had conditioned the receipt of a government benefit on the recipients’ willingness to curtail their right of free speech. Although the state was not obliged to award postage subsidies at all, it could not penalize offensive speakers by revoking the subsidy in a viewpoint-discriminatory manner.

Compare, however, the Court’s analysis in subsidy situations involving nonmedia grantees. In Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991), the Court upheld federal regulations that prohibited doctors at federally funded family-planning clinics from providing pregnant women with abortion counseling or referrals, requiring instead that these doctors dispense information about prenatal care. Although the doctors challenged these regulations as unconstitutional, viewpoint-based discrimination, the Court disagreed.

In a five-to-four opinion written by Chief Justice Rehnquist, the Court reasoned that when the government funds a program, it must be allowed to set program limits. Here, Justice Rehnquist said, “The government is not denying a benefit to anyone, but is instead simply insisting that public funds be spent for the purposes for which they were authorized.” According to Justice Rehnquist, the federal regulations did not favor one viewpoint over another; rather, they imposed necessary boundaries on the scope of a federal enterprise. In dissent, Justice Blackmun argued that the federal regulations constituted obvious, unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination by creating family-planning clinics that could provide information on only one family-planning option—the one favored by Congress.

Similarly, the Court in National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569 (1998), upheld congressional legislation that required the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) to consider “general standards of decency” in awarding grant funding for the arts. Artists challenged the law as providing an unconstitutional federal subsidy to inoffensive art, while denying federal funding to art outside mainstream American values. The Court disagreed, finding that the statute did not violate the First Amendment prohibition on viewpoint discrimination, but only by interpreting the decency clause as advisory rather than compulsory. Technically, the Court said, the NEA was only required to give “consideration” to the decency issue; the statute did not absolutely forbid the NEA from funding indecent art. Furthermore, the Court noted that because NEA grants already were based on subjective notions of artistic excellence, adding a decency standard to the process would not offend the First Amendment. Writing for the Court, Justice O’Connor concluded that “the Government may allocate competitive funding according to criteria that would be impermissible were direct regulation of speech or a criminal penalty at stake.”

Based on Rust and Finley, the Court’s often repeated statement that in awarding financial subsidies, the government “may not . . . aim at the suppression of dangerous ideas” appeared to be an empty platitude. A decade after Rust, however, the Court in Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001), returned to the principle that government subsidies must be allocated in a viewpoint-neutral manner when they involve private speech. In that case, by another five-to-four vote the Court invalidated a condition in a federal statute that prohibited federally funded legal aid attorneys from representing clients who challenged existing welfare laws. The Court distinguished Rust by characterizing the clinic doctors in Rust as government agents, engaged in government rather than private speech.

The Court emphatically denied that the legal aid attorneys could also be described as government speakers. Nor could the attorney speech limitation be considered necessary to define the scope of a federal legal aid program. According to the Court, “Congress cannot recast a condition on funding as a mere definition of its program in every case, lest the First Amendment be reduced to a simple semantic exercise.” Furthermore, by limiting the scope of litigation, the Court found that the funding condition in Velazquez also unconstitutionally distorted the “usual functioning” of the judicial system. Justice Scalia disagreed, stating in his dissent that the legal aid funding scheme should have been upheld because it was “in all relevant respects indistinguishable” from the subsidy program the Court had approved in Rust.

The question of whether the government can condition its subsidies in ways that limit private speech has also arisen in the public library context. In an effort to keep on-line pornography away from children, Congress in 2000 passed a law requiring public libraries that receive federal funds to install blocking software on all computers. The American Library Association protested, stating that the filters blocked too much nonobscene material and interfered with adults’ First Amendment rights to view constitutionally protected Web pages. In United States v. American Library Association, 123 S. Ct. 2297 (2003), the Court upheld the law, stating that Congress was entitled to impose conditions on how libraries spend government monies and that objecting libraries were free to turn down federal funds. Two concurring justices in the six-to-three decision agreed to uphold the law because it allowed libraries to remove filters for adult patrons upon request.

NICOLE B. CÁSAREZ

References and Further Reading

- Cásarez, Nicole B., Public Forums, Selective Subsidies, and Shifting Standards of Viewpoint Discrimination, Albany Law Review 64 (2000): 501–581.
 Post, Robert C., Subsidized Speech, Yale Law Journal 106 (1996): 151–195.
 Smolla, Rodney A. Free Speech in an Open Society. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., 1992.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc.*, 327 U.S. 146 (1946)
Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001)
National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569 (1998)
Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
United States v. American Library Association, 123 S. Ct. 2297 (2003)

See also Government Speech; Internet Filtering at Libraries and Free Speech; Unconstitutional Conditions

GOVERNMENT SPEECH

For a representative democracy to function, the government must communicate with the governed. A democratic government formulates, explains, justifies, and garners support for its policies and programs through discourse by governmental entities that include elected and appointed officials, administrative agencies, and government agents and employees. Without access to the government’s views, citizens could not evaluate governmental policies and therefore would be unable to make the informed political decisions necessary for effective self-government. Laws, speeches, debates, advertisements, hearings, research reports, leaflets, press conferences, meetings, and even public education are just some of the means by which government communicates its positions to the populace.

Although the First Amendment limits the government’s ability to regulate private speech, the government as speaker is free to determine the content of its messages. Nothing in the Constitution forbids the government from favoring one viewpoint over another—for example, that teenagers should “Just Say No” to drugs—when it engages in public communication campaigns. In the democratic system, the electorate ultimately has the power to hold the government accountable for what it says.

In spreading its views, however, the government is prohibited by the First Amendment from forcing private citizens to espouse governmental messages against their will. For example, in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), the Supreme Court held that school children could not be compelled to salute the flag and recite the pledge of allegiance, stating that the Bill of Rights denies government the power to coerce consent for its policies. Similarly, in Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977), the Court struck down a New Hampshire law requiring automobile license plates to display the state motto, “Live Free or Die.” Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Warren Burger stressed that the state could not require its citizens to act as “mobile billboards” for official ideological positions: “A system which secures the right to proselytize religious, political, and ideological causes must also guarantee the concomitant right to decline to foster such concepts.”

In practice, these rules are not always easy to apply. The distinction between what constitutes government, as opposed to private, speech can be difficult to draw in a number of contexts. In states that have specialty or vanity license plate programs, for example, could a driver force the state to issue plates containing words or emblems to which the state objects? If the plates are government speech, the state is entitled to control the message displayed there. If the message on the plates is private speech, the government may not prohibit it just because it expresses an “offensive” viewpoint. Courts that have considered the question have reached conflicting answers; however, commentators tend to conclude the plates should be considered private speech.

Troublesome questions regarding the nature of government speech also arise in the government subsidy context. Sometimes, as part of a government benefit package such as government grants for art or the provision of medical services for the poor, the state attempts to restrict private speech. When the government pays for programs that include expressive activities by private speakers, is the resulting expression “government speech” that can be restricted without reference to the First Amendment?

In Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991), the Supreme Court upheld government regulations that forbid doctors at federally funded family planning clinics from discussing abortion as an option with pregnant women. In an opinion written by Chief Justice Rehnquist, the Court concluded that the regulations did not violate the doctors’ First Amendment rights because “when the government appropriates public funds to establish a program it is entitled to define the limits of that program.”

Ten years later, however, the Court in Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001), invalidated on First Amendment grounds a similar program that prevented federally funded legal aid attorneys from representing clients who sought to challenge existing welfare laws. In striking down the restrictions, the Court distinguished Rust as a case involving government speech. According to the Court, the Title X doctors in Rust had been employed to transmit government information, whereas the legal aid program at issue in Velazquez “was designed to facilitate private speech, not to promote a governmental message.” The Court reiterated that the state may discriminate by viewpoint when funding its own speech, but must allocate subsidies in a viewpoint-neutral manner when private speech is at issue.

The government may constrain the speech of public employees or agents without violating the First Amendment as long as the restricted expression pertains to the employment rather than to general matters of public concern. For example, the Supreme Court held in Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968), that a public school teacher could not be fired for writing a letter to the editor criticizing the school board. The Court noted that the letter addressed an important public policy matter and did not interfere with the teacher’s ability to fulfill his contractual duties.

However, in Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983), the Supreme Court upheld the dismissal of an assistant district attorney for circulating a questionnaire about workplace issues. The Court concluded that the public employee’s survey regarding job-related grievances did not rise to the level of a public controversy and, in fact, could reasonably be expected to disrupt the workplace. In his opinion for the Court, Justice White noted that “[w]hen employee expression cannot be fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community, government officials should enjoy wide latitude in managing their offices without intrusive oversight by the judiciary in the name of the First Amendment.”

Although government expression is essential for the operation of democratic processes, First Amendment scholars have also recognized that government speech presents certain dangers to our system. Specifically, it is feared that government today is so powerful and ubiquitous that its speech might easily drown out private speakers or otherwise distort the marketplace of ideas. Some scholars, therefore, have concluded that the First Amendment should not only safeguard private speech from government censorship, but also protect democratic decision-making from manipulative or over-reaching government communications. The Supreme Court, however, suggested in Board of Regents of the University of Wisconsin System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217 (2000), that no First Amendment challenge could be brought against speech by the government. Rather, the Court said that the citizenry could elect new officials who would “espouse some different or contrary position.”

NICOLE B. CÁSAREZ

References and Further Reading

- Bezanson, Randall P., and William G. Buss, The Many Faces of Government Speech, Iowa Law Review 86 (2001): 1377–1511.
- Herald, Maybeth, Licensed to Speak: The Case of Vanity Plates, University of Colorado Law Review 72 (2001): 595–660.
- Jacobs, Leslie Gielow, Who’s Talking? Disentangling Government and Private Speech, University of Michigan Journal of Law Review 36 (2002): 35–113.
- Yudof, Mark G. When Government Speaks: Politics, Law, and Government Expression in America. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1983.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Regents of the University of Wisconsin v. Southworth*, 529 U.S. 217 (2000)
- Connick v. Myers*, 461 U.S. 138 (1983)
- Legal Services Corporation v. Velzaquez*, 531 U.S. 533 (2001)
- Pickering v. Board of Education*, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
- Rust v. Sullivan*, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
- West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette*, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)
- Wooley v. Maynard*, 430 U.S. 705 (1977)

See also Flag Salute Cases; Forced Speech; Government Funding of Speech; Pledge of Allegiance and the First Amendment; Speech of Government Employees

GRAHAM v. COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)

The Church of Scientology holds sessions for participants to better understand their spiritual being; it charges mandatory and fixed prices (which vary according to length and sophistication of the content) for these “auditing” sessions. Free sessions are not allowed by the church, and participants receive receipts and vouchers indicating uncompleted sessions. Katherine Graham et al. brought the case before the Court to question whether fees for “auditing sessions” can be considered charitable contributions to the church and thus deductible according to the Internal Revenue Code.

The commissioner of internal revenue ruled that these fees did not constitute charitable contributions. Subsequent rulings in tax court and the court of appeals affirmed this decision. Writing for a majority of the Court, Justice Marshall affirmed the decision of prior courts. The payments in question are not considered charitable contributions because they are payments for services rendered by the church. Participants were not contributing of their free will, but as compensation for a specific service. “Congress intended to differentiate between unrequited payments to qualified recipients, which are deductible, and payments made to such recipients with some expectation of quid pro quo in terms of goods or services, which are not deductible,” concluded Justice Marshall. The payments to the Church of Scientology were thus not deductible and the taxation of such income paid out to the church was not a violation of the free exercise clause.

JOHN GREGORY PALMER

References and Further Reading

- Dejong v. Commissioner*, 36 T.C. 575 (1961).
- United States v. Lee*, 455 U.S. 252.

GRAND JURY

A grand jury is a panel of citizens selected to represent the community in performing an inquisitorial function, as distinguished from a trial, or petit, jury that renders a verdict in a dispositive trial. Traditionally, a grand jury has consisted of twenty-three persons. Twelve of these people are required to return a finding, called a presentment; sometimes, a specialized form of presentment called an indictment is returned. This is a finding, in response to a petition for a bill of indictment, that there is sufficient evidence against an accused criminal to authorize the complainant to prosecute him or her in a trial.

The qualifiers “grand” and “petit” refer to the size of the panel and mean “large” and “small,” respectively. In early English legal practice, the inquisitorial and veridical functions were combined, and trial juries commonly investigated the facts before reaching a conclusion. However, it became apparent that the process of investigation could lead to biased judgment, so the two functions became divided between two different kinds of juries.

Traditionally, grand juries, like trial juries, have been regarded as independent bodies, not accountable to anyone for how they reach their findings. A grand jury could investigate anything it chose and had total discretion in what it found and reported. It had the power to subpoena witnesses and evidence. It also had the power to decide who could be present during its deliberations and to keep those deliberations secret until it decided to report its findings.

However, would-be prosecutors, especially those who were already public officials, often felt that it was inconvenient to get an indictment from a grand jury and argued for merely filing an information with a court, allowing the judge to decide whether the evidence was sufficient. However, in the eighteenth century the practice of using the information to bypass the grand jury was used in various criminal prosecutions of a political character, mainly against dissidents and reformers, sometimes called “Whigs.” Because the American colonies were dominated by Whig views, this resulted in the demand for grand juries to screen criminal cases, and this demand became embedded in the Fifth Amendment: “No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury.”

However, California removed the requirement for a grand jury in criminal cases. In the first major decision in which a right recognized in the U.S. Constitution was excepted from incorporation, California’s position was sustained by the U.S. Supreme Court, in Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884), as not incorporated by the Fourteenth Amendment as a protected right against a state. Other states have continued the requirement, often in their state constitutions.

Originally, most criminal prosecutions in the United States were done by private parties—usually, lawyers hired for the case by the victims or their families, by law enforcement officials, or through public subscription—or who volunteered to serve pro bono. By the late nineteenth century, however, these were largely displaced by the advent of professional public prosecutors who were full-time, paid public officials, usually elected. Crime had been fairly rare in the early Republic, but as it became more common, private criminal prosecution became perceived as unequal to the caseload and lacking in the ability to gather the resources needed. Paying private lawyers to prosecute cases from public funds was also sometimes abused as a form of patronage.

The populations of counties eventually grew from the small sizes (typically less than three thousand persons) of the founding era, when crime was very rare by modern standards, to populous urban or suburban settlements, with higher crime rates. However, the legal system did not respond to the greater need by establishing grand juries for smaller jurisdictions, like wards or precincts, but continued to load county grand juries with more and more cases. Today, an urban grand jury may have only ten minutes for each case presented to it.

There has also been a trend toward the loss of independence of grand juries and domination of them by professional prosecutors, some of whom boast they can “indict a ham sandwich.” Grand juries have been isolated from the public they serve; in the view of many, they have been used abusively (especially against political dissidents) to interrogate witnesses without some of the protections they have in a trial.

Occasionally, members of a grand jury will resist manipulation by professional prosecutors and choose their own targets for investigation, even prosecutors or judges. These are called “runaway” grand juries, and some of their presentments are worthy of study.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- Edwards, George J. The Grand Jury. 1906, http://www.constitution.org/gje/gj_00.htm.
- Roots, Roger, If It's Not a Runaway, It's Not a Real Grand Jury, Creighton Law Review 33 (1999–2000): 4:821, <http://www.constitution.org/lrev/roots/runaway.htm>.
- Tooke, John Horne. Address on Libels, Case of John Horne (1777) (criticism of indictment by information, rather than by grand jury; may have contributed to requirement for grand juries in Fifth Amendment). <http://www.constitution.org/jury/cmt/tooke1777/tooke1777.htm>.

GRAND JURY IN COLONIAL AMERICA

A cornerstone of American democracy is the right to a jury composed of one’s peers. Grand juries are an integral part of the modern American legal system because their primary function is to review the prosecutor’s evidence to determine whether probable cause exists for an indictment. Grand juries originated as accusatory bodies in early Greece. In Britain, the use of grand juries dates back to the tenth century, when twelve men from each village were assembled to reveal names of suspected criminals.

Massachusetts was the first British colony to use grand juries (in 1635) to consider cases of murder, robbery, and spousal abuse. In 1683, New York permitted the use of grand juries with the passage of the Charter of Liberties and Privileges. By 1700, grand juries were used to express disdain for the British government. In 1735, for example, New York's colonial governor demanded the indictment of newspaper editor John Zenger for libel because he criticized the king. The grand jury refused. In 1765, a grand jury refused to indict leaders of the Stamp Act Rebellion and to bring libel charges against the Boston Gazette's editors. Furthermore, a Philadelphia grand jury in 1770 agreed to join other colonies in opposing British taxes. When war finally broke out, grand juries returned treason indictments against colonists who sided with the British and disqualified Crown sympathizers from serving on grand juries. At war's end, the grand jury was such an indispensable part of American government that the right to such was included in the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Costello v. United States*, 350 U.S. 359, 362 (1956).
 Finkelman, Paul, Kermit Hall, and James Ely, eds. Law in the Morning of America: The Beginnings of American Law, to 1760. American Legal History: Cases and Materials, 3rd ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
 Greene, Evarts Boutell. Provincial America, 1690–1740. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1905.
 Hamilton, Alexander, John Jay, James Madison, Charles R. Kessler, and Clinton Rossiter, eds. The Federalist Papers, Number 83. New York: Signet Classics, 2003.
 Kadish, Mark, Behind the Locked Door of an American Grand Jury: Its History, Its Secrecy, and Its Process, Florida State University Law Review 24(1) (Fall 1996).
 Morse, Wayne, A Survey of the Grand Jury System, Oregon Law Review 10 (1931).
 Tucker, St. George, and William Blackstone. Blackstone's Commentaries: With Notes of Reference to the Constitution and Laws of the Federal Government of the United States and of the Commonwealth of Virginia, reprint ed. Clark, N.J.: Lawbook Exchange, 1996.

GRAND JURY INDICTMENT (V)

The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution provides that “[n]o person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury . . .” Before any person can be “indicted” for a federal felony offense, Rule 7 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure requires that a grand jury be convened to investigate and decide whether to go forward with the case. For misdemeanor offenses, this has been interpreted to allow charges to be pursued without the convening of a grand jury. In addition, the U.S. Supreme Court has held that the requirement to have a grand jury prior to a felony indictment does not apply to charges brought within the state criminal justice courts. As such, fewer than half of the states in the United States employ the use of a grand jury and have replaced them with the preliminary hearing at which a judge hears evidence concerning the alleged offenses and makes a decision on whether the prosecution can proceed.

Often referred to as the “fourth branch” of the federal government, the grand jury is one of the most valuable devices in a federal investigation. It not only assists in obtaining otherwise inaccessible evidence such as documents, handwriting samples, DNA, and voice exemplars, but a grand jury can also secure a witness's testimony on the record and subject to perjury that may otherwise corroborate and serve as key evidence in a criminal investigation. It is also available only for the prosecution, thus ensuring the sanctity of the grand jury by not providing a defendant easy access or automatic right to grand jury materials. In addition, what may start as an investigation into one matter may lead into directions never envisioned and encompass new individuals to be targeted under a completely separate and different nature of allegations.

With its roots traced back to Frankish lineage, the grand jury concept was introduced into England after the conquests and the Assize of Clarendon recognized what was to become a forerunner of the modern grand jury of American jurisprudence. The Assize of Clarendon enacted that inquiry be made in each county and in each 100 by 12 lawful men of the 100 and 4 lawful men of every township, who are sworn to say truly whether in their 100 or township there is any man accused of being or notorious as a robber or a murderer or a thief or anybody who harbors of robbers or murderers or thieves since the King began to reign and this let the justices and the sheriffs inquire, each officer before himself.

The English Crown originally devised the grand jury to augment royal authority, as well as defend the citizens against prosecutions thought to be malicious and oppressive. Basically, the purpose of the English grand jury was to provide a fair method for instituting criminal proceedings against persons believed to have committed crimes. However, as a note of interest, England abolished its use of the grand jury in 1933 and now uses a committal procedure, as does Australia.

With the foundation of the grand jury dating back nearly 900 years, the U.S. Supreme Court stated in Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 541 (1956), that the original purpose of the grand jury, by acting as an independent body, was to act as a safeguard against unjustified prosecutions by scrutinizing evidence, determining probable cause, and protecting citizens from otherwise overzealous allegations. Mirroring its prior opinions, the Supreme Court in United States v. Dionisio,

410 U.S. 1 (1973), emphasized the grand jury's "historic role as a protective bulwark standing solidly between the ordinary citizen and an overzealous prosecutor . . . [and for it to] even approach the proper performance of its constitution mission . . . it must be free to pursue its investigations unhindered by external influence or supervision."

As prescribed by Section 1783(a) of title 28 of the U.S. Code, the grand jury differs from the "petit" (trial) jury in that it is composed of twenty-three voting members, with sixteen to constitute a quorum, and twelve votes favoring to return a "true bill" indictment to charge an individual with a crime. The Supreme Court has also described the duties of the grand jury in United States v. Sells Engineering, Inc. to have the "dual function of determining if probable cause exists to believe that the crime has been committed and of protecting the citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions." To carry out this dual function, the grand jury has the authority to subpoena witnesses to testify and to produce physical and documentary evidence.

While most law enforcement agents work for a particular agency and/or in conjunction with a prosecutor, that agent actually acts on behalf of the grand jury in not only initiating the investigation, but also securing the witnesses and documents that build the case. Furthermore, a grand jury is designed to act independently and without the constraints of "technical, procedural and evidentiary rules governing the conduct of criminal trials" and may initiate an investigation on mere "suspicion," without a showing of probable cause. Unlike law enforcement personnel, a federal grand jury may freely use investigative techniques without any "preliminary showing of reasonableness" to justify the exercise of their powers to investigate any person without probable cause or reasonable suspicion.

The cornerstone of the federal grand jury is that everything in the proceedings takes place beneath a "veil of secrecy." The secrecy serves public as well as private interests and is codified by Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Everything from the subject of the investigation, who testified, what was said, what documents were subpoenaed to the identities of the grand jurors is considered secret. Only in rare circumstances and with a court order can the information from the grand jury be disclosed to outside parties.

The only individuals allowed in the grand jury are the attorneys for the government (serving as legal advisors), witnesses under examination, interpreters, stenographers, and the grand jurors. The investigating case agent, like a witness's attorney, cannot be present along with a witness or sit with the prosecutor as he or she might during the actual trial. While states are not required to use a grand jury in charging a defendant, some state jurisdictions that do may vary from these federal procedures and allow for attorney representation within the grand jury room. Nongovernmental witnesses who appear before the federal grand jury, however, are free to discuss their testimony with anyone as evidenced during the Clinton/Whitewater investigation.

Different types of witnesses are called to appear before a grand jury. Some may be considered "targets" of the investigation, and some may be mere testimonial whose involvement is limited to their conduct within the scope of the grand jury's investigation. A "target" is a person for whom the grand jury has evidence linking him or her to the commission of a crime and is a potential defendant. Of significance with the federal grand jury is that witnesses have no legal right to be informed whether they a subject or target of the investigation; to be reminded of the right against self-incrimination or the right to counsel, or even to be told that the conduct in question is being investigated for possible violations of federal criminal law.

It is important to note that corporations do not have a Fifth Amendment privilege. Accordingly, records generated by corporations are not shielded by the privilege against self-incrimination, and neither a corporation nor its employees may avoid a grand jury subpoena for documents by asserting that the records may expose the corporation to criminal liability. In Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99 (1998), the Court held that there is no Fifth Amendment privilege against the production of corporation records by a corporate representative, reasoning that corporations are artificial entities and can only operate through their agents and representatives. Courts have also found that the act of compelling the corporate custodian to identify documents produced does not violate the Fifth Amendment privilege. However, in United States v. Hubbell, 53 U.S. 27 (2000), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the mere act of producing documents under a grand jury subpoena could result in self-incrimination in certain circumstances.

If any witness refuses to testify, the prosecutor may seek a motion to compel from a judge, but must first obtain a grant of "transactional immunity" for the grand jury witness pursuant to Section 6003 of Title 18 of the United States Code. Once the prosecutor receives an order compelling a witness to testify, the witness is brought back before the grand jury and asked whether, despite the immunity order, he or she still refuses to answer questions. A witness's failure to comply can subject the witness to contempt charges by the court. Generally, there are two forms of contempt: civil and criminal. Under civil contempt, a witness may be incarcerated for the life of the grand jury, but in no event any longer than six months, and the witness can purge the civil contempt by complying with the order. Under criminal contempt, a witness subject to contempt is punishable by fine or imprisonment (but not both). Unlike the civil contempt witness, a witness charged with criminal contempt cannot purge the contempt charge by subsequently agreeing to testify, and a federal court may impose a sentence of up to six months pursuant to Section 402 of Title 18 of the United States Code.

The ability to gather evidence through issuance of subpoenas is a central function of the federal grand jury. This process is rarely decided by the grand jury, but rather is directed and guided by its legal advisor—usually the prosecutor. These subpoenas are not limited to the jurisdiction from which they arose and have a nationwide service of process pursuant to Rule 17 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. A grand jury may issue dozens if not hundreds of subpoenas in investigations that range from complex white-collar to simple felon-in-possession cases. There are two basic types of subpoenas: the subpoena ad testificandum (to require witness testimony) and the subpoena duces tecum (issued for documents or other physical evidence).

Despite the vast scope of the grand jury's power, it is not without its limits. It is inappropriate to issue a grand jury subpoena for the purpose of gathering evidence for a civil case, preparing for trial, harassing or intimidating the recipient of the subpoena, investigating cases not in that venue, or compelling a witness's appearance at a federal prosecutor's office for the sole purpose of conducting an interview.

As evidenced during the Whitewater investigation during the Clinton presidency, any investigation may start in one area and expand into a completely different allegation. The ability of law enforcement to investigate a case thoroughly derives from a wide variety of resources. Field interviews, running background checks on suspects, calling on reliable sources and informants, and, of course, a seasoned law enforcement officer's instincts are all tools that help build a successful case. During any given case, the government may conduct long-term investigations in multiple ways: covert operations, search warrants, "crunching data," and the powerful tool of the grand jury. While it is often said that a grand jury could "indict a ham sandwich," another much quoted statement from the federal district court case, In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 4 F. Supp. 283, 284 (E.D. Pa. 1933), arguably summed it up best in recognizing that the grand jury is "an engine of discovery against organized and far reaching crime, it has no counterpart."

ROBERT DON GIFFORD

References and Further Reading

- Brown, J. Robert, The Witness and Grand Jury Secrecy, American Journal of Criminal Law 11 (1983): 170.
Helmholz, Richard H., The Early History of the Grand Jury and Canon Law, Chicago Law Review 50 (1983): 613.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Costello v. United States*, 350 U.S. 541 (1956)
In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 4 F. Supp. 283, 284 (E.D. Pa. 1933)
United States v. Braswell, 487 U.S. 99 (1998)
United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973)
United States v. Hubbell, 53 U.S. 27 (2000)
United States v. Sells Eng'g., Inc., 463 U.S. 418 (1983)
Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(e)
Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 7
Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 17
18 U.S.C. § 402
18 U.S.C. § 6003
28 U.S.C. § 1783(a)

GRAND JURY INVESTIGATION AND INDICTMENT

Grand juries, comprising sixteen to twenty-three citizens serving for extended periods of time, wield tremendous investigative power and determine whether a criminal accusation called an "indictment" is warranted because there exists probable cause to believe that an individual has engaged in criminal conduct. The grand jury, with its roots in ancient civilizations, came to the American colonies with the English common law. The right to grand jury indictment in serious federal criminal prosecutions later was enshrined in the Bill of Rights, in the Fifth Amendment. Although the Supreme Court declared in the 1884 case of Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884), that the Constitution does not require states to use grand jury indictment to institute criminal proceedings, a number of states make grand jury indictment mandatory for serious crimes.

The grand jury has nearly boundless power of investigation. This investigative prerogative extends not only to testimony and documents, but also to physical evidence. There are two types of grand jury subpoenas: subpoenas duces tecum, which seek documents and other tangible items, and subpoenas ad testificandum, which seek testimony from specified witnesses before the grand jury at a certain date and time. Although subpoenas duces tecum generally command the evidence to be brought to the grand jury at a specified date and time, compliance with such a subpoena is often satisfied more informally, with materials delivered to the office of the prosecutor. The issuance of subpoenas is ostensibly the province of the grand jurors, although decisions regarding whether, when, and to whom to issue grand jury subpoenas typically are made solely by the prosecutor presenting evidence to the grand jury.

Constraints on the subpoena power are found in certain constitutional, statutory, and common-law privileges. One important constitutional privilege is the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination, which forbids compulsion of statements tending to incriminate the witness. A grand jury witness asserting the privilege against self-incrimination may be compelled to testify once granted immunity. Failure to testify after a grant of immunity gives rise to contempt and possible incarceration. Although prosecutors may institute self-imposed constraints on subpoenaing members of the news media, the Supreme Court has not recognized a news-gathering privilege under the First Amendment. Indeed, in a number of high-profile grand jury investigations, reporters have been jailed after refusing to testify regarding sources.

In addition to constitutional privilege, certain common law evidentiary privileges, such as the marital privilege, shield against the grand jury subpoena power. Perhaps the most well-known common law privilege is the attorney-client privilege, which protects confidential communications made by the client to the attorney for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. The privilege is controlled by the client and may extend to communications with those who aid the attorney in the provision of legal advice, such as forensic accountants. The attorney-client privilege may be pierced and disclosure of such confidential communications may be compelled if the communications were made in furtherance of criminal or fraudulent activity.

Generally, there is no right to counsel for witnesses testifying before the grand jury, although witnesses are afforded ready access to counsel sitting outside the grand jury room. Grand jury witnesses, who testify under oath and on the record, typically are warned about the consequences of making untruthful statements before the grand jury, including possible prosecution for perjury or obstruction of justice. There is no double jeopardy bar to successive attempts to indict an individual, although prosecutors often follow self-imposed constraints.

Grand juries typically operate in secrecy. Federal grand juries, for instance, are subject to stringent rules that restrict prosecutors, law enforcement officials, court employees, and the grand jurors from disclosing matters that took place before the grand jury. Witnesses, however, may speak freely about their testimony. Even once indicted, defendants are not given access to grand jury transcripts unless such access is compelled by statute or constitutional mandate. Those government attorneys and members of law enforcement with access to grand jury materials, including testimony transcripts, documents, and physical objects, must take particular care when handling such materials and generally must obtain a court order to share the materials even with other government employees working on the case.

So strict are the secrecy rules that criminal government attorneys may not share grand jury materials with civil government attorneys investigating the same conduct unless a showing of particularized need prompts a court order. Grand jury secrecy has a number of rationales, including safety of witnesses, protection of grand juror identities, preserving the integrity and effectiveness of the criminal investigation, preventing flight of witnesses or putative defendants, and, most importantly, protection of the reputation of individuals who may be investigated but ultimately not indicted.

At an appropriate time, the prosecutor may ask the grand jury to return an indictment against a target of the investigation. Indictments serve a number of functions. First, the indictment provides the defendant with notice of the charges against him or her. The indictment also informs the court of the charges so that it may assess the legal sufficiency of the evidence and protect the defendant against successive prosecution in violation of the double jeopardy clause. Furthermore, the indictment demonstrates that a grand jury of the defendant's peers screened the charges being brought and determined that there is probable cause to believe that criminal conduct occurred and that prosecution is warranted.

The grand jury has been described as a "shield," in that it serves as protection for the criminal defendant against the power of the state, and as a "sword," in that it is a potent investigatory tool used for the discovery of criminal wrongdoing. Grand juries performed both of these functions, from the colonies' resistance to the Crown in the eighteenth century to the investigation of alleged corporate and political misconduct in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. Despite calls for reform and even abolition of grand juries by some who question their continued usefulness, grand juries continue to play the role of guardian of individual rights and effective instrument for the investigation of crime.

ROGER A. FAIRFAX, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Branzburg v. Hayes*, 408 U.S. 665 (1972).
 Edwards, George J., Jr. The Grand Jury. New York: AMS Press, 1906.

United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36 (1992).
 Younger, Richard D. The People's Panel: The Grand Jury in the United States, 1634–1941. 1963.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)

GRANT'S GENERAL ORDER #11 (1862) (EXPELLING JEWS)

In December 1862, in the midst of the Civil War, General Ulysses S. Grant issued an order expelling all Jews from Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi because, as the document claimed, "The Jews as a class violat[e] every regulation of trade established by the Treasury Department and also [War] Department orders." Local commanders were to furnish passes for Jews to cross military lines solely for the purpose of leaving the department of the Tennessee, the military district under Grant's command, and anyone returning would be arrested and confined to prison. No passes were to be given them for the purpose of visiting headquarters in an effort to secure trade permits.

Grant had responded to the thriving black market in southern cotton. Although at war, northern mills needed southern cotton, and President Lincoln had allowed limited trade to satisfy some of the demands of the mills, in part to furnish uniforms and other textiles to the Union Army. Technically, one needed a license to engage in this trade, but in fact many people ran the borders, since the price of cotton had soared.

Some of these unlawful traders were indeed Jews, but not all Jews were engaged in the trade, and the vast majority of illegal traders were non-Jews. People like Grant, General Henry Halleck and others, however, used the term "Jew," "profiteer," and "speculator" interchangeably. Grant described the Jews as "an intolerable nuisance," and no doubt his anti-Semitism reflected that of many other people in the army and the government.

Although army officers began to carry out Grant's order, a group of Paducah, Kentucky, Jewish merchants, led by Cesar Kaskel, sent an indignant telegram to Abraham Lincoln, condemning Order No. 11 as an "enormous outrage on all laws and humanity, . . . the grossest violation of the Constitution and our rights as good citizens under it." Jewish leaders organized protest rallies in other cities and sent dozens of telegrams to the White House.

Kaskel arrived in Washington on January 3, 1863—two days after the Emancipation Proclamation went into effect—and, along with influential Jewish businessman and the Cincinnati Congressman John A. Gurley, went to the White House to see the president. Lincoln immediately ordered Halleck, the commanding general of the Union army, to have Grant revoke Order No. 11. As the president told another delegation of Jews that arrived three days later, Grant had been wrong to issue the order and he believed that "to condemn a class is, to say the least, to wrong the good with the bad."

Grant later proved a friend to Jews, won much of their vote in his presidential campaigns, and named several Jews to high office. But his Order No. 11 remains the sole example of blatantly anti-Semitic action by the government of the United States.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Ash, Stephen V. "Civil War Exodus: The Jews and Grant's General Order No. 11." The Historian 44 (1982): 502–523.

GREEN v. GEORGIA, 442 U.S. 95 (1979)

This case examines the applicability of rules of evidence when possibly contrary to due process. Green and Carzell Moore were indicted for the rape and murder of Teresa Carol Allen. During Moore's trial, a witness was brought in to testify that Moore told him Green was not present during the murder. Green wished to present the evidence at trial. The state rejected the evidence, citing Georgia Code § 38-301 (1978), which allows for hearsay for declarations against pecuniary interest, but not for declarations against penal interest.

The decision of the Court was delivered per curiam. The Court reasoned that the testimony should be allowed. Though it might not fall within the Georgian rules of evidence, the testimony was highly relevant and its exclusion constituted a violation of due process. There was ample reason to trust the testimony—it had been made to a friend, there was corroborating evidence, the statement was against interest, and, most importantly, the state found the evidence trustworthy enough to be used in Moore's trial. Rules of evidence must not be used to frustrate justice.

This case continues to be an example of when evidentiary errors may be redressed by the due process clause, though courts have limited the effects of this case on evidentiary rules by distinguishing the fact patterns.

MICHELE L. HILL

GREGG v. GEORGIA, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)

Gregg v. Georgia resolved the confusion surrounding the Court's decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), by holding that capital punishment was not unconstitutional per se. A jury convicted Gregg on two counts of armed robbery and two counts of murder and sentenced him to death on all counts. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the death sentences for murder, but vacated the sentences for armed robbery because the death penalty was rarely imposed for that crime in the state.

After reviewing the history of acceptance of capital punishment and the then-current support for the sanction in the United States, Justice Stewart declared that the death penalty for murder was consistent with the dignity of man, a basic concept underlying the Eighth Amendment. Justice Stewart, while adopting a posture of deference to the legislature, stated that the death penalty could serve the social purposes of retribution and deterrence and was not a disproportionate punishment for the crime of murder.

Turning to the particulars of the case, Justice Stewart focused on the statutory scheme Georgia employed to impose death sentences. Generally speaking, Georgia's death penalty statute required a capital jury to balance statutory aggravating and mitigating factors in choosing between punishments. Justice Stewart said that by focusing the jury's attention on the circumstances of the crime and the criminal, Georgia had sufficiently eliminated the risk of an arbitrary and capricious sentence.

The outcome in Gregg settled the debate over the constitutionality of the death penalty per se and the plurality's approval of Georgia's death penalty statute provided a blueprint for other states to follow.

EARL F. MARTIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment Reversed

GRIFFIN v. CALIFORNIA, 380 U.S. 609 (1965)

There is a long-standing tradition in constitutional law that the government may not punish a person for exercising his constitutional rights. However, many states allowed jurors to draw adverse inferences from the accused's failure to testify at trial. In Griffin v. California, the Supreme Court considered whether this practice was consistent with the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments.

In Griffin, the trial court told the jury that if it determined that the defendant likely knew certain case facts, but did not take the witness stand to explain those facts, the jury could draw an adverse inference from his silence. During closing argument, the prosecutor argued to the jury that since the defendant did not testify, the jury should infer that he had something to hide.

Justice Douglas wrote for a six-to-two Court majority that the practice was "a penalty imposed by courts for exercising a constitutional privilege." Thus, the practice was unconstitutional. Justice Douglas wisely recognized that jurors might still infer that a defendant without something to hide would testify. But the Court's concern was what the jury "may infer when the court solemnizes the silence of the accused into evidence against him."

Later, the Court held that trial courts, if counsel requests, must instruct the jury to disregard the defendant's silence—that is, not to infer any facts the silence (Carter v. Kentucky). The Court also held that the sentencing court may not consider the defendant's silence when sentencing the defendant (Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314, 1999). These practices ensure that no citizen is punished for asserting his constitutional rights.

MICHAEL C. CERNOVICH

References and Further Reading

LaFare, Wayne R. et al. Criminal Procedure, 3rd ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000, Section 24.5.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Carter v. Kentucky

Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965)

Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314 (1999)

See also Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background; Warren Court

GRIFFIN v. ILLINOIS, 351 U.S. 12 (1956)

In Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), the Court addressed the question of whether a state may, under the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, deny a means of effective review on appeal to defendants who cannot afford the cost while granting it to those who can. The problem arose because, under Illinois law, all defendants who wanted to appeal their convictions were required to purchase the stenographic transcript of the lower court proceedings. Aside from indigent defendants sentenced to death, all defendants needing a transcript were required to buy it themselves.

In Griffin, the defendants had been convicted of armed robbery and filed a motion in the court asking that a certified copy of the record be given to them at state expense. They were too poor to buy it and it was required for them to get an appeals court to review their convictions. The court refused to order that the record be produced at state expense. The defendants appealed, contending that the failure to provide them with a transcript deprived them of due process and equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. The Illinois appeals courts upheld the denial. However, the U.S. Supreme Court agreed with the defendants.

In reaching its decision, the Court first looked at history and noted that, since the Magna Carta in 1215, courts have sought to guarantee equal application of the criminal law. It emphasized the importance of the concept of equal treatment to the U.S. system, explaining that “equal protection and due process emphasize the central aim of our entire judicial system—all people charged with crime must, so far as the law is concerned, ‘stand on an equality before the bar of justice in every American court’” (Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, 241). Accordingly, the Court explained, “a state can no more discriminate on account of poverty than on account of religion, race, or color.” Thus, although a state need not provide for review on appeal at all, a state that does allow for appeals cannot do so in a way that discriminates on the basis of poverty.

As the Court pointed out, all states provide some method of appeal from criminal convictions, and statistics show that a “substantial proportion” of state criminal convictions are reversed. Accordingly, the Court recognized that “to deny adequate review to the poor means that many of them may lose their life, liberty or property because of unjust convictions which appellate courts would set aside.” In a well-known phrase, the Court held that “There can be no equal justice where the kind of trial a man gets depends on the amount of money he has.”

In a separate opinion, Justice Frankfurter concurred. He warned, however, to pay attention to the “admonition of de Tocqueville not to confuse the familiar with the necessary.” As Justice Frankfurter pointed out, the right to appeal has never been held to be a fundamental right that must be afforded by the state courts. In fact, there were no appeals for the first one hundred years of U.S. history and until 1907 in England. Agreeing that discrimination based on poverty is unconstitutional, Justice Frankfurter stated, “Neither the fact that a State may deny the right to appeal altogether nor the right of a state to make an appropriate classification, based on differences in crimes and their punishment, nor the right of a state to lay down conditions it deems appropriate for criminal appeals, sanctions differentiations by a State that have no relation to the rational policy of criminal appeal or authorizes the imposition of conditions that offend the deepest presuppositions of our society.”

Justices Burton and Minton, joined by Justices Reed and Harlan, dissented. While they did not dispute the “desirability of the policy of supplying an indigent defendant with a free transcript,” they did not agree that the constitution required that the states do this. First, the dissenters held that since due process does not even require an appeal, it could not be a denial of due process to allow for some differences among defendants. As to the equal protection claim, the dissenters would have held that the state could differentiate between its treatment of capital and noncapital defendants. Accordingly, the dissenters explained that a state had no duty to make sure every defendant was economically equal. After all, the Court observed, in reality some defendants can afford better lawyers than others, some can afford better investigations than others, and, of course, some can afford bail and some cannot. The Constitution does not require that the states fix this. The dissenters also disagreed with the majority’s application of its holding to invalidate past state convictions. That is, the dissenters would have held that the Court’s holding was not to be applied retroactively.

Justice Harlan dissented in a separate opinion, adding to the dissenting opinion of Justices Burton and Minton. According to Justice Harlan, this was not a good case to decide the due process and equal protection issues because it was possible under the state system that the defendants could have gotten appellate review by other procedures. Therefore, there was no need for Supreme Court review, and the Court should have left the case alone. On the merits of the issues, however, were they to be decided, Justice Harlan would have held that the state had no obligation to “alleviate the consequences of differences in economic circumstances that exist wholly apart from any state action.” As to the issue of fairness under the Due Process Clause, Justice Harlan believed it was not arbitrary or unfair for the state to refuse to pay for transcripts in noncapital cases. In such cases, review can be adequately provided by other means and the consequences are not as significant as in capital cases.

LISSA GRIFFIN

References and Further Reading

Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956).

See also Due Process; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Right to Counsel

GRIFFIN v. WISCONSIN, 483 U.S. 868 (1987)

Joseph Griffin, a convicted felon, was released from prison into a probation program. The state placed probationers in the legal custody of the Wisconsin Department of Health and Human Services, which monitored their activities and subjected them to regulations and restrictions that normal citizens need not bear. One such regulation allowed probation officers to search the property and residences of probationers without obtaining a warrant. The officer must certify to supervisors that “reasonable grounds” existed to execute a search, but need not meet the standard of “probable cause” normally required by the Fourth Amendment.

Upon receipt of a tip from a police detective that Griffin likely possessed a firearm in his residence, probation officers executed a search and recovered the firearm. The state trial court denied Griffin’s motion to suppress the evidence resulting from the search, and subsequent appeals at the state level affirmed that decision.

Writing for a majority of the Court, Justice Scalia concluded that the warrantless search did not offend the Fourth Amendment. He wrote, “Probation is simply one point . . . on a continuum of possible punishments ranging from solitary confinement in a maximum-security facility to a few hours of mandatory community service.” Though not behind the walls of a prison, Griffin remained in the custody of the state penal system and was thus subject to regulations related to protecting the citizenry from possible adverse behavior. Criminals in the rehabilitation system do not enjoy the same rights and privileges as the general citizenry, and thus Griffin had a reduced expectation of privacy and protection against search.

JOHN GREGORY PALMER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471
New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325
O’Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709
Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573

See also Search (General Definition)

GRISWOLD v. CONNECTICUT, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)

The Planned Parenthood League of Connecticut and Yale University medical and law faculty made three attempts to persuade the Supreme Court to negate the 1879 Connecticut statute that criminalized the giving of advice about and the use of contraceptives to prevent conception. After the state legislature in successive sessions failed to change the policy supported by the Catholic hierarchy, clinics that served patients unable to afford private medical services turned to the third branch. In 1943 (Tileston v. Ullman, 318 U.S. 44, 1943), the Court dismissed the action on the ground that the doctor petitioner had no standing to litigate a patient’s right to medical advice. In 1961 (Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 1961), the Court refused to face the substantive issue for lack of prosecution of violators. Chief Justice Earl Warren agreed to reject the case for a political reason: the race equality decisions of the 1950s had aroused opposition and anger toward the Court that would be intensified if the Court mandated a new liberal national policy toward sex and procreation.

The litigants provided a real controversy in 1965 by arranging for the arrest of the executive and medical directors of the Planned Parenthood clinic as they were giving advice on contraception to married couples. Upon appeal of their conviction and sentence, the Court decided (contrary to Tileston) that the professional relationship gave the petitioners standing to litigate their patients’ constitutional rights. All nine justices recognized that the Connecticut policy was irrational, but two voted in dissent to leave the policy in state hands. On the question of constitutionality, seven justices concluded that the state law infringed on the marital right of privacy. The minimal five signed the Court opinion of Justice Douglas. Only Justice Clark did not separate himself from Justice Douglas’s reasoning.

Diverse Reasoning

Griswold was a case of first impression, although Justice Douglas found support in two 1920s cases that protected family preferences for private schooling and for foreign language training for their children (Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 1923; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 1925). These cases were not entirely apposite since they were decided when substantive due process was a legitimate doctrine and involved family choices for an activity (schooling) that would be performed in a public space. Griswold concerned sexual acts using contraceptives that would be performed in a private space. The justice emphasized this distinction with his poetic invocations of the sacredness of marriage and his apprehension of police searching marital bedrooms.

The focus on procreation brought Griswold closer to Skinner v. Oklahoma, where punishment for repeat offenders of certain offenses included sterilization. In 1942, writing for the Skinner Court, Justice Douglas had characterized the right to have offspring as a basic right, but then sidestepped the issue by using the equal protection clause to negate the penalty. Although equal protection, “the last resort of constitutional arguments,” was also available in the Griswold case facts, the Court faced the substantive issue directly.

The justices provided four different constitutional foundations for the new right to privacy. Justice Douglas tried to avoid the revival of substantive due process by basing his argument on penumbras and emanations from specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights, as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. He recognized a zone of privacy emanating from the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments. The justice also reached outside the Constitution to older rights that he assumed existed in the consciousness of the founders. Justice Goldberg wrote a concurring opinion signed by Justices Warren and Brennan to emphasize that the Constitution protected fundamental personal rights not listed in the Bill of Rights. He relied on the Ninth Amendment as indicator of the existence of other rights rooted in American traditions and institutions.

Two justices, John Harlan II and Byron White, agreed with the majority’s disposition but rejected Douglas’s reasoning and openly revived substantive due process. Justice Harlan used his concurrence in the judgment to continue an old battle with Justice Black over the incorporation doctrine. He argued that incorporation would not guarantee judicial restraint and substantive due process would not unleash judicial power, if the justices respected national history, basic values, and structural doctrines. Although categorized as conservative, Justice Harlan perceived a living and changing Constitution.

Justice White differentiated economic rights from the family rights created in the Meyer and Pierce precedents. His focus here and in Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), on conventional sexual relationships and procreation allowed him in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), to dissent in opposition to abortion and in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), to write for the Court in refusing to decriminalize sodomy. He did not question the legitimacy of Connecticut’s stated purpose of preventing illicit sexual relationships, but pointed out the absence of any rational connection between the purpose and the method. He also emphasized an inequality aspect of the factual situation ignored by other justices: that the statute did not affect persons with knowledge and resources.

Like Justices Harlan and White, Justice Black recognized that the only appropriate constitutional basis for this decision was due process. But he reasoned from the plain words of the Constitution and, like Justice Douglas, maintained an adamant New Deal stand against substantive due process in refusing to distinguish moral from economic regulations. The justice had expressed his fears in 1947 when he predicted that the Court would “roam at large in the broad expanse of policy and morals . . .” (Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 1947, at 90). Justice Stewart in a separate dissent criticized the Connecticut statute as poor social policy but could find no privacy right in the Constitution or in the Court’s precedents. He particularly derided Justice Goldberg’s attempt to introduce the Ninth Amendment into constitutional jurisprudence. His solution to bad law was representative government.

Constitutional meaning is not settled by the flawed reasoning of a single case but emerges from successive cases that address the same conceptual and constitutional problems. The constraints of precedent and history and the Court’s need to satisfy at least five members often result in opinions with imaginary facts, strained judicial reasoning, and faulty doctrines. The justices hold an institutional memory of political problems exacerbated by past precedents and follow old thinking even after the context has changed.

Although the relationship at the Connecticut clinic involved an outsider to the marital couple—the doctor—and the locus was a quasipublic health clinic, the opinions described a fictional situation of sex in the marital bedroom. To meet the expectation of clarity in their opinions, the Court prefers to reduce the number of issues in a case, so it ignored the issues of the doctor’s professional integrity and the patient’s autonomy in order to focus on the marital couple’s privacy. The Griswold opinions adopted the concept of privacy because precedents and legal literature on privacy, but not on autonomy, were available to support their disposition. The Court ignored the fact that the two extant meanings of privacy rights applied to criminal procedure and torts and not to substantive crimes.

Development of Precedent

Griswold was innovative in its use of privacy doctrine to void a criminal law passed under state police power. Its significance lies in its creation of a public policy supportive of personal sexual autonomy that fit the country's changing national culture. After 1965, the Court expanded its new doctrine to invalidate criminal laws that denied personal choice of abortion and sodomy. The unintended consequence of Griswold was to place the Court at the center of national electoral and legislative politics over controversial social issues into the twenty-first century.

Justices are aware of the potential use of their precedents but cannot control their future application. In Poe Justice Harlan had written that "I would not suggest that adultery, homosexuality, fornication, and incest are immune from criminal enquiry, however privately practiced" (@552). In his concurring Griswold opinion Justice Goldberg warned of the doctrine's impact on homosexuality and other sexual offenses. Justice White had tried to head off expansion through his emphasis on family values. Nevertheless, the Court in the 1970s extended the right to buy and use contraceptives from the married couple to adult and minor individuals (Eisenstadt v. Baird; Carey v. Population Services International). The most important direct legacy of Griswold was the 1973 (limited) right to abortion. In Roe the Court abandoned Justice Douglas's penumbras and relied openly on the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause to support a woman's right to choose an abortion.

The Court temporarily halted its expansion of the Griswold doctrine in 1986 in denying the privacy rights of practicing homosexuals (Bowers v. Hardwick). Then, in 2003, the Court overruled Bowers (Lawrence v. Texas, No. 02-102, 2003). Justice Kennedy tied the new decision to Griswold through a factual similarity—the legislative proscription of nonprocreative sex—and through the reasonableness of applying the same doctrine that protects conventional sexual bonding to a different choreography. In Lawrence the Court provided the clarity that was lacking in the reasoning and doctrinal basis of Griswold, revealing again that constitutional meaning is always a work in progress.

The series of cases following Griswold are not the last word on the constitutionality of legislative policy on sex and procreation. Justice White's separate opinion in Griswold focused attention on the purpose of the state in regulating sexual conduct. If the state connected a well-grounded security purpose to its control of reproductive sex (to increase or decrease population), it is possible that a future Court would find a compelling state interest and rework its doctrines on the autonomy of sexual behavior once more.

BEVERLY BLAIR COOK

References and Further Reading

- Baer, Judith A. Women in American Law, 2nd ed. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1996, pp. 195–199.
- Beane, William M., The Constitutional Right to Privacy in the Supreme Court, The Supreme Court Review (1962): 212–251.
- Copelon, Rhonda. "Beyond the Liberal Idea of Privacy: Toward a Positive Right of Autonomy." In Judging the Constitution: Critical Essays on Judicial Lawmaking, Michael W. McCann and Gerald L. Houseman, eds. Glenview, Ill.: Scott, Foresman and Company, 1989, pp. 87–314.
- Ernst, Morris L., and Alan U. Schwartz. Privacy: The Right to Be Let Alone. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1962.
- Henken, Louis, Privacy and Autonomy, Columbia Law Review 74 (1974): 1410–1433.
- Kauper, Paul G., Penumbras, Peripheries, Emanations, Things Fundamental and Things Forgotten: The Griswold Case, Michigan Law Review 64 (1965) 235–258.
- Posner, Richard A., The Uncertain Protection of Privacy by the Supreme Court, The Supreme Court Review (1977): 173–216.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adamson v. California*, 332 U.S. 46 (1947)
- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Eisenstadt v. Baird*, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, No. 02-102 (2003)
- Meyer v. Nebraska*, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
- Olmstead v. U.S.*, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
- Planned Parenthood v. Casey*, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
- Poe v. Ullman*, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Tileston v. Ullman*, 318 U.S. 44 (1943)

GROSJEAN v. AMERICAN PRESS CO., 297 U.S. 233 (1936)

This case examined freedom of press and information. In 1934, Louisiana passed an act that taxed newspapers and others on the gross receipts of any advertisements that they published. The act pertained to businesses that had a circulation of more than twenty thousand copies per week. Nine publishers brought suit against the act. Justice Sutherland delivered the opinion of the Court.

The publishers claimed the act violated the federal Constitution by abridging the freedom of the press. The Court established that because the First Amendment is a fundamental right, it is safeguarded against state action by the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court then discussed the history of “taxes on knowledge,” including different taxes placed on colony newspapers by the English Crown. Such taxes were protested not because of their tax burden, but because of their effect of curtailing the circulation of newspapers. The Court saw that it was clear that the Constitution’s framers were aware that such taxes were not acceptable to the American people and that the First Amendment was meant to protect against prior restraint, including prior restraint through taxation. Newspapers, as an instrument of spreading information crucial to self-governance, need freedom of publication. Taxes against newspapers are certainly permissible, but taxes that are a method of limiting circulation and information are not. This case, with its measurement based on circulation, is clearly suspicious. This tax is not constitutionally legal.

The Court continues to favor freedom of press as a method of supplying information to the voting population.

MICHELE L. HILL

GROUP LIBEL

“Group libel” is a term used in civil defamation law and in criminal libel statutes. In civil defamation suits and criminal libel prosecutions, the group libel concept is often in tension with First Amendment values and principles.

In the civil defamation context, the phrase group libel refers to the problem posed by defamatory statements that do not single out any one individual by name, but rather refer to a group of individuals, such as members of the police force, the law faculty, or Hispanic voters. The general rule is that no valid action for libel or slander (the twin torts that comprise defamation) exists for the publication of a general defamatory statement about a large group or class of persons. This common-law rule is grounded in the rationale that such a general condemnation could not reasonably be construed as targeting each individual member of the group, and the disparagement is too diffuse to create a realistic likelihood of reputational injury to any individual member.

Similarly, under the common law of defamation, mere insults or epithets are not actionable. The rationale is that such insulting language, however crude or indecorous, is endemic to social life, and the law cannot be expected to provide a remedy for all such verbal slights. The common-law view is also buttressed by the notion that the use of such insulting language reflects more poorly on the speaker than the victim of the verbal attack.

This common-law principle is in turn enforced by First Amendment standards that shelter rhetorical hyperbole and the expression of opinion from defamation liability. First Amendment standards established in Supreme Court decisions such as Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767 (1986), and Milkovich v. Loraine Journal, 497 U.S. 1 (1990), require a “false statement of fact” to support a defamation action. Because group slurs will often be expressions of hyperbole or opinion, attempts to predicate civil liability on such group insults will violate the First Amendment.

As an alternative to civil liability as a means of dealing with racial, ethnic, or religious disparagement, some states have, over the years, enacted criminal libel laws aimed at creating criminal sanctions for group libel. In a 1952 decision, Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Illinois criminal group libel statute. The Beauharnais case, however, predated much of modern First Amendment Law. This includes the body of law placing First Amendment limits on civil liability for defamation emanating from New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), and cases that protect racist speech under the First Amendment unless the speech meets the “incitement” standard of cases such as Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), or the “true threat” standard of cases such as Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003).

RODNEY A. SMOLLA

References and Further Reading

Reisman, David, Democracy and Defamation: Control of Group Libel, Columbia Law Review 427 (1942): 72.
Smolla, Rodney. Law of Defamation. New York: Thomson/West, 2005, sections 4:50–4:71.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952)
Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
Milkovich v. Loraine Journal Co., 497 U.S. 1 (1990)
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767 (1986)

GUANTANAMO BAY, ENEMY COMBATANTS, POST 9/11

Since early 2002, the United States military has used the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base on the southeastern coast of Cuba to house prisoners associated with al Qaeda, the Taliban, and related organizations. The detentions began during the conflict in Afghanistan following the September 11, 2001, Al Qaeda attacks on the United States. There are currently approximately 480 detainees at Guantanamo, down from a high of more than 600; the detainees come from over fifty countries. None are U.S. citizens.

The detentions at Guantanamo have been the subject of intense domestic and international criticism. From the beginning critics claimed that the detentions themselves violate international law, including the Geneva Conventions of 1949, a series of treaties providing a broad set of protections for civilians and combatants during armed conflict. Criticism has also focused on claims of physical abuse (including sleep deprivation, isolation, and sexual humiliation), the indefinite nature of the detentions, the detention of minors, attempted suicide by detainees, force feeding of detainees engaged in hunger strikes, and other conditions. The United States maintains that the detentions comply with its obligations under domestic and international law. U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan, a United Nations Committee Against Torture, and the German and British governments have all called for Guantanamo to be closed.

Many lawsuits filed in the United States have challenged the detentions. The Supreme Court has issued an opinion in one, Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004), holding that the U.S. courts have jurisdiction over habeas petitions brought by Guantanamo detainees. The opinion did not resolve the scope of the detainees' rights under domestic or international law; many cases raising these issues are currently pending before the lower courts. In 2004, partially in response to the Rasul opinion, the United States government established Combatant Status Review Tribunals ("CSRTs") at Guantanamo. A CSRT conducts a hearing and reviews the evidence against each detainee to determine whether he is an "enemy combatant." In addition, an administrative review is conducted annually for each prisoner to determine whether further detention is warranted. Prisoners are not entitled to have lawyers, hearsay evidence is considered, and for security reasons detainees are not entitled to hear all of the evidence against them; these and other aspects of the review process have provoked extensive criticism. In early 2006, the United States released for the first time transcripts of the CSRT and administrative review board hearings, as well as the names of all persons currently and formerly detained at Guantanamo. As of May 2006, the United States reports that it has released 192 detainees and transferred 80 detainees to other governments, including Afghanistan, Australia, Bahrain, Belgium, Denmark, France, Great Britain, Kuwait, Morocco, Pakistan, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Spain, Sweden, and Uganda.

Ten of the detainees have been designated by the President to appear before military commissions established at Guantanamo. Charges against them include conspiracy to commit war crimes, murder and terrorism. The military commissions have been challenged in the U.S. courts on the grounds that they violate international law and exceed the President's statutory and constitutional authority. The Bush administration maintains that Congress has authorized the military commissions and that in any event the President, as Commander in Chief, has the power to determine how to try enemy combatants during wartime. The Supreme Court is considering these questions in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, with a decision expected in Summer 2006.

INGRID BRUNK WUERTH

References and Further Reading

- Aldrich, George H., Editorial Comment, the Taliban, Al Qaeda, and the Determination of Illegal Combatants, American Journal of International Law 96 (2002): 891.
- Anderson, Kenneth, What to Do With Bin Laden and Al Qaeda Terrorists: A Qualified Defense of Military Commissions and United States Policy on Detainees at Guantanamo Naval Base, Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 25 (2002): 591.
- Commentary on the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949: III Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War*, Jean S. Pictet et al., eds., 1960.
- "Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhumane or Degrading Treatment or Punishment," 26 Feb. 1996, Sen. Treaty Doc. No. 100-20, 1914 United Nations Treaty Series 519.
- "Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War," 12 August 1949, United States Treaties and Other International Agreements, vol. 6, p. 3316.
- Murphy, Sean D., Contemporary Practice of the United States: Executive Branch Memoranda on Status and Permissible Treatment of Detainees, American Journal of International Law 98 (2004): 820.
- "Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts," 12 Dec. 1977, Arts. 43, 44, 1125 United Nations Treaty Series, p. 3.
- Ratner, Steven R., Notes and Comments: Jus ad Bellum and Jus in Bello After September 11, American Journal of International Law 96 (2002): 905.
- Memorandum from the Deputy Secretary of Defense for the Secretary of the Navy, dated July 7, 2004, Subject: Order Establishing Combatant Status Review Tribunals, available at <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040707review.pdf> (last visited May 22, 2006).
- Presidential Order, Military Order of Nov. 13, 2001, Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism, available at <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2001/11/20011113-27.html> (last visited May 22, 2006).
- United States Department of Defense, Military Commission Instructions, available at http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Aug2004/commissions_instructions.html (last visited May 22, 2006).
- Washington Post, Names of the Detained in Guantanamo Bay Cuba, available at <http://projects.washingtonpost.com/guantanamo/> (last visited May 22, 2006).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004)

GUIDED DISCRETION STATUTES

Guided discretion statutes restrict the otherwise unbounded discretion of judges and juries during non-capital and capital sentencing, respectively. Such statutes come in two forms. First, in determinate sentencing systems such statutes provide a sentencing range within which the sentencing judge is to sentence unless unusual factors are present. Such statutes also outline individualized factors that should guide departures from the prescribed range. The goals of such statutes are to decrease judicial discretion and the resulting disparity and create a more rational sentencing policy. Guided discretion statutes have accomplished these goals, albeit with varying success.

Judicial resistance to guided discretion statutes was most pronounced in the federal system, but declined once the Supreme Court declared the federal sentencing guidelines constitutional. Nevertheless, federal judges continue to resist the complexity of the federal sentencing regime and their limited discretion. Even though guided discretion statutes limit judicial sentencing discretion, disparity continues throughout the system because prosecutorial charging and plea bargaining decisions remain largely unpoliced.

Second, in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), the Supreme Court declared the death penalty, as administered, unconstitutional because of its “wanton[] and . . . freakish[]” imposition. Under the statutes then existing, juries lacked any guidance in deciding whether death should be imposed.

Following the decision, some states enacted guided discretion statutes that mandated the separation of the guilt and punishment phase, required appellate review, and set out specific aggravating and mitigating factors. In Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), and subsequent cases, the Supreme Court upheld different versions of such statutes.

Today virtually all of the states authorizing the death penalty have guided discretion statutes. While such statutes have made the sentencing process fairer and less arbitrary, they have not succeeded in eliminating the impact of extrajudicial factors on sentencing.

NORA V. DEMLEITNER

References and Further Reading

Bowers, William J., The Capital Jury Project: Rationale, Design, and Preview of Early Findings, Indiana Law Journal 70 (1995): 1043.

Parent, Dale. Structuring Criminal Sentencing: The Evolution of Minnesota's Sentencing Guidelines. London: Butterworth Legal Publishers, 1988.

Reitz, Kevin. “Modeling Discretion in American Sentencing Systems.” Law and Policy 20 (1998): 289.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)

Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Sentencing Guidelines

GUILTY BUT MENTALLY ILL

The verdict of “guilty but mentally ill” (GBMI) was developed in Michigan in 1975 in response to dissatisfaction with the insanity defense and has since been adopted by approximately a quarter of the other states. The insanity defense is based on the premise that only individuals who act knowingly and willingly should be held criminally responsible. Thus, a defendant who is acquitted under a “not guilty by reason of insanity” (NGRI) verdict lacks the requisite mens rea to be convicted, even though he or she may have committed the offense. Such insanity acquittees can be civilly confined for as long as they are dangerous, though they are entitled to regular hearings on that issue. When GBMI was first proposed, several high-profile crimes committed by insanity acquittees had increased public fears about the premature release of dangerous individuals from psychiatric facilities and had sapped public confidence in psychiatrists’ ability to predict dangerousness.

A GBMI verdict is a conviction that recognizes the defendant’s mental illness. However, because the defendant is held criminally responsible, a GBMI verdict allows for the incarceration, not just civil commitment, of mentally ill offenders. GBMI offenders can be sentenced to prison and incarcerated for the duration of their sentences, even if they no longer present a danger to others. Defendants convicted upon a GBMI verdict may spend a portion of their sentence in a psychiatric facility and/or receive treatment in a correctional institution. Proponents of GBMI laws believe they reduce the number of unwarranted insanity acquittals and protect the public through the incarceration of dangerous individuals. The GBMI verdict also allows juries to recognize that a defendant’s mental illness may be serious enough to require treatment, but not so serious as to negate criminal responsibility.

A GBMI verdict is only available if the defendant asserts the insanity defense. It does not replace the NGRI verdict, but rather provides an additional option for the jury or, in the case of a plea agreement, an additional option for the defendant. The GBMI verdict, unlike the NGRI verdict, assumes that the individual had the requisite mens rea, despite his or her mental illness. Thus, a GBMI verdict requires a finding that the defendant was mentally ill but not legally insane at the time he or she committed the offense.

Critics contend that the real purpose of GBMI laws is not treatment since mentally ill prisoners are already supposed to receive mental health services and adequate services are nevertheless rarely available. Rather, they are an expansion of criminal responsibility to include the mentally ill. Critics also maintain that the GBMI verdict violates due process since there is no hearing on the defendant's current mental state; violates equal protection because GBMI defendants may be treated less well than regular defendants or insanity acquittees; constitutes cruel and unusual punishment because insane individuals could inaccurately be found GBMI; and effectively eliminates the insanity defense because juries do not understand the difference between a GBMI and NGRI verdict. Courts have been unsympathetic to these arguments.

MIRIAM J. AUKERMAN

References and Further Reading

- Frey, Roger George, The Guilty but Mentally Ill Verdict and Due Process, Yale Law Journal 92 (1983): 475-498.
- LaFond, John Q., and Mary Durham, Cognitive Dissonance: Have Insanity and Civil Commitment Reforms Made a Difference? Villanova Law Review 39 (1994): 92-122.
- Morris, Norval. Madness and the Criminal Law. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.
- Slobogin, Christopher, The Guilty but Mentally Ill Verdict: An Idea Whose Time Should Not Have Come, George Washington Law Review 53 (1985): 494-526.
- Smith, G. A., and J. A. Hall, Evaluating Michigan's Guilty but Mentally Ill Verdict: An Empirical Study, Journal of Law Reform 16 (1982): 75-112.
- Steadman, Henry et al. Before and After Hinckley: Evaluating Insanity Defense Reform. New York: Guilford, 1993.

See also Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII); Due Process; Equal Protection of the Law (XIV); Insanity Defense; Mentally Ill

GUILTY PLEA

A guilty plea is a formal admission of guilt by a criminal defendant. A plea is not simply a confession, but also is a conviction. Individuals who plead guilty give up a number of constitutional rights, including the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination, the right to a trial by jury, and the right to confront one's accusers. Because guilty pleas eliminate the need for the state to prove guilt at trial, they are an inexpensive and efficient way to adjudicate criminal responsibility. The vast majority of convictions in the United States result from guilty pleas.

The Supreme Court, in Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969), held that a valid guilty plea requires "an intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege." The defendant must be competent, and the judge cannot accept the plea without an affirmative showing that it was voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. In order to be voluntary, a plea cannot result from improper government coercion, such as actual or threatened physical harm. It may be inherently coercive to impose longer sentences on defendants who go to trial instead of pleading guilty, but courts have accepted this practice. Thus, if a defendant enters a plea to avoid a longer sentence post-trial, the plea is still considered voluntary. Conversely, while prosecutorial vindictiveness is impermissible, under Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978), a post-trial conviction is not invalid simply because the prosecutor makes good on a threat to bring more severe charges if the defendant refuses to plead guilty.

A plea must also be knowing and intelligent, meaning that the defendant must be told the elements of the crime and nature of the charges. In Henderson v. Morgan, 426 U.S. 637 (1976), the Supreme Court found a plea invalid because the defendant had not been told that an intent to cause the victim's death was an element of second-degree murder. The requirement that a plea be knowing and intelligent is related to voluntariness: because a guilty plea is an admission of the elements of a crime, it cannot be truly voluntary unless the defendant understands the relationship of the law to the facts. In most cases, the defendant need not be told about the collateral consequences of the conviction, such as the loss of a driver's license.

In the federal courts, Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure is designed to ensure that pleas are voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. The rule requires: disclosure on the record of any plea agreement; the court to ensure that there is a factual basis for the plea and that it was voluntarily offered; and the judge to inform the defendant of the nature of the charges, the maximum and minimum sentence, the applicability of sentencing guidelines, and the rights given up by pleading guilty.

Not all jurisdictions require a factual basis for a plea. Requiring a factual basis may help prevent innocent people from pleading guilty. However, requiring a factual basis can also complicate plea bargaining since the facts may not support the lesser charges to which the defendant would agree to plead guilty. In North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970), the Supreme Court, noting that there was a strong factual basis for the plea, upheld the conviction of a man who pled guilty but maintained his innocence. Consequently so-called “Alford pleas,” which are specifically provided for in Rule 11, allow the court to accept a defendant’s guilty plea even though the defendant does not admit actual guilt, so long as the court finds that it is reasonable for someone in the defendant’s position to plead guilty.

Once entered, a guilty plea is difficult to withdraw. A defendant generally needs a “fair and just” reason to withdraw the plea before sentence is imposed. Some jurisdictions bar any attempt to withdraw a plea after sentence is imposed; others allow withdrawal, but only to correct manifest injustice. However, if a plea is not voluntary, intelligent, and knowing, a defendant may attack it by seeking to withdraw it or by raising the issue on appeal. A withdrawn guilty plea is inadmissible.

By pleading guilty, the defendant waives almost all claims regarding any prior constitutional or other inadequacies in the adjudicative process. A guilty plea does not waive jurisdictional challenges, challenges based on ineffective assistance of counsel, or claims of prosecutorial retaliation. Some jurisdictions allow conditional pleas, under which the defendant pleads guilty but is allowed to appeal specific rulings that could otherwise not be appealed. The use of conditional pleas may promote plea bargaining, since the defendant need not go to trial to preserve an issue, such as a search and seizure challenge, that could turn the entire case around on appeal. In most cases the prosecutor must consent to, and the court must approve, the conditional plea.

Many guilty pleas result from plea bargaining. Plea bargaining may involve modification of the charges by the prosecutor, a prosecutorial sentencing recommendation, a judicial indication of the likely sentence, or some combination of these. Plea bargains are akin to contracts, and many principles of contract law apply. Thus, under Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987), double jeopardy does not prevent a state from bringing additional charges against a defendant who breaches a plea agreement.

Advocates of plea bargaining argue that guilty pleas conserve judicial resources; ensure prompt and efficient application of criminal punishment; enable defendants to acknowledge guilt; avoid trial in cases where this would be undesirable; allow defendants to bargain for lower sentences in return for giving up some rights or cooperating with prosecutors; and permit both prosecutors and defendants to avoid the uncertainty of trial. Proponents also contend that the criminal justice system, as presently constituted and funded, simply could not cope if every case went to trial. Critics of plea bargaining maintain that the system forces innocent people to plead guilty; exacts an unfairly high price from defendants who exercise their constitutional right to go to trial; allocates decision-making authority to prosecutors rather than judges; disadvantages the indigent; and camouflages the injustices of the criminal justice system.

MIRIAM J. AUKERMAN

References and Further Reading

- Alschuler, Albert, The Supreme Court, the Defense Attorney, and the Guilty Plea, University of Colorado Law Review 47 (1975): 1–71.
 Easterbrook, Frank H., Plea Bargaining as Compromise, Yale Law Journal 101 (1992): 1969–1978.
 Fisher, George, Plea Bargaining’s Triumph: A History of Plea Bargaining in America. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2003.
 Schulhofer, Stephen, Plea Bargaining as Disaster, Yale Law Journal 101 (1992) 1979–2009.
 Scott, Robert, and William Stuntz, Plea Bargaining as Contract, Yale Law Journal 101 (1992): 1909–1968.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bordenkircher v. Hayes*, 434 U.S. 357 (1978)
Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969)
Henderson v. Morgan, 426 U.S. 637 (1976)
North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970)
Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987)
Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971)
 See also Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974); Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978); Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238, 242 (1969); Double Jeopardy: Modern History; North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970); Plea Bargaining; Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987); Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971)

GUN CONTROL/ANTI-GUN CONTROL

Gun control has become one of the most contentious public policy issues of the past thirty years. The advocates and opponents of gun control are among the loudest, most passionate participants in American politics. Interest groups on both sides have poured vast sums of money into national advertising and public education campaigns; lobbying; and direct contributions to political parties, members of Congress, and state legislators. Elections have been won or lost because of a candidate’s stance on this issue, including (some observers believe) the 2000 presidential election, when the Democratic nominee, Vice President Al

Gore, failed to carry some traditionally Democratic states with a high percentage of gun owners.

Advocates of gun control believe that the possession and sale of firearms should be regulated by government, so as to ensure that (more) guns do not fall into the hands of criminals, the mentally ill, and children. Most advocates also believe that certain kinds of guns, such as assault weapons, should be prohibited altogether. Advocates say that their goal is the reduction of rampant gun violence in America through the regulation—not the abolition—of guns and that recreational hunters who use rifles are not their target.

Opponents of gun control believe that guns are used primarily by law-abiding citizens for self-protection, hunting, and sport. They also believe that government regulation of firearms constitutes a slippery and inevitable slope toward the ultimate abolition of guns. Opponents contend that the Second Amendment to the U.S. Constitution unmistakably protects the rights of individuals to own guns and to be free from unreasonable government regulation. Supporters of gun control argue that the Second Amendment is about militias and merely prohibits the national government from disarming the state militias. Opponents of gun regulation claim that ownership of a gun is a civil liberty like the right to free speech and can never be abridged; supporters of gun control argue that the amendment only secures the rights of the states to have what the amendment calls “a well regulated militia.”

Today, approximately 35 to 40 percent of all U.S. households have at least one gun; on average, these households possess about three guns, accounting for an estimated 250 million firearms. Rifles and shotguns outnumber handguns by a ratio of two to one. These figures, upon which advocates and opponents of gun control generally agree, suggest how widespread gun ownership is, how difficult the abolition and confiscation of guns would actually be, and the potentially enormous impact of gun regulations.

The story of guns in early America is a more contested one. Americans have had a long-standing cultural image that guns were an integral part of living in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, at least until the advent of professional police forces. This image has been reinforced by movies and television, in particular the entertainment media's depiction of the “Wild West.” Recent research by historians, political scientists, and legal scholars has called into question this image, suggesting that guns were not widely available, owned, or used to commit violent crimes. Historian Michael Bellesiles, who used a variety of empirical methods to study the prevalence of guns in pre-Civil War America, has called this image a “myth.” Other scholars, however, dispute the accuracy of this research, suggesting that it is part of a pro-gun control lobby to downplay the routine nature of gun ownership and the positive contribution of guns to public order and self-protection in colonial and antebellum America.

Guns and Public Policy

Public opinion has helped propel the march toward increased regulation of guns by the federal government in the twentieth century. A substantial majority of Americans has supported stricter control of firearms, particularly handguns, for as long as opinion polling has taken place. Agreement breaks down, however, over specifics, including bans on assault rifles or the ballistic fingerprinting of guns. In particular, gun owners are much more likely than non-owners to oppose intrusive or controversial forms of regulation. The abolition of handguns, however, is rejected by a large majority of all Americans.

Key violent events on the national stage have helped to direct and intensify public opinion. Prohibition and the related gangster violence of the 1920s and early 1930s, typified by Al Capone's massacre of rival mobsters on Valentine's Day in Chicago in 1929, led to two major pieces of federal gun control legislation. A year after the Twenty-First Amendment repealed prohibition, The National Firearms Act of 1934 imposed a substantial tax on the manufacturers, importers, and dealers of sawed-off shotguns, silencers, and the like; this legislation also provided for the first firearms registration system—The National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record—still in place today. The Federal Firearms Act of 1938 established a licensing system for all types of firearms, by creating Federal Firearms Licensees (dealers) and criminalized the sale of guns to convicted felons.

The assassination of President John F. Kennedy in 1963 led to renewed calls for stricter gun control laws. But it was not until the assassinations of Senator Robert F. Kennedy and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. in 1968 that Congress finally passed legislation designed to (1) close some of the loopholes that allowed rifles and handguns to fall into the hands of assassins and (2) curb the growing level of violence, especially urban homicides. The Gun Control Act of 1968 was supported even by the National Rifle Association (NRA), the most powerful pro-gun lobby in the United States. It broadened the categories of people who were not eligible to purchase firearms, prohibited the mail-order sales of firearms, prohibited the interstate sale of firearms (a restriction later removed for rifles), and banned the importation of “Saturday night specials,” a handgun often used in street crimes.

The shootings of President Reagan and his press secretary, James Brady, in 1981 from John Hinckley’s handgun set in motion the most vigorous and sophisticated campaign to control handguns in the United States. Paralyzed by the shooting, Brady joined his wife, Sarah, in efforts to implement stricter controls on handguns. In 1989, Sarah Brady became chairperson of Handgun Control Inc. (HCI), the most influential interest and lobbying group in favor of gun control (by 2001, HCI changed its name to the Brady Campaign Against Handgun Violence). After years of battles involving HCI, NRA, and other groups, Congress passed the Brady Bill in 1993; President Clinton signed the bill, which had some bipartisan support, into law.

Hailed by supporters as one of the most significant pieces of gun control legislation ever enacted, the Brady law required a five-day waiting period and background checks on all handgun purchasers (the five-day waiting period was rescinded in 1998 when the FBI implemented a computerized national instant checking system). These provisions represented a major shift toward stricter gun controls in thirty-two states; the other states already had “Brady-like” laws in place. Shortly thereafter, Congress passed the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, which banned the manufacture and sale of assault weapons; however, the ten-year term of this act expired in 2004 and was not renewed by Congress.

Guns and the Second Amendment

Is the ownership of guns one of our nation’s fundamental civil liberties? This question is hotly debated among scholars, activists, members of Congress and other policymakers, and even the public at large. The controversy largely focuses on the original meaning of the Second Amendment, which states: “A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.”

One viewpoint, usually referred to as the “collective” view of the Second Amendment, is that the right to own guns refers only to the context of a citizen’s participation in a state government-regulated militia, whose purpose was to protect the national defense in an era when people were wary of a too powerful federal government and standing armies. When serving in these citizen militias, men were expected to provide their own weapons of a type in common use at the time. Adherents to the collective view, such as political scientist Robert Spitzer, argue that there is no historical evidence to suggest that the right to bear arms extended beyond the militia context to private possession and use. Indeed, some early drafts or alternative versions of the Second Amendment, which specified a private right to own and use guns, were ultimately rejected. As citizen militias gave way to the professionalized national guards of the twentieth century, the militia justification for contemporary gun ownership seemed no longer relevant.

A quite opposite viewpoint, referred to as the “individual” view of the Second Amendment, is that this amendment was intended to guarantee the right of individuals to possess arms, not only for militia use but also for self-defense and protection from government tyranny. Adherents to this view remind us that the militia was a universal citizen militia, one that extended to all able-bodied men (at least those between the ages of sixteen and forty-five). In addition, legal scholars such as Robert Cottrol point to the English Bill of Rights of 1689, which provides that “the subjects which are Protestants may have arms for their defence suitable to their conditions and as allowed by law,” as the basis for our Second Amendment. Historian Joyce Lee Malcolm observes that in the nineteenth century the right to own guns in Britain was expanded to all religions, and British judicial opinions made clear that this right was an individual one that extended to self-protection.

In sum, supporters of the collective and individual perspectives on the Second Amendment disagree about several key issues, including the universality and meaning of militia service, the intentions of the framers of our Constitution, and the relevance of British laws and jurisprudence for interpreting the Second Amendment. They also disagree on the implications of the very few U.S. Supreme Court decisions that have addressed the right to bear arms and gun regulation within the framework of the Second Amendment.

In the Dred Scott case (Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393, 1857), Chief Justice Roger Taney listed the right “to keep and carry arms wherever they went” as one of the privileges of citizens and a compelling reason why blacks should not be considered citizens. Those who believe that the Second Amendment provides an individual right to own guns point to this decision for support. But given that Dred Scott was overturned by the passage of the Civil War amendments and has been discredited by virtually all constitutional scholars, the significance of Taney's dicta about guns is in doubt.

In Presser v. Illinois, 116 U.S. 252, (1886), the Supreme Court upheld an Illinois state law that banned public parades of armed men, in this case the parade of German (and other) immigrant laborers protesting working conditions and seeking to mobilize a national labor movement. Advocates of the collective view of the Second Amendment cite Presser for support of the regulation of guns, as well as for the point that the Illinois National Guard constituted the only legitimate militia of the time. Advocates of the individual view of the Second Amendment cite Presser for the reiteration of the individual right to own guns. In fact, the Court's opinion declares that "the states cannot . . . prohibit the people from keeping and bearing arms, so as to deprive the United States of their rightful resource for maintaining the public security." Whether in these words the Presser Court is declaring the right to bear arms as an individual right or, instead, one reserved only for citizen militias in their performance of a public duty is disputed by scholars of the Second Amendment today.

The Supreme Court's most definitive statement on the regulation of guns occurred in U.S. v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174, (1939). In Miller, two defendants were convicted of transporting a sawed-off shotgun across state lines, in violation of the National Firearms Act. The Supreme Court unanimously ruled that a sawed-off shotgun was subject to federal government regulation (including registration), noting that such a weapon bore no "reasonable relationship" to the preservation of militias or the common defense. It seems clear that the Supreme Court did not wish to tackle the larger, more controversial, and wholly hypothetical question of whether guns used by individual citizens for militia purposes were also subject to government regulation. Nevertheless, advocates of the individual view of the Second Amendment cite Miller for support, noting with approval the Court's extensive discussion of state militias.

Finally, it is important to distinguish between views of the Second Amendment and support for, or opposition to, gun control. Virtually all opponents of gun control base their arguments on the Second Amendment, in particular their view that this amendment protects the right to bear arms and precludes most or all forms of government regulation. Supporters of gun control vary in their views of the Second Amendment. Those favoring the abolition of all firearms or handguns believe the amendment confers no individual right to own guns. Other gun control supporters are willing to acknowledge a constitutional right to own guns; however, they believe that the Second Amendment permits the regulation of guns, whether the constitutional test for regulation is "rational basis" or even the higher threshold "strict scrutiny" standard.

Gun Policy in Perspective

Debates about the desirability or constitutionality of gun control measures are not the only sources of disagreement between supporters and opponents. They also have different points of view about the efficacy of gun control legislation. Since the Brady law was enacted in 1993, more than one million applications for firearm transfers or permits were rejected by the FBI or state and local law enforcement agencies (Bureau of Justice statistics). Although comprising only about 2 percent of all applications, these rejections reflect a large number of instances in which convicted felons and other ineligible classes of individuals were unable to purchase a gun. How often did these background checks prevent crimes or reduce the violence associated with crimes? We cannot know for sure, but we do know that (1) the violent crime rate has declined since 1993, and (2) the number of crimes committed with a gun has also sharply declined—by about 50 percent—in that same time period (Bureau of Justice statistics).

Supporters of gun control point enthusiastically to these data for evidence of success; opponents of gun control argue that the national crime rate was declining for other reasons (such as demographic changes) and that the impact of the Brady law has been minimal. Researchers who have studied this issue empirically are often skeptical of the more grandiose claims of success for the Brady law. Legal scholar James Jacobs, for example, points out that guns are still widely available to the criminal class through illegal transfers of registered guns from friends and accomplices as well as still unregulated gun shows.

Finally, there are new laws at the state and federal level that gun owners and manufacturers support with enthusiasm. Thirty-seven states now have right-to-carry (shall issue) laws, which give all adults with no criminal record the right to possess and carry a concealed weapon. At the federal level, Congress recently passed, again with bipartisan support, the Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act, designed to prohibit civil liability actions against manufacturers, distributors, dealers, or importers of firearms or ammunition for damages resulting from the misuse of their products. Hoping to curb "abusive" lawsuits by the Brady campaign and other gun control organizations, President Bush signed the bill into law on October 26, 2005. For now and the foreseeable future, guns will continue to be a contested but integral part of American life.

JOHN PAUL RYAN

References and Further Reading

- Bellesiles, Michael A. Arming America: The Origins of a National Gun Culture. New York: Knopf, 2000.
- Bogus, Carl, ed. The Second Amendment in Law and History: Historians and Constitutional Scholars on the Right to Bear Arms. New York: The New Press, 2000.
- Cottrol, Robert J., ed. Gun Control and the Constitution: Sources and Explorations on the Second Amendment. New York: Garland, 1994.
- Gun Laws and Policies: A Dialogue*, Focus on Law Studies XVIII(2) (Spring 2003).

- Jacobs, James B. Can Gun Control Work? New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Malcolm, Joyce Lee. To Keep and Bear Arms: The Origins of an Anglo-American Right. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1996.
- Spitzer, Robert J. The Right to Bear Arms. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO, 2001.
- U.S. Department of Justice: Bureau of Justice Statistics—Office of Justice Programs. “Firearms and Crime Statistics.” www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/guns.htm. Accessed November 9, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Presser v. Illinois*, 116 U.S. 252 (1886)
- Scott v. Sandford* (Dred Scott case), 60 U.S. 393 (1857)
- U.S. v. Miller*, 307 U.S. 174 (1939)

H

H. L. v. MATHESON, 450 U.S. 398 (1981)

Following the Court's decision in Roe v. Wade (1973) that pregnant women enjoyed a personal liberty under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to terminate their pregnancies, five states, including Utah, enacted laws to discourage minors from exercising this right. Reasoning that if parents knew that their teenage daughter was pregnant they might dissuade them from aborting the pregnancy, these states required the attending physician to notify the girl's parents and wait a specified period of time before performing the procedure. In H. L. v. Matheson the Supreme Court found no constitutional barriers to enactment of parental notification statutes as long as the parents were not given a veto over the abortion.

H. L. was an unmarried 15-year-old girl living with her parents in Utah and dependent on them for support. After discovering that she was pregnant, she consulted with a social worker and a physician, who advised her that ending her pregnancy was in her best interest. A Utah statute required the attending physician to notify the parents of a pregnant minor seeking an abortion "if possible." Because of the law, the physician declined to perform the abortion until he had notified H. L.'s parents. For reasons that she did not reveal, she said that it was not in her best interest for the parents to know and filed a suit in a state trial court claiming that the parental notification statute violated the federal constitution. The law contained no judicial bypass, whereby the physician could notify a judge instead of the parents.

On appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court noted that in Bellotti v. Baird (1979) it had ruled that a state cannot give parents a veto over a child's abortion decision. It also said that a statute that required parental notification in the case of a mature, emancipated minor seeking an abortion would violate the minor's constitutional rights. This case, however, involved an immature minor, dependent on her parents. The statute requires only parental notification, not parental consent.

The Utah statute, said the Court, serves the important considerations of family integrity and protection of adolescents. The law also serves the state's interest in ensuring that the attending physician has access to the patient's full medical and psychological history, which the parents or the family physician, with authorization from the parents, are likely to be able to provide. Research indicates that abortion has an especially devastating effect on the mental health of adolescent girls.

It is reasonable, found the Court, for a state to require a physician to notify parents before performing an abortion while not requiring such notice when she gives birth to a child. In Maher v. Roe (1977), the Court held that states serve a legitimate interest, protecting potential human life, when they enact public policies favoring childbirth over abortion. In a subsequent case, Hodgson v. Minnesota (1990), the Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment requires states with parental notification requirements to include the option of notifying a judge instead when the best interests of the minor so necessitate.

KENNETH M. HOLLAND

References and Further Reading

- Bridge, Burneatta, Parent versus Child: H.L. v. Matheson and the New Abortion Litigation, Wisconsin Law Review 1982 (1982): 1:75–116.
- Feldman, H. N., H. L. v. Matheson: Where Does the Court Stand on Abortion and Parental Notification? American University Law Review 31 (1982): 2:431–69.
- McCullough, Eric D., New Jersey Parental Notification for Abortion Act Violates State Constitutional Guarantee of Fundamental Right—Planned Parenthood of Central New Jersey v. Farmer, 762 A.2d 620 (N.J. 2000), Seton Hall Constitutional Law Journal 11 (2001): 495–528.
- Solinger, Rickie. Abortion Wars: A Half Century of Struggle, 1950–2000. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bellotti v. Baird*, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)
- Hodgson v. Minnesota*, 497 U.S. 417 (1990)
- Maher v. Roe*, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Abortion; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

HABEAS CORPUS ACT OF 1679

Although Parliament in the seventeenth century was loath to tamper with the common law, in a few instances it did intervene. The most notable example was the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679.

Until that time, the writ of habeas corpus (literally “produce the body”) had been a discretionary matter for courts responding to petitions from people who claimed that they had been illegally jailed and held. Because judges did have wide discretion in the matter, Parliament worried that the writ did not serve as sufficient protection against arbitrary imprisonment by the Crown. Moreover, the Crown often evaded the matter by charging persons with misdemeanors, since habeas corpus only applied to felonies and treason, or moving the prisoners to the Channel Islands, land technically outside the realm where the writ did not run. The final straw seems to have been the imprisonment of Francis Jenkes for urging that a new Parliament be called. When he sought his release through habeas corpus, the Lord Chief Justice denied it, on no grounds other than that the courts were on vacation; Jenkes received a similar answer from the Lord Chancellor.

The Act of 1679 greatly reduced judicial discretion in whether to issue the writ, made it applicable to misdemeanors as well as felonies, and empowered as well as required individual justices to issue the writ and hear its return at any time. Justices and jailors not complying with the statute or removing prisoners beyond the reach of the writ were subject to heavy fines.

The act strongly influenced the American colonists, who later wrote habeas corpus into the Constitution; it has been known ever since as the “Great Writ.”

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Mian, Badsah K. English Habeas Corpus: Law, History, and Politics. San Francisco: University of California Press, 1984.

HABEAS CORPUS IN COLONIAL AMERICA

“Habeas corpus” (or “habeas corpus ad subjiciendum”) is Latin for “[that] you have the body.” It is a writ issued by a court to a person having custody of another, commanding him/her to produce the detainee in order to determine the detention’s legality. The “Great Writ” is primarily used today to release individuals from unlawful imprisonment.

Although mentioned in the Magna Carta (1215), the writ was part of English common law long before that time. In 1679, Parliament codified the common law with the Habeas Corpus Act, which allowed courts to issue writs when not in session and provided penalties to judges who refused.

As with other American legal system features, the Great Writ’s use was accepted by the colonies by their adoption of English common law. By the time of the American Revolutionary War, the writ was part of every American colony’s common law, except for South Carolina, which re-enacted the English statute. In fact, the writ’s use as a safeguard for liberty was so important to the colonists that the British government’s refusal to issue writs was one of the grievances causing the Revolution. Accordingly, the Constitution of the United States provides that “[t]he Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it” (Art. 1, sec. 9). Although a continual aspect of American common law, most colonies did not pass formal habeas corpus statutes until after the Revolution.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Carpenter, A.H. "Habeas Corpus in the Colonies." American Historical Review 9 (January 1904).
- Duker, William. A Constitutional History of Habeas Corpus. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1980.
- Longsdorf, George F. The Federal Habeas Corpus Acts: Original and Amended. 13 F.R.D. 407 (1953).
- Oaks, Dallin, Legal History in the High Court—Habeas Corpus, Michigan Law Review 64 (1966).
- Stoebuck, William B., Reception of English Common Law in the American Colonies, William and Mary Law Review 10 (1968).

HABEAS CORPUS: MODERN HISTORY

General Background

The writ of habeas corpus has long been one of the primary legal remedies sought by prisoners who believe that they are being held in custody in violation of federal law. The importance of the "Great Writ" is reflected in Article I, section 9 of the U.S. Constitution, which provides that "[t]he Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it."

To obtain what practitioners often call "habeas relief," a prisoner must file a civil lawsuit in federal court against the person holding him or her in custody—usually the warden in charge of the facility where the prisoner is being held. In the papers initiating the lawsuit, the prisoner must outline the reasons for believing that his or her detention violates federal law. Ordinarily, the prisoner must allege a violation of constitutional (rather than merely statutory) law. In almost all cases, the remedy that the prisoner must seek is release from custody, a lawful trial, or a lawful sentence. The vast majority of habeas lawsuits involve prisoners who were charged with a state crime, convicted in a state court, and then sentenced either to a term of imprisonment or, in the most extreme cases, to death. State prisoners usually must wait to file their habeas lawsuits until after they have "exhausted their state remedies" by presenting all of their claims to the appropriate state's appellate courts.

The modern era has seen great changes in the rules relating to federal habeas lawsuits, from the vast expansion of habeas remedies' availability in Brown v. Allen (1953) and Fay v. Noia (1963), to the significant restrictions placed on habeas remedies' availability by the Burger and Rehnquist Courts and by the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA).

Expansion of Habeas Corpus under Brown and Fay

In Brown v. Allen (1953), the U.S. Supreme Court greatly broadened the range of cases in which federal courts could grant prisoners' requests for habeas relief. The Court held that, if a federal judge agreed with a prisoner's constitutional claim, he or she could award the prisoner the appropriate remedy, even if a state court had already considered that very claim and rejected it. The Court went still further in Fay v. Noia (1963), holding that, even if the state courts had refused to hear a prisoner's claim because the prisoner had failed to follow the state courts' applicable procedural rules (such as rules requiring the prisoner to file certain papers by specified deadlines or requiring the prisoner to let the court know immediately if he or she objects to evidence offered by the prosecution at trial), the federal court could still agree to consider the claim. The only time that a prisoner's failure to obey a state court's procedural rules could bar a federal court from granting habeas relief, the Fay Court held, was when the prisoner himself or herself knew about those procedural rules and decided not to follow them.

The Court's rulings in Brown and Fay coincided with an era in which the Court was using the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause and the incorporation doctrine to expand the range of constitutional rights that a person could claim when being investigated, prosecuted, or sentenced by state authorities. As a result of these developments and the Court's rulings in Brown and Fay, federal habeas lawsuits became one of the primary occasions on which the Warren Court announced new rules of constitutional law to be applied in criminal cases.

By the 1970s, state prisoners' ability to use habeas corpus lawsuits to challenge their convictions and sentences had become intensely controversial. Critics argued, for example, that federal judges were not showing sufficient respect for the work being done by their counterparts within the state judiciaries. Others contended that federal habeas lawsuits were largely to blame for the long delays that often separated a prisoner's death sentence and execution. Critics pointed out, for example, that there were no strict deadlines for filing habeas lawsuits and that death-row inmates often were allowed to file one habeas petition after another, thereby forestalling their executions for many years. Supporters argued, however, that federal habeas proceedings were essential in order to catch all of the constitutional violations that occurred in criminal cases and that escaped the state courts' attention. Habeas corpus' supporters also contended that, because vindicating the constitutional rights of convicted criminals was often politically unpopular, federal judges with lifetime appointments to the bench should be given the opportunity to review each allegation of constitutional impropriety alleged by a prisoner.

Restriction of Habeas Corpus under the Burger and Rehnquist Courts and under AEDPA

In the final quarter of the twentieth century, the Burger and Rehnquist Courts issued a number of rulings that significantly restricted prisoners' ability to prevail in federal habeas lawsuits. In Stone v. Powell (1976), for example, the Supreme Court categorically declared that a state prisoner ordinarily cannot seek habeas relief based on a Fourth Amendment claim that the police obtained incriminating evidence through an unreasonable search or seizure. In Wainwright v. Sykes (1977) and Coleman v. Thompson (1991), the Court overruled its earlier decision in Fay v. Noia, declaring that, with narrow exceptions, a prisoner cannot raise a claim in a federal habeas lawsuit if he or she failed to follow the state courts' procedural rules for presenting that claim to the state courts. In Teague v. Lane (1989), the Court went a long way toward reversing the practice that had prevailed under the Warren Court, declaring that, with only the narrowest of exceptions, "habeas corpus cannot be used as a vehicle to create new constitutional rules of criminal procedure."

Congressional Republicans had long wished to join the Burger and Rehnquist Courts in limiting prisoners' ability to prevail in federal habeas lawsuits. Those efforts were resisted by Democrats, however, until an act of domestic terrorism united the country's politicians and set the stage for a large number of federal anticrime legislative initiatives. On April 19, 1995, a bomb planted by Timothy McVeigh destroyed the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, killing 168 people and injuring nearly 1,000 others. Congressional leaders quickly responded with AEDPA, setting forth new federal standards on a wide range of matters, including terrorism and civil liberties, victims' rights, the treatment of aliens, weapons of mass destruction, and federal habeas corpus. Almost exactly one year after the Oklahoma City bombing, President Bill Clinton signed AEDPA into law.

In its provisions relating to habeas corpus, AEDPA codified the Court's rulings in some areas and further restricted habeas relief availability in others. AEDPA established a one-year statute of limitations for filing habeas claims, for example, and imposed even stricter deadlines—for prisoners and federal judges alike—in capital cases arising from states that met certain standards for providing indigent death-row prisoners with free and competent legal representation. The statute also declared that, absent extraordinary circumstances, a prisoner cannot file more than one federal habeas lawsuit—he or she ordinarily must raise all of his or her claims in his or her first habeas lawsuit. AEDPA also limited federal courts' ability to hear new evidence in support of prisoners' claims. And, in perhaps its most significant and controversial provision, AEDPA greatly narrowed the rule that the Court had established in Brown v. Allen. This provision stated that, when a prisoner files a federal habeas lawsuit based upon a claim that was heard and rejected by the state courts, the federal court must similarly reject the claim unless it finds that the state courts' handling of the claim was contrary to clearly established Supreme Court precedent, involved an unreasonable application of Supreme Court precedent, or was based upon an unreasonable determination of the relevant facts. Under AEDPA, therefore, a federal judge must reject a request for habeas relief that is based upon a claim previously rejected by a state court—even if the federal judge disagrees with the state court's ruling—unless the federal judge concludes that the state court's ruling was either unreasonable or directly contrary to Supreme Court holdings.

Although surely no one wants to abolish it entirely, habeas corpus will always be controversial. Skeptics will claim that federal habeas proceedings do not show sufficient respect for the work being done by the states' trial and appellate judges and that habeas lawsuits frustrate states' efforts to bring individual cases to a final close. Proponents will argue that, in the absence of a meaningful opportunity to seek federal habeas relief, prisoners whose constitutional rights were violated by state officials will either be executed or spend years in prison. Judges and attorneys who handle habeas cases, meanwhile, will be asked to interpret and apply the very complex laws that emerge as the product of those ongoing debates.

TODD E. PETTYS

References and Further Reading

Hertz, Randy, and James S. Liebman. Federal Habeas Corpus Practice and Procedure. 4th ed. Charlottesville, Va.: LexisNexis, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brown v. Allen, 344 U.S. 443 (1953)
Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722 (1991)
Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391 (1963)
Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465 (1976)
Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288 (1989)
Wainwright v. Sykes, 433 U.S. 72 (1977)
 28 U.S.C. sec. 2241–2254, 2261–2266
 Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, 110 Stat. 1214.

See also Capital Punishment; Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996; Habeas Corpus in Colonial America; Incorporation Doctrine; Terrorism and Civil Liberties

HAGUE v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939)

New Jersey required citizens who wished to march or distribute literature to obtain advance permission of the city manager. In Hague, the Court struck down this regulation. The ordinance failed in part because of a defect inherent in licensing schemes: requiring speakers to obtain “permission” before speaking grants enormous power to the licensing official to determine what is acceptable speech in a public place. This risks the official denying permission arbitrarily or because the speech criticizes government.

More significantly, in a concurring opinion, Justice Owen Roberts emphasized that public places such as streets and parks are presumptively open for speech activities. Justice Holmes had once argued that the government could forbid use of streets and parks much like a private homeowner could eject trespassers. However, Justice Roberts rejected Holmes’s analogy in this famous passage: “Wherever the title of streets and parks may rest, they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and, time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions.”

This concept, that public streets and parks (and sidewalks) are presumptively open to the public for communications such as leafleting, marching, or speaking, became a key underpinning of the modern Court’s jurisprudence of the “public forum.” Roberts’s dictum does not mean that public spaces are always open for speech (e.g., consider the importance of maintaining highways for transportation), but does mean that the burden is on officials to justify restrictions on their use for communicative activity.

JOHN T. NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

Davis v. Massachusetts, 167 U.S. 43 (1897).

See also Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Public Forum Doctrine; Roberts, Owen J.

HAGUE, FRANK (1876–1956)

Frank “Boss” Hague rose from the slums of Jersey City to become its mayor from 1917 to 1947. Hague was a controversial political force of the Democratic Party on the local, state and national level at the height of his power. He heralded progressivism, while maintaining iron-fisted control over the channels of the local political system. Hague lived lavishly on a meager public servant’s salary and was often accused of widespread corruption. It is widely believed that he made a fortune by taking a small percentage of the salaries of all appointed local workers and took kickbacks for the sale of land.

Hague created a political “machine” through a network of intensely loyal civil servants, many of whom did very little work for their city paychecks, rampant “get out the vote” efforts, election fraud, and intimidation of enemies to Hague or his cause. This system produced lopsided majorities for Hague or whoever he chose to back in the election (beneficiaries of the Hague machine included Franklin Delano Roosevelt).

Hague, who believed in tough law and order, often disregarded the civil liberties of those who did not share his positions or those who posed any threat to his dominance. His political foes would be physically beaten by the police or poll workers. Hague barred the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) union from using the city’s meeting halls since he considered them to be socialist. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that this was an unconstitutional violation of their right to assemble under the Fourteenth Amendment in Hague v. CIO (1939). When students from Princeton University came to Jersey City on election day to monitor the polls, they were beaten and jailed, thwarting their attempts to ensure fairness and deter fraud. Hague’s response against the objections of those seeking the protection of their civil liberties by the law was his famous line, “I am the law.”

Hague also embodied notions of the benevolent local government, as seen in the great improvements in sanitation and the building of a “state of the art” public hospital. The hospital offered free services to all city residents, although the program came at the expense of high taxes. Overall, Hague believed in an unrelenting law and order government and used the police department to further his goals. Frank Hague’s career in politics embodies the tension that exists between authoritarianism, which can be quite efficient in attaining certain social welfare accomplishments, and civil liberties, the hallmark of an open and democratic system.

JAMES F. Van ORDEN

References and Further Reading

McKean, Dayton David. The Boss: The Hague Machine in Action. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1940.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496 (1939)

HAIG v. AGEE, 453 U.S. 280 (1981)

Philip Agee, a disillusioned former agent of the Central Intelligence Agency, wrote a book while living abroad in which he denounced covert operations and published the names of undercover agents. The U.S. State Department responded by revoking Agee's passport, and he brought suit, claiming that the revocation was not authorized by law. Kent v. Dulles (1958) had earlier struck down on that ground a regulation denying passports to communists.

The lower courts held for Agee, but the Supreme Court held, seven to two, that a revocation on grounds of "substantial reasons of national security and foreign policy" was implicitly authorized because the State Department had publicly claimed to possess such a power and Congress had failed to prohibit such actions.

Since Congress is extremely unlikely to legislate in response to a mere unexercised claim of executive power, this approach goes far toward abandoning the distinction between authorized actions and actions on which the law is silent.

Kent v. Dulles was not expressly overruled. There are several important distinctions. First, Kent involved a whole class of people, not all of whom would plausibly cause harm by traveling abroad, while Agee had already sought to cause harm. On the other hand, the civil liberty at stake in Kent was the right to obtain a passport, while Agee's interest was in his right to re-enter the United States. Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez (1963) had forbidden revoking citizenship in such a case, yet here the consequences were almost equally severe.

DANIEL N. HOFFMAN

References and Further Reading

Agee, Philip. Inside the Company: CIA Diary. New York: Bantam, 1984.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144 (1963)

Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1958)

HALE v. HENKEL, 201 U.S. 370 (1906)

The Supreme Court established in Hale v. Henkel the power of a federal grand jury investigation into corporate misconduct to require an organization to turn over its records. Hale was an officer of MacAndrews and Forbes Company, one of six companies being investigated for illegal price fixing of tobacco. A federal grand jury subpoena addressed to Hale required him to produce extensive corporate records, and he refused. The Court rejected Hale's argument that a grand jury cannot compel the production of records without first providing a list of charges being investigated, holding that a grand jury can initiate an investigation of potential crimes on its own volition without identifying the scope of its investigation before examining witnesses and compelling the production of documentary evidence. This broad inquisitorial power permits a grand jury to first investigate misconduct before deciding whether to approve an indictment.

The Court then determined that the Fifth Amendment self-incrimination privilege did not apply to a corporation, rejecting Hale's privilege claim. Reasoning that the constitutional protection is "purely personal" and cannot be asserted to protect a third person, Hale could not refuse to produce the company's records on the ground that they would incriminate him. Because a corporation is incorporeal and cannot testify, the Court's holding in Hale v. Henkel effectively denies to corporations any Fifth Amendment right to refuse to produce records because only individuals can assert the privilege. This was the first step in limiting the scope of protection for documents in Boyd v. United States (1886).

PETER J. HENNING

References and Further Reading

LaFare, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure, vol. 3. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 1999.

Mosteller, Robert P., Simplifying Subpoena Law: Taking the Fifth Amendment Seriously, Virginia Law Review 73 (1987): 1:1–110.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)

See also Bellis v. United States, 417 U.S. 85 (1974); Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886); Grand Jury Investigation and Indictment; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

HAMDI v. RUMSFELD, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)

Hamdi v. Rumsfeld presented the Supreme Court with the question of whether an American citizen captured in a war zone and designated an enemy combatant by the executive branch could be detained indefinitely in the United States without constitutional protection. The Court, in a plurality opinion by Justice O'Connor, held that while Congress authorized the detention of enemy combatants in limited circumstances, the Fifth Amendment due process clause of the Constitution permitted American citizens detained on American soil to challenge their putative enemy combatant status before a neutral arbiter.

The case emerged from the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States. One week after those attacks, the Congress enacted the Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF), a law allowing the executive branch to apply all "necessary and appropriate force" against the al-Qaeda terrorist network, the Taliban, or any nation harboring such terrorists. In November 2001, President George W. Bush issued an order under the AUMF directing the military to identify and detain "enemy combatants."

One of the several hundred persons detained pursuant to the president's order was Yaser Esam Hamdi, an American citizen born in Louisiana and raised in Saudi Arabia. Hamdi was captured by American forces in a war zone, Afghanistan, designated an "enemy combatant" member of the Taliban by the executive, and eventually imprisoned in South Carolina. The United States denied Hamdi access to counsel, kept him incommunicado from family and friends, and detained him without formal charges. Hamdi's father challenged his son's incarceration by filing a habeas corpus petition on his son's behalf.

Justice O'Connor utilized the traditional procedural due process balancing test of Mathews v. Eldridge (1976), to determine the scope of the due process protection afforded citizen detainees. While not providing alleged enemy combatants with the full panoply of due process rights accorded to citizens who are charged with crimes, she held that citizen detainees are entitled to notice of the factual grounds for the detention and a "meaningful opportunity" to challenge those grounds before a neutral tribunal.

Justice O'Connor decided that petitioner Hamdi did not concede enemy combatant status and that he was entitled to challenge his detention. She added, "We have long since made clear that a state of war is not a blank check for the President when it comes to the rights of the Nation's citizens" (Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer [1952]).

Justice Souter, joined by Justice Ginsburg, agreed with Justice O'Connor that Hamdi had a constitutional due process right to challenge his alleged enemy combatant status before a neutral arbiter, but he reached that conclusion from a vastly different perspective. Justice Souter found that Congress had not authorized Hamdi's detention, either in the AUMF or in laws enacted prior to September 11th, and that without congressional approval Hamdi ought to be released. Because the Court did not align with him in decreeing that Hamdi ought to be released, Justice Souter agreed that Hamdi at least was entitled to contest his detention through a habeas corpus claim.

Justice Scalia dissented, asserting his belief that American citizens held by the United States must either be prosecuted in federal court for a crime, such as treason, or have the writ of habeas corpus suspended pursuant to the suspension clause, Article I, section 9, clause 2. Since the federal government did not take either permissible avenue, he asserted that any continued detention of Hamdi, without being treated like other citizens accused of a crime, was unlawful.

Justice Thomas also dissented. He wrote that Hamdi's detention fell squarely within the government's war powers and thus the courts lacked the competence to second-guess those powers. Therefore, he found the detention permissible without any overlay of due process.

Less than two months after the fractured Supreme Court decision, the government and the petitioner's lawyers worked out a plan to release Hamdi. The government agreed to release Hamdi and deport him to Saudi Arabia on October 9, 2004, subject to a variety of conditions, including Hamdi renouncing his U.S. citizenship, agreeing to restrict his travel, and promising not to sue the U.S. government for a violation of his rights.

STEVEN I. FRIEDLAND

References and Further Reading

Moeckli, D., The U.S. Supreme Court's "Enemy Combatant" Decisions: A "Major Victory for the Rule of Law"? Journal of Conflict and Security Law 10 (2005): 75.

- Savage, D. "‘Enemy Combatant’ May Soon Be Freed." Los Angeles Times, August 14, 2004.
- Stumpf, J., Citizens of an Enemy Land: Enemy Combatants, Aliens, and the Constitutional Rights of the Pseudo-Citizen, University of California-Davis Law Review 79 (2004).
- Wuerth, I., The President’s Power to Detain ‘Enemy Combatants’: Modern Lessons from Mr. Madison’s Forgotten War, Northwestern University Law Review 98 (2004): 1567.
- Iraola, R., Enemy Combatants, the Courts, and the Constitution, Oklahoma Law Review 56 (2003): 565.
- Lepri, T., Note: Safeguarding the Enemy Within: The Need for Procedural Protections for U.S. Citizens Detained as Enemy Combatants Under Ex Parte Quirin, Fordham Law Review 71 (2003): 2565.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Mathews v. Eldridge*, 424 U.S. 319 (1976)
- Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer*, 343 U.S. 579 (1952)

HAMILTON, ALEXANDER (1757–1804)

As a delegate to the Constitutional Convention, a co-author of the Federalist Papers, Cabinet officer, and lawyer, Hamilton was a key player in the founding of the nation. His career intersected with civil liberties in a number of ways. Hamilton was an early member of the New York Manumission Society and its second president. Thus, he worked for providing the most fundamental liberties to people of African descent in the new nation. Having grown up in a slave society, on the Island of Nevis, Hamilton was particularly aware of the fundamental contradiction between liberty and slavery.

In Rutgers v. Waddington (1784), Hamilton argued that a New York statute violated the state constitution and was therefore void. The court rejected this argument (although it sided with Hamilton on other grounds). Nevertheless, this was an early argument in favor of judicial review, which would ultimately be a key tool in preserving civil liberties from oppressive legislatures.

At the Constitutional Convention, Hamilton opposed adding a bill of rights to the new frame of government. Like most other Federalists, Hamilton believed a bill of rights was unnecessary. He made similar arguments during the debates over ratification. Like other Federalists, Hamilton believed it was impossible to draft a bill of rights that would protect all liberties, and that any liberties not specifically protected would be lost. Thus, in Federalist 84, he argued that a bill of rights was not only unnecessary in the proposed Constitution, but would even be dangerous. They would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and, on this very account, would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted.

He also argued that a bill of rights was unnecessary because Congress could only pass laws under the power granted to it by the Constitution. In Federalist 84 he wrote:

[W]hy declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do? Why, for instance, should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed?

In Federalist 85, Hamilton noted that the proposed national Constitution was just like New York State’s Constitution in that both lacked a “formal bill of rights” and “a provision respecting the liberty of the press.” However, Hamilton argued that in fact the new national Constitution provided “securities” to “liberty and to property” because it would limit the “ambition of powerful individuals in single States.” Like Madison, Hamilton believed that liberty would be best protected by a strong national government that would undermine local power. He believed that local interests were far more dangerous to liberty than any national government elected by the entire people of the nation. Similarly, in Federalist 78, Hamilton argued that the “independence of the judges” would “guard the Constitution and the rights of individuals from the effects of those ill humors, which the arts of designing men, or the influence of particular conjunctures, sometimes disseminate among the people themselves.” He believed that the judiciary would prevent the “serious oppression of the minor party in the community.” As a lawyer, Hamilton believed that the common law, republican government, and an independent judiciary would coalesce to protect fundamental civil liberties.

With the adoption of the Constitution, Hamilton became secretary of the treasury. In urging President George Washington to sign a bill to charter the Bank of the United States, Hamilton argued for an expansive concept of constitutional interpretation, especially the “necessary and proper clause” of Article I, section 8. This interpretation did not immediately affect civil liberties. However, Hamilton’s argued that Congress has implied powers, which presumably could be used to regulate some fundamental liberties. Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson opposed the bank and argued that the as-yet-to-be-ratified Tenth Amendment limited the powers of the national government and precluded the creation of a bank. Jefferson saw Hamilton’s nationalism as a threat to local government and civil liberties; Hamilton saw Jeffersonian localism as a threat to the nation, which in turn would leave minorities vulnerable to the political force of majorities.

Hamilton successfully persuaded Washington to call out troops to suppress the Whiskey Rebellion in 1794. The “rebellion” consisted mostly of farmers who did not want to pay an excise tax on the whiskey they produced from their corn. Hamilton successfully urged Washington to use 12,000 troops to suppress the rebellion. Hamilton’s strong response maintained the rule of law, but the episode made Hamilton appear to be supportive of oppression. In fact, he saw this event as being about the rule of law and the necessity of maintaining a civil society. Throughout his life Hamilton argued that liberty could thrive only under a strong government, which maintained stability and peace and kept local majorities from oppressing minorities.

Hamilton left government in 1795 to return to private law practice, but in 1796 drafted Washington’s farewell address. Here he repeated, with Washington speaking the words, his long-held views that a strong union “ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.” Using Hamilton’s speech, Washington warned that “where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction[s],” it would be impossible to “maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.”

In 1798 Hamilton opposed his party’s support for the Sedition Act. Hamilton considered suppression of newspapers to be both bad policy and bad law. A brilliant political writer, Hamilton doubtless believed that the best test of political ideology was in what Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. would call the “marketplace of ideas,” and that government should allow debate to be open and unconstrained by prosecution. In 1800 he tried to get the Federalists to replace John Adams with Charles Cotesworth Pinckney. This failed, but so did the Federalist Party. When the election was over, Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr had the same number of electoral votes. This sent the election to the House of Representatives. Although Jefferson mistrusted Hamilton, thinking he was a monarchist, Hamilton worked to secure Jefferson’s election, because Hamilton believed Burr to be dangerous and dishonest. With Jefferson in power, Hamilton started a newspaper to be part of the “loyal opposition.” However, by this time he was mostly involved in his law practice.

His law practice led to his defense of freedom of the press after Jefferson took office. While Jefferson is often seen as a defender of a free press, he in fact urged his supporters to prosecute Federalist editors at the state level. In 1804, Jefferson’s allies in New York prosecuted the Federalist publisher Harry Crosswell for common law seditious libel, after he criticized Jefferson (People v. Crosswell [1804]). Crosswell had accused Jefferson of paying James T. Callender to denounce George Washington and John Adams. Crosswell wanted to call Callender as a witness to prove the truth of his article, but the judge, a Jeffersonian Democrat, would not postpone the trial long enough to allow the witness to arrive. Not that it would have mattered. Reverting to the pre-Sedition Act theory of libel law, the trial judge, Lewis Morgan (who would soon become the Democratic governor of New York), in instructions to the jury, said that truth was not a defense to a libel prosecution. Crosswell appealed to New York’s highest court. In People v. Crosswell (1804), Hamilton, eloquently, but unsuccessfully, argued for the right of Crosswell to prove the truth of his accusations, and thus made a strong argument for a freedom of the press. Hamilton argued that “[t]he liberty of the press consisted in publishing with impunity, truth with good motives, and for justifiable ends, whether it related to men or to measures.” Without a free press, he argued, “you must for ever remain ignorant of what your rulers do.” Hamilton declared that his “soul has ever abhorred the thought, that a free man dared not speak the truth.” New York’s highest court was divided on whether to give Crosswell a new trial and so the conviction remained. However, in April 1805 the New York legislature passed a law declaring that truth would be a defense in a seditious libel case. In the wake of this statute, the state’s highest court ordered a new trial, which apparently never took place, and Crosswell went free. While Crosswell’s case was on appeal, Hamilton also represented Samuel Freer of Kingston, New York, the Federalist publisher of the Ulster Gazette, who was prosecuted on contempt of court by Jeffersonians for reporting on the Crosswell trial (People v. Freer [1804]). Freer had published an attack on the Crosswell prosecution, but not, he said, to attack the court, but rather in response to a vitriolic piece attacking his paper in the Jeffersonian paper, the Plebeian. The Jeffersonian majority on the Court charged him with contempt. In People v. Freer, the great jurist James Kent, reflecting Hamilton’s arguments, rejected any idea that Freer could be charged with libel for reprinting material from the Crosswell case, and said his motives—to answer a rival paper—were sufficient to relieve him of any criminal intent. Nevertheless, Kent gave Freer a token fine of $10.00 for his contempt towards the court itself.

Late in 1804 Hamilton was killed by Aaron Burr in a duel. His untimely death brought an end to the life of one of the most brilliant among the founders. Hamilton’s commitment to the rule of law, to personal liberty, and even to the right of personal property were significant forces in the subsequent development of civil liberties. His arguments in the cases of Croswell and Freer, late in his life, helped destroy the idea that the government could legitimately prosecute the political opposition, thus paving the way for a free press.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Finkelman, Paul. "Alexander Hamilton, Esq.: Founding Father as Lawyer." American Bar Foundation Research Journal 1984 (1984): 229–52.
- Levy, Leonard W. The Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- McDonald, Forrest. Alexander Hamilton: A Biography. New York: Norton, 1979.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- People v. Croswell*, 3 Johns Cas. 337 (N.Y. Sup. 1804)
- People v. Freer*, 1 Cai. R. 485, Cole. & Cai. Cas. 300 (N.Y. Sup. 1803)

HAMILTON, ANDREW (1676–1741)

Andrew Hamilton, early American attorney and political figure, most famous for defending John Peter Zenger in a seditious libel suit, was most likely born in Scotland and probably attended the University of St. Andrews. Records are sparse regarding Hamilton's early life; the name of his parents and his place and exact date of birth are unknown. It is suspected that Hamilton arrived in Virginia in 1697, but there is no conclusive evidence. His name first appeared in colonial records in 1700. Since he did not open his law practice until 1703, it is highly probable that Hamilton learned law from self-study or through an office of an established attorney. Hamilton became a man of prominence; he inherited a substantial estate from friends and his practice grew in Accomac and Northampton Counties, Virginia. On March 6, 1706 or 1707, Hamilton and Ann Brown Preeson married. The couple had three children.

Around 1709, the Hamiltons moved from the eastern shore of Virginia to Kent County, Maryland, where his law practice grew slowly. Hamilton's work took him to Philadelphia, where he met William Penn's proprietary agent, James Logan. Soon after, he managed the Penn family's legal concerns. In representing the Penn family, the attorney helped settle a famous dispute. The conflict arose when the Penn family and Lord Baltimore disagreed over the boundary of Maryland. In 1713, Hamilton traveled to England to gain more professional prestige. While overseas, he was admitted to Gray's Inn of Courts and the English bar. When Hamilton returned to the colonies, he was elected to Maryland's House of Delegates, but settled in Philadelphia in either late 1715 or early 1716. Although business kept him in London in 1724 and 1725, Hamilton's permanent residence was in Philadelphia until his death.

Throughout Hamilton's lifetime, the prominent lawyer stayed in the public eye. In 1717, Hamilton was appointed attorney general of Pennsylvania, and in 1720 became a member of the provincial council. Some of the other positions Hamilton held were master of the rolls, prothonotary of Philadelphia, recorder for Philadelphia, Bucks County representative in the Pennsylvania assembly, Kent County representative in the Delaware assembly, and Speaker of both assemblies. Hamilton also designed and oversaw the construction of the Pennsylvania assembly's Independence Hall.

Andrew Hamilton's legacy lies in his 1735 defense of John Peter Zenger, with his argument that truth could be a defense against libel. New York Governor William Cosby's administration accused Zenger, a German immigrant and publisher of the New York Weekly Journal, of seditious libel. At the time, a jury's only duty was to decide whether the accused was guilty of printing the material. It was the judge who determined whether the questionable writing was libelous. Chief Justice James DeLancey and Second Judge Frederic Philipse disbarred Zenger's attorneys, James Alexander and William Smith, after they questioned the authority of the judges. The defendant's lawyers accused the judges of being improperly commissioned. Although after the incident a local attorney was appointed, Zenger's supporters wanted Andrew Hamilton for counsel, who was known as the best lawyer in the colonies.

Hamilton chose to defend Zenger and won the famous suit. He asked the jury to disregard the law and acquit his client, since the statements that Zenger made were factual. The bold attorney also argued that in order for free government to prosper, the civil liberty of freedom of the press must be ensured. The jury found the defendant not guilty, and Zenger was welcomed back into the community as a free man. Had there been a guilty verdict, Zenger would have been at the mercy of the judges who were strongly influenced by Governor Cosby.

Following the New York court case, Hamilton returned to Philadelphia and continued to be speaker of the Pennsylvania assembly until his retirement in 1739. Although no longer in the assembly, he held other positions that were chiefly administrative in nature. Hamilton, who was preceded in death by his wife, died August 4, 1741. His son, James Hamilton, later become governor of Pennsylvania. There is difficulty assessing Hamilton's career without bias since many documents and records are lost or incomplete. Nevertheless, contemporaries viewed Hamilton as the most powerful trial attorney in the colonies, and he has the legacy of defending the freedom of the press.

HEIDI SCOTT GIUSTO

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, James. A Brief Narrative of the Case and Trial of John Peter Zenger. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1972.
- Buranelli, Vincent. The Trial of Peter Zenger. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1975.
- Konkle, Burton Alva. The Life of Andrew Hamilton, 1676–1741. Philadelphia: National Publishing Company, 1941.
- Lewis, Walker. Andrew Hamilton and the He-Monster, William and Mary Quarterly, 3rd ser., 38 (April 1981): 2:268–94.
- Morris, Richard B. Fair Trial. New York: Knopf, 1952.
- Nelson, Harold L., Seditious Libel in Colonial America, American Journal of Legal History 3 (April 1959): 2:160–72.
- Nix, Foster C., Andrew Hamilton's Early Years in the American Colonies, William and Mary Quarterly, 3rd ser., 21 (July 1964): 3:390–407.
- Rutherford, Livingston. John Peter Zenger: His Press, His Trial and a Bibliography of Zenger Imprints. New York: Johnson Reprint Corp., 1968.
- Vile, John R., ed. Great American Lawyers. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2001.

HAND, (BILLINGS) LEARNED (1872–1961)

Few twentieth-century American jurists, if any at all, attained the high reputation for judicial wisdom that Learned Hand enjoyed at the height of his career. Certainly no other judge on the U.S. Supreme Court ever achieved the respect and prestige that attached to him. The greatest living American jurist, said Benjamin Cardozo in a famous remark, isn't on the Supreme Court. In the view of Judge Charles E. Wyzanski, Learned Hand, at the end of his life, was universally acknowledged as the greatest living judge in the English-speaking world. Partly, no doubt, Hand's stature derived from his majestic presence: his rugged features, his penetrating glance, and above all, his incredibly bushy eyebrows—he looked somehow like an olympian dispenser of justice. Among the general public, his celebrity owed something to his first name. (Learned was his mother's maiden name and he used it as his own first name from his mid-twenties onward.) In the end, however,

Learned Hand's preeminence, particularly among lawyers, legal scholars, and fellow judges, rested on the legendary discernment, intellectual authority, and powerful eloquence of his judicial opinions.

Hand was born in Albany, New York, on January 27, 1872. His future career may have been predetermined by the fact that so many of his male relatives, including both his father and grandfather, were prominent attorneys. He was from his earliest days bookish, introspective, withdrawn, and socially insecure, and to some extent these traits would remain with him for the rest of his life. After receiving his preparatory education at Albany Academy, he entered Harvard College in 1889, a school still notable for its rigid student hierarchies. Hand was effectively excluded from the most aristocratic and prestigious social clubs, reinforcing his feelings of inferiority and habits of lonely studiousness. Like many other Harvard undergraduates, he fell under the spell of the brilliant triumvirate of the Philosophy Department, William James, Josiah Royce, and George Santayana. The encounter left him an agnostic, a confirmed skeptic regarding all received authority, and even more cerebral than before. He was briefly tempted by graduate work in philosophy, but surrendered to the wishes of his family and enrolled in the Harvard Law School in 1893. Hand was captivated by Harvard's case-method approach to the study of law, and by the school's erudite faculty. He graduated in 1896, only to quickly discover that he was far less enamored of the routine, day-to-day practice of law.

Nevertheless, he persevered. From 1897 until 1902, he practiced in Albany, but in 1902, engaged to be married and ambitious for a larger field, he moved to New York City. Legal work there proved no more stimulating than it had in Albany, and Hand sought fulfillment in other ways. He wrote some articles, including an attack, in the Harvard Law Review, on the Supreme Court's lack of judicial restraint in the majority decision in Lochner v. New York (1905). His principal diversion, however, was his association with a group of progressive, reform-minded intellectuals and activists. Hand himself participated in some reform crusades and came to the attention of Charles Culp Bulingham, an eminent attorney and civic reformer who was influential in Republican circles. It was a warm endorsement from Bulingham that got Hand appointed a federal judge; in 1909, President William Howard Taft nominated Hand, who was still in his mid-thirties, to be a district judge in New York City, the start of more than five decades on the federal bench. Felix Frankfurter later remarked that it took the pedestrian members of the profession some time to make their adjustment to this new planet in the judicial sky. Becoming a judge did not dampen Hand's enthusiasm for social reform. For the next ten years, he was an active member of a group of youthful intellectual reformers that included Herbert Croly, Walter Lippmann, Walter Weyl, and Frankfurter. They were enthusiastically loyal to the colorful former president, Theodore Roosevelt (Hand had first called Roosevelt's attention to Croly's influential book of 1909, The Promise of American Life), and Hand, although now a federal judge and appointed by Roosevelt's rival for the White House, engaged actively with his friends in the campaign to elect Roosevelt in 1912. This group of progressives advocated government regulation of the trusts (rather than breaking them up) and greater federal power and involvement in the economic life of the nation. In 1914, they created the leading journal of progressive politics, the New Republic, and Learned Hand was intimately involved, writing articles and editorials for the magazine and participating in its editorial conferences.

After World War I, perhaps following the private advice of his idol and hero, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Hand stepped back from his extrajudicial activities and devoted himself to his work as a judge. In 1924, President Calvin Coolidge appointed him to the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit; he was to serve as chief judge from 1939 to his retirement in 1951. During his half-century as a judge, he handed down thousands of decisions, touching virtually every aspect of American law. His opinions were crafted with exquisite care and were often characterized by a noble and persuasive elegance. Despite his breaking new ground in several areas of the law, he was firmly committed to the philosophy of judicial restraint, the belief that judges must try to keep their personal views out of the decision-making process and interpret the law by giving fullest latitude to the intentions of the elected branches of government. This stance placed him in the company of such eminent twentieth-century jurists as Holmes, Louis Brandeis, and Felix Frankfurter; he rejected the judicial activism often associated with judges such as Earl Warren and William O. Douglas. In 1958, Hand gave his view of the importance of restraint typically lofty expression in his Holmes Lectures at Harvard, published as The Bill of Rights.

His most notable work in the area of civil liberties involved the much contested area of freedom of speech and the reach of the First Amendment. In the World War I case of Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten (1917), Hand ruled that the federal government acted wrongly in banning the radical antiwar magazine, The Masses, from the mails, despite the fact that the power to do so was granted by the Espionage Act of 1917. In his eloquent (and, given the fevered wartime circumstances, his courageous) opinion, Hand proposed an extremely broad definition of protected speech. If the actual words of a speaker or writer directly urged hearers or readers to violate the law, if the speaker incited illegality, the utterance fell outside of the protection of the First Amendment and the government could act against such speech. But, Hand insisted, any dissent that fell outside of this incitement test was not only protected speech and beyond the ability of the government to suppress but, even more, was a vital concomitant to a free society. Gerald Gunther, Hand's finest biographer, has written that the Masses case compelled Hand to draw on his deepest personal resources of courage and independence and evoked the most important, pathbreaking opinion of his trial court tenure.

To Learned Hand's great disappointment, his decision was overturned by the Court of Appeals, and two years later, in the famous Schenk v. United States (1919) case, the Supreme Court adopted Justice Holmes's clear and present danger test, which Hand believed was too subjective, too dependent on guessing the probable outcome of a speech act, and too subject to the momentary and inflamed passions of the majority. Although Hand was able to persuade Holmes to partially liberalize his view (as in his dissent in the Abrams v. United States case of 1919), it was the more speech-restrictive clear and present danger test that prevailed in freedom of speech cases for the next five decades. Hand went to his grave thinking that his own incitement standard was decisively rejected. But, eight years after his death, the Supreme Court, in Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), moved to a position very close to Hand's view of 1917.

The precarious situation of civil liberties during the cold war forced Hand to negotiate between two of his most strongly held beliefs. On the one hand, as a resolute defender of American freedoms, Hand could hardly have approved of the assaults on those freedoms inherent in McCarthyism and other aspects of the anticommunist crusades of the 1950s. Hand responded to this crisis in civil liberties with a series of plainspoken statements, warning against the erosion of constitutional liberties. When he could, he used his position on the bench to protect basic rights, such as when, in United States v. Coplon (1950), he reversed the conviction of a spy, whose guilt was clear, because she had been arrested without a warrant and tried on the basis of improper wiretap evidence. Both his extrajudicial statements and some of his opinions made him subject to vehement denunciations, delivered in the passionate and fearful atmosphere of cold war America.

At the same time, however, Hand was also wedded to his philosophy of judicial restraint. Under that persuasion, he ruled to uphold the convictions of eleven Communist Party leaders in United States v. Dennis (1950). They had been found guilty, in a lower court, of violating the prohibition in the Smith Act of 1940 against advocating the violent overthrow of the U.S. government. In affirming the convictions, Hand understood his duty as applying Holmes's clear and present danger test and not insisting on his own more speech-generous incitement test, which, he thought, had been definitively rejected by the Supreme Court back in 1919. Nevertheless, even while upholding the convictions, Hand's careful opinion (later adopted by the majority on the Supreme Court) attempted to define the Holmes test in as speech friendly a way as he could. He did so by attempting to factor into the judgment the question of the gravity of the evil being advocated, contending that only a very grave evil could excuse the government from having to show that the speech act was likely to lead, soon and directly, to a breach of the law.

To the regret of many of his admirers, no president nominated Learned Hand to serve on the Supreme Court. Although his name was mentioned whenever there was a vacancy, he was a serious candidate only twice. In the 1920s, Chief Justice Taft, remembering Hand's betrayal in the election of 1912 and wary of his liberalism, was able to forestall the nomination each time a seat came open; and in the early 1940s, Franklin Roosevelt, who admired the seventy-year-old Hand and who was pressed by Frankfurter and others to nominate him, desired to leave a more lasting impact on the Court and turned to younger men. Hand formally retired from active duty in 1951, but he continued to serve, sometimes carrying almost as full a judicial burden as ever. During the last years of his long life, he was held in such universal respect and esteem and was the subject of such unrestrained praise and honor, that even he must have had reason occasionally to question the appropriateness of his lifelong modesty and to wonder whether the nagging self-doubt that had always characterized and often plagued him, was entirely justified. He died, in New York City, on August 18, 1961.

DAVID W. LEVY

References and Further Reading

- Dilliard, Irving, ed. The Spirit of Liberty: Papers and Addresses of Learned Hand. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1952.
- Frankfurter, Felix, Judge Learned Hand, 60 Harvard Law Review (1947): 325–9.
- Griffith, Kathryn. Judge Learned Hand and the Role of the Federal Judiciary. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1973.

- Gunther, Gerald. Learned Hand: The Man and the Judge. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.
- Hand, B. Learned. The Bill of Rights. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1958.
- Wyzanski, Charles E., Jr. Introduction to The Bill of Rights, by Learned Hand. New York: Atheneum, 1964.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1965)
- Lochner v. New York*, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
- Masses Publish Co. v. Patten*, 244 U.S. 535 (1917)
- Schenck v. United States*, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
- United States v. Coplon*, 185 F.2d 629 (2d Cir. 1950)
- United States v. Dennis*, 183 F.2d 201 (2d Cir. 1950)

See also Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969); Clear and Present Danger Test; Communism and the Cold War; Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951); Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Masses Publishing Company v. Patten, 244 U.S. 535 (1917)

HARISIADES v. SHAUGHNESSY, 342 U.S. 580 (1952)

This is an important civil liberties case dealing with the constitutional status of legally resident aliens decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1952. In Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, the Court held that in spite of having legally resided in the U.S. for almost forty years since he first came to America at age thirteen, defendant Harisiades could be legally deported under the Alien Registration Act of 1940. The act amended existing law in order to authorize deportation of a legally resident alien who had been a member of an organization advocating the overthrow of the U.S. government by force or violence even where the alien's membership in the group had ended prior to passage of the act.

Harisiades had been a member of the Communist Party between 1925 and 1939 when he quit the organization because he did not support the use of force or violence. An American citizen, engaged in the same conduct as Harisiades during the same time period could not, of course, be deported, but the government was constitutionally entitled to deport Harisiades since legally resident aliens had (and have) fewer rights than U.S. citizens.

In his opinion for the Court, apparently trying to make the distinction between citizens and aliens seem less objectionable, Justice Robert Jackson argued that by maintaining American residence but Greek citizenship, Harisiades could "derive advantages from two sources of law—American and international." That, however, was true of U.S. citizens as well since international law protects—and binds—U.S. citizens just like domestic law. Jackson himself had famously participated as lead prosecutor for the United States in the application of international law to Nazi war criminals in Nuremberg, Germany, only seven years earlier. The Court was, perhaps, making the best of a bad situation: trying to uphold a law during the heyday of anticommunism whose hostility to civil liberty was entirely transparent.

ANTHONY CHASE

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Due Process in Immigration; Ex Post Facto Clause; Noncitizens, Civil Liberties

HARLAN, JOHN MARSHALL, THE ELDER (1833–1911)

John Marshall Harlan the Elder was the first justice on the U.S. Supreme Court to argue consistently that the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution applied the Bill of Rights to state action via the amendment's due process and privileges and immunities clauses. This idea is called "incorporation theory" because it holds that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporates the Bill of Rights. Harlan's distinctive judicial record—including his support for incorporation theory, for the application of the Bill of Rights to all United States territory, and for civil rights protections for black Americans—arose from his loyalty to a vision of constitutional nationalism. These were some of the legal issues that provoked impassioned dissents from Justice Harlan and earned him the title of Great Dissenter.

Slaveholder and Unionist

The future justice's father, James Harlan, a Kentucky slaveholder and Whig Party leader, instilled this constitutional nationalism in his son. The Whig Party broke apart over the slavery issue during the 1850s, but John Harlan's devotion to the Union prompted him to organize a Union Army regiment in 1861 at the start of the Civil War. Harlan's position as a proslavery Unionist became an increasingly uncomfortable one as President Abraham Lincoln decided that the emancipation of Southern slaves was a military necessity. Harlan resigned his commission in the army in early 1863, shortly after the Emancipation Proclamation and his father's death. For the next four years, Harlan reminded the voters at every election that the war had been fought to save the Union, not in order to free the slaves.

But a series of events forced Harlan to reconsider. He had devoted himself to both the Constitution and a benign vision of slavery, but he faced a new constitution as the war ended in early 1865. First, the states ratified the Thirteenth Amendment that freed the slaves in late 1865, and then, the Fourteenth Amendment that guaranteed civil rights to black citizens in late 1868. Harlan also faced former Confederates who terrorized freed blacks and white Unionists in Kentucky. Harlan came to believe that the Civil War amendments to the Constitution were a providential correction of the original proslavery flaws of the founding document. When Harlan ran as a Republican for governor of Kentucky in 1871, he defended the civil rights of blacks as a fulfillment of the country's mission and celebrated the end of slavery. But these were not popular ideas among Kentucky white men. Harlan lost that election and the next in 1875. But, he had caught the attention of Rutherford B. Hayes who would be elected president in 1876. As a Republican and a Southern nominee to the Supreme Court, Harlan fulfilled Hayes's political and regional agendas. Despite some opposition, Harlan was confirmed by the U.S. Senate in 1877.

Justice Harlan became a champion of black civil rights by dissenting from the Court's stingy interpretations of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments in the Civil Rights Cases in 1883 and Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896. In the first, the Court held that private owners of businesses that served the public, such as railroads and inns, might segregate or exclude blacks. According to the Court, the Thirteenth Amendment did not apply because segregation was not a badge of slavery; the Fourteenth Amendment did not apply because it targeted only the states. But in the second decision, the Court held that a state law ordering segregation did not violate the civil rights of blacks either; such a law only affected so-called social rights. Harlan dissented alone and vigorously each time that segregation was the kind of racial discrimination that the amendments were meant to end. In his Plessy dissent, Harlan declared that the Constitution is color blind.

Justice Harlan followed out the logic of his view that the amendments had fundamentally altered the relationship of the states to the country's citizens by arguing that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated the provisions of the Bill of Rights. This interpretation violated rules of constitutional draftsmanship according to which nothing is repeated and a term used once has the same meaning when used again. The Fifth Amendment guarantees due process, so according to these rules, other rights and liberties found in the Fifth Amendment and in the other amendments are not covered by the term “due process of law.” Harlan objected that such a conclusion would lead to decisions contrary to fundamental principles of republican government.

Incorporation Theory

Harlan argued for incorporation theory for the first time in his dissent from Hurtado v. California in 1884. California had altered its constitution in 1879 to eliminate a grand jury indictment for felonies in favor of prosecution on information filed by the district attorney. Speaking for the Court, Justice Stanley Matthews declared that so long as fundamental rights were protected, the state could use any process so long as the process was not arbitrary or partial. The Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause did not incorporate the Fifth Amendment’s guarantee against self-incrimination: “No person shall be held for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand jury....” Justice Harlan dissented alone. In other public forums, he voiced a heart-felt veneration for the jury system as the embodiment of republican government. Juries allowed the ordinary men of the community to do justice and confounded the hasty opinions of the ignorant and the snobbish concerns of legal experts. From the bench, he responded vigorously to the argument of Hurtado’s attorney that a grand jury indictment for a capital crime was a venerable, time-honored institution under both English and American law that protected public liberty and private rights. The Fourteenth Amendment fulfilled the founders’ plans by applying these essential guarantees to individuals confronted with the power of the states. Harlan explained that the secrecy of grand jury investigations protected those targeted because of their race or because of popular hostility from mobs, abuses of official power, and personal vendettas.

Only in O’Neil v. Vermont in 1892 did Harlan find some support from his brethren for incorporation theory. O’Neil was a New York liquor merchant who had been convicted by a Vermont court for selling his goods in Vermont, a dry state. O’Neil was convicted of 307 separate sales and sentenced by a justice of the peace to a fine of over $9,000 or a potential seventy-nine-year sentence; the county court reduced the fine to $6,140 or fifty-four years. O’Neil appealed to the Supreme Court, which ruled that the Eighth Amendment, which prohibits cruel and unusual punishment, did not apply to the states. Both Justices Stephen J. Field and Harlan filed dissents. Field protested that O’Neil would be serving far more jail time than criminals convicted of manslaughter or highway robbery. Field went on to argue that such shipments were a part of interstate commerce and so outside of state jurisdiction. Justice Harlan disagreed with Field’s Commerce Clause argument, but he seconded Field’s point on incorporation theory. He argued that none of the fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property as guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution could be abridged by a state since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. These included those guarantees found in the Bill of Rights and others. O’Neil was a high mark in Justice Harlan’s success in advancing incorporation theory among his brethren, for Justice David J. Brewer concurred in his dissent as well.

Justice Harlan expanded upon the constitutional necessity of a common law jury trial in his dissent from Maxwell v. Dow in 1900. The Court had approved prosecution on information again as well as Utah’s decision to reduce the number of jurors in a jury trial from twelve to eight. Justice Rufus Peckham declared for the Court that the number of persons in a jury was up to the state so long as the same process applied to all defendants. But the founders’ Bill of Rights remained Harlan’s touchstone. He did not see how anyone could doubt that the founding fathers considered the privileges and immunities found in the Bill of Rights to be vital to the personal security of American citizens. He detailed a parade of horrible hypotheticals in which states violated every provision of the Bill of Rights, such as Utah would establish Mormonism as the state religion, and another jurisdiction would burn criminals at the stake. According to Peckham’s reasoning, Harlan warned, the Court could not hold any of these actions to be violations of the Constitution. It was no answer that none of these horrors had yet come to pass. He argued that liberty depends not merely on the absence of oppression; it requires the existence of constitutional checks on the power to oppress. As Justice Matthews had in Hurtado, Justice Peckham minimized the national government’s role in protecting rights in Maxwell. He also minimized the protections found in the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. As in Hurtado, the other justices approved these innovations in Maxwell and Justice Harlan dissented alone. Only he feared a frightening constitutional future should this line of argument prevail.

Justice Harlan believed one of his dire prophecies had come true in regards to the guarantees of the First Amendment: the free press clause. In 1907, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. held that the Fourteenth Amendment did not prevent the Supreme Court of Colorado from punishing a newspaper publisher for running articles that questioned its motives in Patterson v. Colorado in 1907. The state court had held that the cases mentioned by the publisher were still technically pending (because the litigants might petition for a rehearing) and that such comments interfered with the course of justice and contrary to the public welfare. When the publisher appealed to the Court, Justice Holmes held that such a judgment was entirely a state question. Justice David J. Brewer protested in dissent that the Court should confront the constitutional issue raised and determine Patterson's rights. Justice Harlan went much further. He wrote an impassioned dissent arguing that the Fourteenth Amendment applied the First Amendment's guarantees of freedom of speech and of the press to the states. He made the most of what little the Court had acceded to black citizens by citing the Civil Rights Cases and United States v. Cruikshank (1876) in order to demonstrate that the right of the people to assemble and to petition their government—a right found in the First Amendment—was an aspect of national citizenship. It followed that citizens were guaranteed the First Amendment rights of freedom of speech and of the press as well, not merely freedom from prior restraints—as Justice Holmes had indicated—but also from subsequent punishment. The public welfare could not trump these constitutional privileges. Justice Harlan concluded that freedom of speech and of the press were essential components of liberty guaranteed by the Constitution from interference from the nation or by the states.

A year later, Harlan again argued alone and fruitlessly in favor of incorporation theory when he dissented from Twining v. New Jersey in 1908. Albert C. Twining and his codefendant were bank directors who had been convicted of trying to mislead a bank examiner. The state judge, following state rulings, had suggested that the jurors might take into consideration the failure of the men to testify in their own defense and their attorneys objected. Justice William H. Moody held for the Court that the Fifth Amendment clause against self-incrimination was not incorporated in the Fourteenth Amendment. The protection against self-incrimination was a modern invention, he reasoned, and could not be ranked among the essential protections. Justice Harlan again harked back to the founders to protest. He wrote that the men who had decided the federal Constitution would have been appalled at the idea that immunity from self-incrimination had not been a fundamental principle of English common law. Again, he conjured up a parade of horrors contrary to American law and the spirit of American liberty.

The Insular Cases

Harlan was equally troubled when the Court determined that Congress might refuse to apply the whole of the Bill of Rights to federal territory that it controlled following the Spanish-American War in 1898. In the Insular Cases of 1901, Delima v. Bidwell and Downes v. Bidwell, a divided Court determined that some rights would be retained by the territorial inhabitants of Puerto Rico, but refused to specify which. The dissenters, Justice Harlan among them, were appalled at the implications of the decision. They were also unimpressed by the insistence of the Court that the administration of an overseas empire demanded certain flexibility in regards to constitutional rights. Justice Harlan warned that if the Court's decision was allowed to stand, the United States would end an era of liberty protected by a written constitution into an era of legislative tyranny. Justice Harlan also dissented from Hawaii v. Mankichi in 1903 when the Court held that the Constitution did not require a grand jury indictment or a jury of twelve in federal territories. When the Court held that there was no constitutional guarantee of a jury trial in the Philippines in Dorr v. United States in 1904, Harlan declared its reasoning to be revolting to his mind. It was as though the majority thought the Constitution read, "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, and except where Filipinos are concerned, shall be by jury."

From Eccentric to Prophet

When Justice Harlan drew up a list of decisions that he wanted gathered in a volume to commemorate his work on the bench, he included his dissenting opinions from the Civil Rights Cases, Hurtado, Plessy, Maxwell, Twining, Hawaii v. Mankichi, and Dorr. Although Harlan would not have approved of the piecemeal incorporation of the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment that occurred in the twentieth century, he would have probably approved of the results. Gitlow v. New York in 1925 marked the beginning by holding freedom of speech and of the press were included in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Twining was overruled in Malloy v. Hogan in 1964. Criminal defendants benefited further from Powell v. Alabama in 1932, which held that due process in state court requires that counsel for indigents charged with capital crimes, and Gideon v. Wainwright in 1963, which required counsel for all indigent state felony defendants. But it was Brown v. Board of Education in 1954, the first public school desegregation decision, that overturned Plessy and brought sustained scholarly attention to Justice Harlan. He has been a perennial presence on lists of great judges ever since. In the decades after his death, Justice Harlan was considered something of an eccentric for his dissents in civil rights and civil liberties cases. By the mid-twentieth century, he was being hailed as a prophet for these very same opinions.

LINDA PRZYBYSZEWSKI

References and Further Reading

- Bartosic, Florian, The Constitution, Civil Liberties and John Marshall Harlan, Kentucky Law Journal 46 (1958): 407–77.
- Fairman, Charles, Does the Fourteenth Amendment Incorporate the Bill of Rights? The Original Understanding, Stanford Law Review 2 (1949): 5–173.
- Przybyszewski, Linda. The Republic According to John Marshall Harlan. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.
- Waite, Edward F., How “Eccentric” Was Mr. Justice Harlan? Minnesota Law Review 37 (1953): 173–87.
- Westin, Alan F., John Marshall Harlan and the Constitutional Rights of Negroes: The Transformation of a Southerner, Yale Law Journal 66 (1957): 637–710.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Board of Education*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Civil Rights Cases*, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
- Delima v. Bidwell*, 182 U.S. 244 (1901)
- Dorr v. United States*, 195 U.S. 138 (1904)
- Downes v. Bidwell*, 182 U.S. 1 (1901)
- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- Hawaii v. Mankichi*, 190 U.S. 197 (1903)
- Hurtado v. California*, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)
- Malloy v. Hogan*, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
- Maxwell v. Dow*, 176 U.S. 581 (1900)
- O’Neil v. Vermont*, 144 U.S. 343 (1892)
- Patterson v. Colorado*, 205 U.S. 454 (1907)
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
- Powell v. Alabama*, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
- Twining v. New Jersey*, 211 U.S. 78 (1908)
- United States v. Cruikshank*, 92 U.S. 542 (1876)

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954); Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883); Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally; Fourteenth Amendment; Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963); Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925); Grand Jury Indictment (V); Jury Trial; Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896); Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932); Press Clause (I): Framing and History from Colonial Period up to Early National Period; Prior Restraints; Privileges and Immunities (XIV); Self-Incrimination (V); Historical Background; Thirteenth Amendment; United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876)

HARLAN, JOHN MARSHALL, II (1899–1971)

John Marshall Harlan served as U.S. Supreme Court Justice from 1955 to 1971. His tenure spanned almost all of the Warren Court years (1953–1969) and extended into the Burger Court. He was the son, grandson, and great-grandson of lawyers, and the grandson of John Marshall Harlan, who also served on the Supreme Court, from 1877 to 1911.

Harlan was educated at Princeton (where he was class president), Oxford, and New York Law School. He was both a federal and state prosecutor and a Wall Street lawyer in private practice. He served less than a year as a judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit before President Eisenhower nominated him to the Supreme Court to replace Robert H. Jackson.

Harlan was greatly admired for the craftsmanship of his opinions and the civility and warmth of his manner. His biographer refers to him as the “great dissenter of the Warren Court.”

Harlan indeed frequently dissented from the Warren Court’s decisions. He parted ways with the majority in such landmark opinions as Miranda v. Arizona (1966), Reynolds v. Sims (1964, one-person, one-vote legislative apportionment), and Mapp v. Ohio (1961, exclusionary rule for evidence obtained through unreasonable searches and seizures applied to states). Even when he joined the Court’s opinions, Harlan frequently concurred separately to indicate that his agreement was limited. “Upon the foregoing premises, I join the opinion of the Court,” Harlan often wrote.

But dismissing Harlan as an inveterate naysayer would oversimplify his jurisprudence and underestimate his judgeship. For one thing, Harlan was admired as a craftsman and intellectual by his colleagues, who also appreciated Harlan’s respect, civility, and warmth. Harlan’s dissents “seared, but never burned,” Chief Justice Earl Warren said. Harlan maintained close relationships with both Felix Frankfurter, with whom he often agreed on constitutional issues, and Hugo Black, with whom he frequently disagreed. Justice Sandra Day O’Connor has extolled Harlan as the exemplar of judicial collegiality.

Harlan also cannot be easily pigeonholed because he did not invariably vote against citizen rights. For example, he concurred in the right to counsel case, Gideon v. Wainwright (1963). He joined the Court in enforcing the mandate of Brown v. Board of Education (1954, 1955). He reversed convictions of Communist Party members in Yates v. United States (1957), one of several such Court opinions countering the McCarthyism of the 1950s. Harlan also dissented forcefully in Poe v. Ullman (1961), arguing for a constitutional right to privacy.

Harlan's votes for and against individual liberties are only superficially inconsistent. Understood in the context of Harlan's philosophy, his decisions appear more consistent. He was motivated by several values that explain and unify his opinions. First, he was a believer in the process approach to judicial decision making. His was an analytical style based on history and precedent. If a Warren Court decision lacked precedential support, or was unfaithful to precedent, Harlan unhesitatingly noted the flaw.

Harlan also valued federalism. His federalism was not the nationalism of the old Federalists, but a respect for the values of state sovereignty and diversity and the constitutional balance of state and federal power. To Harlan, timeless principles of federalism were more important than a contemporary judge's notion of what was "right" or "just."

Harlan also preferred the political process to the judicial process in rectifying social injustice. It was not the function of the judiciary to cure social problems or promote equality, Harlan argued.

These beliefs cautioned Harlan against what he regarded as the errors of the Warren Court. He argued against the incorporation doctrine, by which the Court incorporated selected provisions of the Bill of Rights into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Fourteenth Amendment did not necessarily have the same content as the Bill of Rights. Specifically, the due process clause did not impose precisely the same limits upon the states that the Bill of Rights required of the federal government.

But Harlan also believed that the Fourteenth Amendment protects basic rights. Those rights were not necessarily found in the Bill of Rights, but were independent guarantees of the due process clause, rooted in their historical and fundamental character. As he wrote in his concurrence in Gideon, the question for Harlan was whether a right protected against the federal government was "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty" that the due process clause represented, and therefore the right was valid against the states. The answer could not be found in any shortcut by looking at the Bill of Rights to see whether the right was enshrined there, but had to be found case by case.

In Harlan's hierarchy of civil liberties, these were among the rights sufficiently fundamental to be worthy of protection against the states: the right to counsel (Gideon v. Wainwright); the freedom of association (NAACP v. Alabama [1958]); the freedom of expression (Cohen v. California [1971]); marital privacy (Poe v. Ullman, Griswold v. Connecticut [1965]); and protection against cruel and unusual punishment (Robinson v. California [1962]). In these areas, Harlan was not merely willing to accede to the Warren Court majority; he wrote the Court's opinions in Cohen and NAACP v. Alabama, and presaged Griswold with his earlier dissent in Poe.

Harlan assailed the incorporation doctrine as unprincipled and not historically grounded, lacking sufficient regard for the importance of the states and, as he argued in his concurrence in Griswold v. Connecticut, unduly restrictive of the reach of due process. Harlan was no more satisfied with "selective incorporation" of the Bill of Rights than he was with the idea of "total incorporation."

But Harlan's approach seemed no more certain or expansive than the Warren Court majority's. His view of the Fourteenth Amendment depended no less on an opinion that the right enforced against the states was sufficiently important. As he wrote in Griswold, Harlan would turn for guidance to "the teachings of history, . . . basic values that underlie our society, and wise appreciation of the great roles [of] the doctrines of federalism and separation of powers. . . ." And although he argued that the incorporation doctrine was more restrictive, in practice it frequently resulted in more, rather than less, protection than Harlan's vision of the Fourteenth Amendment. This was most notably true in the areas of criminal procedural rights and reapportionment.

Next to Justice Warren and the majority of the Warren Court, whose approach emphasized justice more than principle, judicial activism rather than restraint, Harlan was noticeably out of step. Harlan was on the losing end of many issues.

In Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections (1966), for example, he dissented from an opinion that poll taxes were unconstitutional. He condemned judicial imposition of an "ideology of 'unrestrained egalitarianism'" that he failed to find in the equal protection clause, which he thought limited to race. Harlan not only distrusted judicial interpretation of the Constitution as uncertain, he trusted in the political process to remedy what he saw as political problems. For much the same reasons, Harlan had declined to follow the court in its landmark state legislative apportionment case, Baker v. Carr (1962).

Harlan's disagreement and frustration with the Warren Court was perhaps no more evident than in his dissent in Reynolds v. Sims, in which he denounced the notion "that every major social ill in this country can find its cure in some constitutional principle and that this court should take the lead in promoting reform when other branches of government fail to act. The Constitution is not a panacea for every blot upon the public welfare. . . ."

Harlan, the former prosecutor, refused to join the Court in many of its opinions enforcing criminal procedural rights against the states. For example, he resisted Mapp v. Ohio, which applied the exclusionary rule to the states, as over-reaching the issue presented. In matters of criminal procedure, Harlan again distinguished the Fourteenth Amendment that binds the states from the Bill of Rights that governs the federal government. The states were subject to the broad due process requirements of fundamental fairness, but the federal government was confined more closely by specific limits such as the reasonableness standard of the Fourth Amendment's search and seizure provision.

The difficulty of labeling Harlan a conservative dissenter or opponent of civil liberty is illustrated by his dissent in Poe v. Ullman. Poe ranks as one of the most famous and influential dissents of modern times. Harlan's opinion soon led to a decision on the contraceptives issue in Griswold v. Connecticut, and ultimately reverberated in the abortion decision in Roe v. Wade (1973). The Court's majority declined to hear the case as not justiciable. Harlan thought the Court should face the issue created by plaintiff's declaratory judgment actions attacking a Connecticut statute criminalizing the use of contraceptive devices.

Harlan's Poe dissent not only typifies Harlan's scholarly, analytical and thorough work but also exemplifies his Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence. Harlan was not constrained by the text of the Bill of Rights in finding that the Constitution protected a right to privacy. He need only find that such a right was sufficiently historically grounded and important to liberty that it be enforced against the states via the Fourteenth Amendment. Harlan recognized that the due process guaranteed by the Constitution was not merely procedural, but also protected fundamental substantive rights.

What rankled Harlan in Poe was that Connecticut criminalized the private conduct of married couples. Intimate marital relationships were not subject to intrusion by the state, which could search, seize, and subject to public trial the private details of marital privacy. The Connecticut statute was saved neither by its rationality nor its purpose in regulating morality if it could lead to such intrusions. Given that the statute intruded upon "the privacy of the home in its most basic sense," the statute could not survive the "strict scrutiny" to which the courts should subject it. In Poe, Harlan stands as a staunch defender of a broad concept of constitutionally protected liberty.

Harlan also sided with individual liberty when he wrote for the Court in NAACP v. Alabama. Harlan held that the Fourteenth Amendment barred the Alabama courts from fining the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) for refusing to surrender its membership list. The court's order to produce the list overburdened the fundamental freedom of association.

A series of cases regarding the right to a jury trial illustrate the interplay between the Court's approach and Harlan's. In Duncan v. Louisiana (1968), the Court held, over Harlan's dissent, that a state criminal defendant is entitled to a jury trial in any case which, if brought in a federal court, would require a jury under the Sixth Amendment. For Harlan, that decision made the mistake of following the incorporation doctrine. However, it established that the states must provide jury trials.

Soon after Duncan, the Court began defining the contours of the jury that states must provide. In Williams v. Florida (1970), the Court approved a six-member jury. The Court declined to incorporate the federal standard of a jury of twelve, calling the number "a historical accident," and said that the Sixth Amendment was satisfied with a jury of six.

According to Harlan, the "necessary consequence" was that twelve-member juries were not constitutionally required in federal criminal trials either. In other words, Harlan argued, the Court's reluctance to strictly impose the Bill of Rights against the states via the incorporation doctrine threatened to dilute the Bill of Rights as against the federal government. It indirectly undercut the previously unquestioned federal practice of twelve-person juries to hold that the states, bound by the same Sixth Amendment that applied to the federal government, need not have twelve jurors. This was not only inconsistent, Harlan argued, it was hazardous to the Sixth Amendment.

The Court later took the matter a step further in holding that state juries need not be unanimous. In Johnson v. Louisiana (1972), the Court held that the due process clause itself did not mandate unanimity, and in Apodaca v. Oregon (1972), held that the Sixth Amendment's incorporation by the Fourteenth Amendment in Duncan v. Louisiana, did not require that the jury's vote be unanimous. Were Harlan still alive, he might have argued that the due process clause itself did not require unanimity, but that it threatened federal jury unanimity to hold that a state jury mandated by Sixth Amendment incorporation did not have to be unanimous. These cases revealed the Court majority to be inconsistent, not Harlan.

History cast John Marshall Harlan, like his namesake, in the role of dissenter. Even when he agreed with the Court's decisions on civil liberties, he often set forth separate reasons. When the Court enforced the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause beyond matters of race, and applied federal criminal procedures to state proceedings via incorporation, Harlan objected. To Harlan, the equal protection clause had a core meaning and the due process clause had force independent of the Bill of Rights. He found certain liberties so essential that due process must include them, and in cases implicating those rights he held that the Constitution barred the states from infringing on them.

JEFFERSON L. LANKFORD

References and Further Reading

- Schroeder, Andrew B., Keeping Police Out of the Bedroom: Justice John Marshall Harlan, Poe v. Ullman, and the Limits of Conservative Privacy, Virginia Law Review 86 (August 2000): 1045.
- Shapiro, David L., ed. The Evolution of a Judicial Philosophy: Selected Opinions and Papers of Justice John M. Harlan. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1969.
- White, G. Edward. The American Judicial Tradition: Profiles of Leading American Judges. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.
- . Earl Warren: A Public Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Yarbrough, Tinsely E. John Marshall Harlan: Great Dissenter of the Warren Court. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Apodaca v. Oregon*, 406 U.S. 404 (1972)
- Baker v. Carr*, 369 U.S. 186 (1962)
- Brown v. Board of Education*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), 349 U.S. 294 (1955)
- Cohen v. California*, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)
- Duncan v. Louisiana*, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)
- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections*, 383 U.S. 663 (1966)
- Johnson v. Louisiana*, 406 U.S. 356 (1972)
- Mapp v. Ohio*, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- NAACP v. Alabama*, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
- Poe v. Ullman*, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)
- Reynolds v. Sims*, 377 U.S. 533 (1964)
- Robinson v. California*, 370 U.S. 660 (1962)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Williams v. Florida*, 399 U.S. 78 (1970)
- Yates v. United States*, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)

See also Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972); Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954); Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971); Due Process; Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968); Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Frankfurter, Felix; Fourteenth Amendment; Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966); Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961); Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); NAACP v. Alabama Ex Rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958); O'Connor, Sandra Day; Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961);

Reapportionment; Right of Privacy; Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Warren Court; Warren, Earl; Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)

HARMELIN v. MICHIGAN, 501 U.S. 957 (1991)

In Harmelin v. Michigan, the Supreme Court revisited its holding in Solem v. Helm (1983) that the Eighth Amendment, applicable to states through the Fourteenth Amendment, prohibits grossly disproportionate sentences in criminal cases. Harmelin had been convicted in Michigan state court of possession of 672 grams of cocaine and had received a mandatory life sentence without the possibility of parole.

A five-member majority of the Court agreed only that the mandatory imposition of a life sentence without the possibility of parole did not violate the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the Eighth Amendment despite the factfinder's inability to evaluate any mitigating evidence, such as lack of prior felony convictions. Seven justices also agreed with the proposition that the Eighth Amendment imposes some requirement of proportionality in sentencing.

Justice Scalia announced the opinion of the Court, but was joined only by Chief Justice Rehnquist in his radical assertion that Solem should be overruled because the Eighth Amendment contains no proportionality guarantee. Justice Kennedy's concurrence, joined by two other justices, upheld Solem but altered its three-part test for determining whether a sentence is proportionate. It made the first prong—whether a punishment is grossly disproportionate to the crime—a threshold requirement before a judge may evaluate how a state punishes similar crimes (the second prong) or how other states punish the same crime (third prong). Kennedy's and Scalia's opinions read together make clear that a majority of the Court wishes at least to rein in the constitutional guarantee of proportionality in sentencing.

REBECCA L. BARNHART

References and Further Reading

- Bailey, Pamela L., Harmelin v. Michigan: Is the Eighth Amendment's Proportionality Guarantee Left an Empty Shell?, Pacific Law Journal 24 (October 1992): 221–73.
- Friedman, Lawrence M. Law in America: A Short History. New York: Modern Library, 2002.
- McGowan, Edward J. Eighth Amendment Proportionality in the Aftermath of Harmelin v. Michigan, New York Law School Journal of Human Rights 10 (Fall 1992): 185–222.

Meltzer, Stephen E. Harmelin v. Michigan: Contemporary Morality and Constitutional Objectivity, New England Law Review 27 (Spring 1993): 749–89.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277 (1983)

See also Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII); Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally; Fourteenth Amendment; Kennedy, Anthony McLeod; Proportionality Reviews; Rehnquist, William H.; Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962); Scalia, Antonin; Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277 (1983); Stare Decisis; Three Strikes/Proportionality

HARMLESS ERROR

During the mid-1800s, England observed the “exchequer rule” of automatic reversal. Under this rule, prejudice was presumed upon discovery of any trial error and a new trial was required whenever error was found. The inevitable result was a plethora of retrials at considerable cost to judicial economy, finality, witnesses, and litigants. During the early 1900s, American jurisdictions adopted harmless error statutes. The 1919 federal statute, which served as a model for many state statutes, required federal appellate courts to “give judgment after an examination of the entire record before the court, without regard to technical errors, defects, or exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties.” Today every American jurisdiction now employs some version of the “harmless error” rule.

The harmless error doctrine recognizes that not only is no one entitled to a perfect trial, but that perfect trials occur rarely, if ever. Nonetheless, until the mid-1960s, most courts automatically reversed criminal convictions upon a finding that the trial was tainted by constitutional error. Up to that point, appellate courts applied the harmless error rules only to nonconstitutional errors. In 1967, the Supreme Court in Chapman v. California (1967) held that, unless prejudice resulted from the mistake, even constitutional errors do not require reversal. A harmless error is a mistake during judicial proceedings that does not affect the substantial rights of the defendant. The purpose of the harmless error rule is to avoid “setting aside convictions for small errors or defects that have little, if any likelihood of having changed the result of the trial.”

By contrast, a plain error is a mistake of constitutional magnitude that compromises a structural right deemed essential to a fair trial. The mere existence of a structural defect in the constitution of the trial mechanism—for example, deprivation of the right to counsel—requires automatic reversal because such an error infects the entire trial process. Other constitutional errors involve “rights so basic to a fair trial that their infraction can never be treated as harmless error.” These include the right to an impartial judge, and the right to not be coerced into confessing. Other rights that may trigger automatic reversal include the right to a speedy trial, the right to be free from double jeopardy, the right to a representative jury, and the right to a representative grand jury.

The Chapman rule requires the beneficiary of the constitutional error—usually the government—to prove beyond a reasonable doubt “that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict.” Thus, if overwhelming error-free evidence supports the conviction, it will not be reversed.

The “harmless beyond a reasonable doubt” standard set forth in Chapman applies to courts on direct appeal, but does not apply to federal habeas corpus review of constitutional errors committed at trial. Instead, the Supreme Court in Brecht v. Abrahamson (1993), held that federal courts on habeas may not grant relief unless the error “had a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury’s verdict.”

RANDALL T. COYNE

References and Further Reading

Whitebread, Charles H., and Christopher Slobogin. Criminal Procedure. Mineola, NY: Foundation Press, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 22 (1967)

Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619 (1993)

HARPER v. VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF ELECTIONS, 383 U.S. 663 (1966)

In Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections, the U.S. Supreme Court considered whether conditioning the right to vote in state elections upon payment of an annual fee, or poll tax, violated the U.S. Constitution, specifically the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court addressed this issue previously in Breedlove v. Suttles (1937), unanimously upholding a Georgia statute generally requiring a poll tax as a prerequisite to voting. However, by 1966 only four states continued to exact a poll tax, and Congress had enacted the Twenty-Fourth Amendment, prohibiting the use of poll taxes in federal elections. In addition, the Court’s interpretation and application of the Equal Protection Clause was evolving. Writing for a majority of the Court in Harper and overruling Breedlove, Justice William O. Douglas concluded, “[A] state violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment whenever it makes the affluence of the voter or payment of any fee an electoral standard.”

At issue in Harper was a provision of the Virginia Constitution requiring payment of $1.50 as a precondition for voting. Virginia residents brought suit, challenging the provision as an unconstitutional violation of the Equal Protection Clause. Relying on Breedlove, a three-judge panel in the Eastern District of Virginia dismissed the complaint.

In overruling the district court, Justice Douglas acknowledged that the right to vote in state elections is not included in the text of the Constitution. However, he relied upon previous voter qualification cases to demonstrate that “once the franchise is granted to the electorate, lines may not be drawn which are inconsistent with the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.” The Court explained that determining whether a provision limiting suffrage is acceptable requires more than an inquiry into whether there is a rational basis for the categorization scheme. This heightened scrutiny for issues surrounding voting followed Reynolds v. Sims (1964), where the Court invalidated a voting district system that diluted the relative power of some citizens. Because, as Justice Douglas noted in Harper, “the right of suffrage is a fundamental matter in a free and democratic society” and voting is “preservative of other basic civil and political rights,” any classification that may restrain this fundamental right must be “closely scrutinized and carefully confined.”

In applying this searching review, the Court analogized wealth classifications to those based upon race, stating that both “are traditionally disfavored.” Justice Douglas concluded that because one’s wealth is not related to capacity for effective exercise of the right to vote, the consideration of that factor in voter qualifications constituted invidious discrimination.

The Court acknowledged that Harper marked a departure from its previous analysis of the poll tax issue. In discussing this departure, Justice Douglas underscored the fact that the definition of equal protection is not static, not “confined to historic notions of equality,” but is dynamic. Considering the fundamental importance of equal access to the vote, the Court concluded that the Equal Protection Clause required the reversal of the district court’s opinion.

Thus, Harper’s significance went beyond the termination of the use of the poll tax in state elections. It constituted yet another important decision expanding the franchise to more Americans and demonstrated the application of heightened equal protection scrutiny to classifications disadvantaging the poor.

REBECCA GOODGAME EBINGER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U.S. 277 (1937)

Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964)

HARRIS v. McRAE, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)

In 1965 Congress established Medicaid, a program in which it reimbursed states for a portion of the costs of providing medical care to the poor. Many members of Congress disagreed with the Supreme Court’s controversial decision in Roe v. Wade (1973), the case in which the Court recognized that women have a constitutional right under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to terminate their pregnancies. Beginning in 1976, Congress passed legislation, known as the Hyde Amendment, that denied reimbursement for abortions, even those deemed medically necessary, except those necessary to save the life of the mother. In Harris v. McRae, the Supreme Court found no constitutional barriers to this withholding of federal funds.

Cora McRae, a New York Medicaid recipient in the first trimester of an unwanted pregnancy, filed a suit in U.S. District Court alleging that the Hyde Amendment was unconstitutional. She alleged that it violated the establishment clause of the First Amendment because it mirrored the Roman Catholic Church’s teachings that abortion is a sin and that human life begins at conception. Refusal to provide federal funds to support abortion also was inconsistent, she claimed, with the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment’s due process clause because Medicaid reimbursed medical expenses associated with childbirth. This discrimination in types of reimbursable medical procedures placed an especially heavy burden on indigent, unmarried teenage girls, the category most in need of abortion.

The Court, in a five-to-four decision, upheld the constitutionality of the Hyde Amendment. The majority relied on its earlier decision in Maher v. Roe (1977) in which it sustained Connecticut’s decision, with regard to poor women, to pay for expenses associated with delivery of a baby but not for abortions. The Court reasoned that Roe v. Wade does not prevent a state from making a value judgment favoring childbirth over abortion and implementing that judgment through the allocation of public funds. The Constitution, said the Court, blocks government from placing obstacles in the path of a woman’s right to choose to terminate her pregnancy but it does not mandate that government remove obstacles, such as poverty, that it did not place there. No one is entitled to government funds needed to exercise a constitutional right.

Laws that discriminate against a suspect category of people, such as members of a racial minority, trigger a heightened level of judicial scrutiny. The Court, however, does not view poverty as a suspect classification and, therefore, Congress only has to demonstrate that the withholding of federal funds for abortion serves a legitimate governmental interest. Roe v. Wade recognized the government's interest in preserving potential human life, an end achieved in the Hyde Amendment by providing incentives to pregnant women to carry their pregnancy to term.

The fact that the ban on use of federal funds to pay for abortion coincides with the tenets of the Catholic Church does not violate the prohibition on governmental establishment of religion. Preferring childbirth over abortion has a secular purpose, as do laws against stealing and murder, concluded the Court.

Most states have followed the federal government's lead in restricting public funding for abortions. Congress has extended the ban on abortion funding to other federal programs financing health care, including those for federal employees, Peace Corps volunteers, and military personnel and their dependents.

KENNETH M. HOLLAND

References and Further Reading

- Boonstra, Heather, and Adam Sonfield, Rights Without Access: Revisiting Public Funding of Abortion for Poor Women, Guttmacher Report on Public Policy, 3 (2000): 2:8–11.
- Fried, Marlene Gerber. "The Economics of Abortion Access in the US: Restrictions on Government Funding for Abortion Is the Post-Roe Battleground." Conscience 26, no. 4 (2005): 10–15.
- Luker, Kristin. Abortion and the Politics of Motherhood. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.
- McDonagh, Eileen L., My Body, My Consent: Securing the Constitutional Right to Abortion Funding, Albany Law Review 62 (1999): 3:1057–118.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Maher v. Roe*, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Abortion; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Due Process; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

HARRIS v. NEW YORK, 401 U.S. 222 (1971)

In its landmark decision in Miranda v. Arizona (1966), the Supreme Court held that the police may not interrogate a suspect in custody unless the police advise him of his right to remain silent and to an attorney. The suspect is entitled to be advised that (1) he has the right to remain silent; (2) anything he says "can and will" be used against him in court; (3) he has the right to consult an attorney and to have an attorney present during the interrogation; and (4) if he cannot afford an attorney, one will be provided for him. Statements obtained by the police in violation of Miranda are inadmissible in the prosecutor's case-in-chief.

Miranda initially generated great controversy. However, by 2000 the Supreme Court in Dickerson v. United States found that "Miranda has been embedded in routine police practice to the point where the warnings have become part of our national culture." Even prosecutors came to embrace the Miranda warnings because they provide law enforcement officers with much needed structure for carrying out custodial interrogations.

However, there has been ongoing controversy over the scope of Miranda. In Harris v. New York (1971), the Court marked out a significant exception to the exclusionary rule. The Court in Harris held that if the defendant testifies on his own behalf, statements obtained from him in violation of the Miranda warnings may be used to impeach his credibility.

Harris was charged with selling heroin to an undercover officer. He testified on his own behalf that he knew the undercover officer but denied selling him heroin. Harris had not been given complete Miranda warnings because he was not advised of his right to assigned counsel. Nevertheless, on cross-examination, the prosecutor asked Harris if he had made specified statements to the police officer immediately after his arrest that partially contradicted his direct testimony. Harris said that he couldn't remember what he told the officer. The trial judge instructed the jury that the statements attributed to Harris by the prosecutor could be considered in evaluating Harris's credibility, although not as substantive evidence of guilt.

The U.S. Supreme Court upheld Harris's conviction. The Court found that the Miranda exclusionary rule does not apply to inconsistent statements used to attack the defendant's credibility. The Court stressed the importance of testing the veracity of the defendant's testimony: "The shield provided by Miranda cannot be perverted into a license to use perjury by way of a defense, free from the risk of confrontation with prior inconsistent utterances." The Court also found that "[a]ssuming that the [Miranda] exclusionary rule has a deterrent effect on proscribed [police] conduct, sufficient deterrence flows when the evidence in question is made unavailable to the prosecution in its case in chief.”

In a follow-up case, Oregon v. Hass (1975), the Supreme Court held that Harris applies to other Miranda violations, for example, where the police continued to question the suspect after he asked for an attorney.

Harris was the beginning of a series of Supreme Court decisions restricting the scope of Miranda. Later Supreme Court decisions took a narrow view of the meaning of “interrogation,” held Miranda inapplicable to statements made to undercover agents, recognized “public safety” and booking exceptions to Miranda, and rejected the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine.

MARTIN A. SCHWARTZ

References and Further Reading

LaFave, W., J. Israel, and N. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)
Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
Oregon v. Hass, 420 U.S. 714 (1975)

See also Miranda Warning; Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

HATCH ACT (1939)

The Hatch Act was an effort to limit the institutional flow of money into politics by barring campaign donations by federal employees. It was passed in response to reports that Works Progress Administration workers had been pressured to contribute to candidates favored by President Franklin Roosevelt during the 1938 midterm elections.

Although the act resembled decades-old campaign finance reform initiatives, its passage was due to contemporary political realities. Despite Roosevelt’s tactics, Republicans gained eighty House seats and eight Senate seats in 1938, and their then-powerful alliance with conservative Democrats forced Roosevelt to reluctantly sign the legislation.

The law made it illegal for federal civil servants to run for office, make or solicit campaign donations, or “take any active part in political management or political campaigns.” In 1940, it was extended to state and local employees of programs funded by the federal government.

Federal employees challenged the law as a violation of their right to engage in political speech. However, noting the government’s longstanding authority to regulate the civil service, the Supreme Court upheld the law by a four-to-three vote in 1947, in United Public Workers v. Mitchell, and reaffirmed that holding in United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers (1974).

The Hatch Act was liberalized in 1993, allowing federal employees to make campaign contributions, run in nonpartisan elections, and campaign for or against other candidates while off duty. Federal employees still may not run in partisan elections or solicit contributions for other candidates from the public.

STEVEN B. LICHTMAN

References and Further Reading

Corrado, Anthony, and Thomas E. Mann, Daniel Ortiz, and Trevor Potter, eds. The New Campaign Finance Sourcebook. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press, 2005.
Overacker, Louise. “Campaign Finance in the Presidential Election of 1940.” American Political Science Review 35 (August 1941): 701–27.
U.S. Office of Special Counsel. Political Activity (Hatch Act). April 2004. <http://www.osc.gov/hatchact.htm>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hatch Act, Act of August 2, 1939, 53 Stat. 1147
United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947)
United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548 (1973)

See also Campaign Finance Reform; Roosevelt, Franklin Delano

HATE CRIME LAWS

A wide range of laws can be used to prosecute hate crimes (also known as bias crimes), which are crimes motivated by bias based on race, religion, national origin, sexual orientation, gender, or other social group membership. First, it is important to remember that almost every case of hate crime can be prosecuted as a violation of the ordinary criminal law (for example, as an assault or trespass), without regard to the defendant’s bias motivation. However, because hate crimes are believed to be more harmful to the individual victim, the targeted social group, and society at large, Congress and most state legislatures have enacted a variety of criminal statutes that directly address bias-motivated acts. These laws include traditional approaches that criminalize specific conduct that has long been associated with racial, ethnic, or religious hatred, and a more modern approach that increases the penalty for criminal conduct based on the defendant's biased motivation.

Traditional Legislation

Although the idea of treating bias-motivated crime as a distinct category of crime can be traced only to the 1980s. The United States and most of the individual states have for well over a century had laws specifically addressing acts that today we would label hate crimes. These older laws take primarily two approaches: (1) criminalizing civil rights violations and (2) outlawing particular acts that historically have been associated with racial, religious, and ethnic hatred and violence.

The civil rights approach dates back to the enactment of the oldest of the relevant federal statutes, 18 U.S.C. section 241 ("Conspiracy against rights") and section 242 ("Deprivation of rights under color of law"), during the post-Civil War Reconstruction Era. In addition to those laws, the major federal criminal civil rights statutes used to prosecute hate crime are 18 U.S.C. section 245 ("Federally protected activities"), 18 U.S.C. section 247 ("Damage to religious property; obstruction of persons in the free exercise of religious beliefs"), 18 U.S.C. section 248 (prohibiting interference with religious freedom), and 42 U.S.C. section 3631 ("Prevention of intimidation" provision of the Fair Housing Act). The federal government prosecutes hate crimes primarily as civil rights violations, and several states have enacted statutes modeled on the federal laws.

The essence of a civil rights offense is interference with the free exercise of a right protected by law. Therefore, the key element under these statutes is that the defendant intended to intimidate the victim in or to interfere with the free exercise of rights under the constitution or laws of the United States or a particular state. Some of these statutes—particularly the newer ones—also require the prosecution to prove that the defendant was motivated by bias; they therefore resemble antidiscrimination laws in many respects.

Another group of traditional statutes takes a different approach, prohibiting specific acts that historically have been associated with racial, religious, and ethnic hostility, primarily practices that traditionally were employed by the Ku Klux Klan. The common theme of these laws is the prohibition of acts that induce fears of persecution, particularly in members of minority groups. Thus, several states have criminalized cross burning and the placement of similar exhibits, including Nazi swastikas, that have traditionally been interpreted as threats of violence or physical intimidation against a particular group.

Many states also have enacted special institutional vandalism statutes to punish individuals who deface or destroy churches, synagogues, and other institutional property, such as monuments, memorials, or cemeteries, that are associated with or significant to particular groups. Related statutes prohibit interfering with religious worship or obstructing a person in the free exercise of his or her religion. Finally, several states have "anti-mask" statutes, which prohibit wearing a mask or hood under specified circumstances. These statutes were enacted in two waves during the 1920s and 1950s, in response to the terrorism of minority groups that was practiced by "night-riding" members of the Ku Klux Klan, who carried out campaigns of violence and intimidation while wearing the traditional Klan regalia of white robe, hood, and mask.

Like the modern, penalty enhancement approach discussed below, these statutes have been vulnerable to constitutional challenge based upon the First Amendment right to freedom of expression. The most vulnerable of the traditional statutes have been those that prohibit conduct that may be viewed as expressive or symbolic, such as cross burning or mask wearing. Conduct of this type lies on the boundary between hate crime and hate speech, and a number of cross-burning and anti-mask statutes have been struck down in cases where courts found that they regulated expressive conduct. In cases where the courts have found the statutes to punish intimidation or threats, however, the statutes have tended to survive constitutional attack.

The Modern Approach: Penalty Enhancement

The newest and most controversial hate crime laws are penalty enhancement statutes. These laws increase the punishment for a crime in a case where the prosecution proves that, in committing the crime, the defendant was motivated by bias based upon the race or other group-based status of the victim, such as religion or gender. Penalty enhancement laws have generated a great deal of controversy, with many critics arguing that they are unconstitutional because they punish a defendant for his or her unpopular or offensive viewpoint, thereby infringing on the right to freedom of speech and thought, or unwise because their focus on the defendant's bias draws attention to tensions between groups. Nevertheless, the penalty enhancement approach has gained widespread acceptance, and almost every state now has a penalty enhancement or ethnic intimidation statute for prosecuting hate crimes. The federal sentencing guidelines also incorporate the penalty enhancement approach, in a provision (U.S.S.G. sec. 3A1.1[a]) that directs the sentencing court to adjust the sentence for a federal crime upward based upon the defendant's biased motivation.

The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith introduced the penalty enhancement approach in 1981, when it published its model ethnic intimidation statute. Under this model, punishment for conduct that already violates some provision of the criminal code is to be increased if the defendant committed the crime "by reason of the actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin, sexual orientation, or gender of another individual or group of individuals." States that follow this model typically either adopt the enhancement as a separate sentencing provision or create a new, higher-grade crime that comprises an existing crime plus a bias motive. States vary in their designations of which crimes are subject to hate crime enhancement; some state statutes provide that the enhancement applies only to specified crimes (such as trespass, harassment, intimidation, assault, and battery), while others would apply the enhancement to any crime.

The identifying feature of ethnic intimidation laws is their focus on the defendant's bias-related state of mind. The precise phrasing of the prohibited state of mind varies from statute to statute, with most states defining a bias crime as one in which the actor committed the offense "because of" another person's race or other protected status. Some statutes also require that the defendant be motivated by malice or animus. All hate crime penalty enhancement statutes punish bias based on race, color, religion, or national origin. In addition, several statutes include other protected categories, such as gender, handicap, age, disability, or sexual orientation.

Constitutional and Policy Issues

All of the hate crime laws discussed above have raised constitutional and policy questions, but the most controversial have been the penalty enhancement statutes.

The penalty enhancement approach stirred controversy from the beginning. During the early 1990s, the debate centered on fundamental issues concerning the constitutionality, legitimacy, and wisdom of penalty enhancement. Proponents of the laws contended that they were needed in order to recognize the unique and serious harms that hate crimes inflict on the victim, the targeted social group, and the larger community. They also argued that increased punishment was justified because someone who commits a crime because of bias is more culpable than a person who commits the same criminal act without a bias motivation.

Critics raised several concerns. First, they argued that penalty enhancement laws created unconstitutional "thought crimes" in violation of the First Amendment—that is, that the laws violated a defendant's right to freedom of expression by punishing racist speech, mental processes, or opinions based upon the state's disagreement with their ideological content. Critics also argued that the laws would have a "chilling effect" on free speech, because people would be fearful of exercising the right to attend racist talks or read racist literature because their activities might be brought into trial as evidence against them should they one day be charged with committing a hate crime. Challenges to the legitimacy and wisdom of the laws included the arguments that penalty enhancement is not warranted because bias crimes are no different from any other criminal act committed for an unpopular reason or that hate crimes are viewed as different only if one attributes some heightened sensitivity or weakness to the victims, who in most cases are members of minority social groups. Based on the latter argument, bias crime laws were sometimes characterized as stigmatizing or insulting to minority groups. Conversely, they also were viewed as insulting to other crime victims, because they were said to send the message that these individuals' lives and well-being are not "worth" as much as the lives and well-being of minorities. Critics also contended that hate crime laws would exacerbate rather than reduce tensions between groups, because they draw attention to the perpetrator's group-based animus.

Hate crime laws appeared vulnerable to constitutional attack following the U.S. Supreme Court's 1992 decision, in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, striking down a municipal hate speech ordinance on free speech grounds. However, the following year the Court directly addressed the constitutionality of penalty enhancement legislation in Wisconsin v. Mitchell. In Mitchell, a unanimous Court upheld a Wisconsin statute that enhanced the punishment for a crime where the defendant "intentionally selected" the victim based on race or other protected group status. The Court distinguished the penalty enhancement statute from the ordinance it had struck down in R.A.V., noting that the ordinance had been directed at expression, while the statute in Mitchell was "aimed at conduct unprotected by the First Amendment.” The Court further found that the state could single out bias-motivated crimes for enhanced punishment based upon its assessment that such crimes inflict greater harm than non-bias-motivated crimes, because its desire to redress those greater harms was distinct from “mere disagreement” with the perpetrator’s beliefs or biases. Finally, the Court rejected the argument that the statute would chill free speech as being “too speculative.”

Before and since Mitchell, several state courts have addressed free speech and other constitutional challenges to hate crime penalty enhancement laws. In addition to the free speech issues, defendants have argued that hate crime laws violate their right to due process of law because they are unconstitutionally vague—that is, they fail to provide fair warning of the conduct prohibited and therefore may permit arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement or inhibit individuals’ exercise of their First Amendment freedoms—or to equal protection of the law because they treat offenders differently based upon their viewpoints or victims differently based upon their social group membership. With few exceptions, these constitutional challenges have failed.

In addition to the constitutional issues, hate crime laws raise important policy questions. Chief among these has been the question of which categories of social group membership to include among the punishable biases. The categories that have inspired the greatest controversy have been gender and sexual orientation. As a result, many states do not yet include gender or sexual orientation in their penalty enhancement statutes.

Other Hate Crime Laws

In addition to the criminal laws described above, many jurisdictions have adopted a variety of other laws to address hate crime. For example, a number of state statutes create a civil action under which victims of hate crimes can sue their perpetrators for money damages or other relief. In addition, the federal Hate Crimes Statistics Act of 1990 directs the U.S. Department of Justice to collect and report data on hate crimes every year, and many states have enacted similar laws.

LU-IN WANG

References and Further Reading

Anti-Defamation League of B’nai B’rith. Hate Crimes Laws: A Comprehensive Guide. New York: Anti-Defamation League, 1994.

- . Hate Crimes Laws. http://adl.org/main_hate_crimes.asp (web update complements 1994 report).
- Jacobs, James B., and Kimberly Potter. Hate Crimes: Criminal Law & Identity Politics. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Lawrence, Frederick M. Punishing Hate: Bias Crimes Under American Law. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Wang, Lu-in. Hate Crimes Law. Deerfield, IL: Clark Boardman Callaghan, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul*, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
- Wisconsin v. Mitchell*, 508 U.S. 476 (1993)

See also Campus Hate Speech Codes; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Overbreadth Doctrine; Shepard, Matthew; Virginia v. Black, 123 S.Ct. 1536 (2003)

HATE CRIMES

Hate crimes are crimes in which the perpetrator is motivated by prejudice toward the victim and/or toward the group to which the defendant belongs. Typically, hate crimes punish conduct in which race, ethnicity, gender, religion, and often sexual orientation are motives for the prohibited conduct. Efforts to prosecute hate crimes began in earnest in the 1980s, and have been coupled with federal and state legislation requiring the compilation of hate crime data. Some point to an “epidemic” of hate crime over the last two decades. Those who disagree note that there are enormous differences in what constitutes hate crimes in different jurisdictions, and that more generally “hate crime” data are easily manipulated, difficult to collect, and subject to different interpretations. Also, in assessing hate crime data, distinctions need to be drawn between minor crimes motivated by hate (for instance, graffiti), and major crimes with a hate component (for example, a murder of a black man because of his race).

It is important to distinguish between “hate crimes” and “hate speech.” The latter clearly implicates the First Amendment’s free speech protections, and most efforts to proscribe “hate speech”—for instance, in college speech codes—have been struck down by the courts. The fairly consistent view of these courts has been that words—no matter how heinous, how hateful—are protected speech, and cannot be criminalized. In contrast, “hate crimes,” the courts have stressed, deal with conduct. This conduct unarguably can be prohibited by the states or federal government, whether it is part of a hate crime or not. The “hate” designation is applied when, as suggested above, the defendant is motivated by prejudice with respect to the victim's race, ethnicity, gender, and so on. The Court, while striking down laws that exclusively punish hate speech, has upheld sentencing enhancements against defendants for hateful motivations. In short, standing alone, punishment of words or ideas no matter how prejudiced are not proscribable; it is only when coupled with conduct that a "hateful motivation" can result in an enhanced sentence. The major exception to this rule involves the expression of a hateful idea by burning a cross. In 2003, the Court ruled that this kind of expression—unlike other kinds of ways to convey a message of hate—can be criminally punished. The long history of cross burning in the United States was considered so substantial a form of intimidation that states could prohibit cross burning even if not specifically linked to another underlying crime.

Hate crime appellations are introduced for two main reasons. First and foremost is the matter of symbolic politics. A jurisdiction intends to send a message about not countenancing certain kinds of hateful behavior, and wants to send this message by harsher penalties for behavior associated with hateful motivations. Second, proponents of hate crime statutes (and often of special units within police departments whose task it is to collect data on, and prosecute hate crimes) argue that by calling matters hate crimes these automatically receive higher priority treatment by the police. In serious crimes in which "hate" is also charged, this ironically is less important since the defendant can/will be subject to a substantial sentence for the underlying felony; however, in less serious felonies and misdemeanors (including, for example, incidents of graffiti or malicious destruction of property), calling these relatively minor matters hate crimes makes it more likely the perpetrator will receive a tougher sentence.

MILTON HEUMANN

References and Further Reading

- Bell, Jeannine, Deciding When Hate Is a Crime: The First Amendment, Police Detectives, and the Identification of Hate Crime, Rutgers Race & Law Review 4 (2002): 1:33–76.
- Gould, Jon. Speak No Evil. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2005.
- Heumann, Milton, and Thomas Church, eds. Hate Speech on Campus. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1997.
- Jacobs, James, and Kimberly Potter. Hate Crimes: Criminal Law and Identity Politics. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Lawrence, Frederick. Punishing Hate. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.

R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992).
Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 123 (2003).
Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476 (1993).

See also Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952); Campus Hate Speech Codes; Cross-Burning

HATE SPEECH

Hate speech is speech that degrades an individual or group on grounds such as race, gender, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, or sexual orientation. Sometimes referred to as group libel, hate speech often takes the form of vilification of a group because all members are claimed to share invidious characteristics. Hate speech raises difficult issues because history has shown that many programs, repressions, genocides, and racist behaviors begin with verbal libels targeted against vulnerable groups. Thus, a society committed both to freedom of speech and to equal opportunity must wrestle with the challenge posed by racist, sexist, and other phobic speech.

Hate speech is distinct from hate crime, which consists of a criminal act motivated by bias against the victim's race, ethnicity, gender, and so on. Many states as well as the federal government have enacted laws that provide for greater penalties for crimes committed because the victim was selected because of race, or other group membership, or the criminal behavior was motivated at least in part by bias. Hate crimes do not raise the same problems as hate speech, because the underlying behavior involved in the crime may independently be punished.

Some have contended that adding punishment to criminal acts because someone committed a crime because of bias raises problems of free speech: arguably, punishing someone's motive for committing a bias crime is equivalent to punishing "thought." But this line of reasoning seems faulty. The punishment for many crimes hinges on one's state of mind—whether one acted deliberately as opposed to negligently, for example. The reasons someone hit another (in self-defense? to inflict pain?) can even establish whether a crime was even committed. As Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes said, even a dog can distinguish between being kicked and being stumbled over.

Many societies have contended with hate speech. The Nazis defined Jews as enemies of the state, condemned homosexuals, Roma, and Jehovah's Witnesses, and eventually killed millions. Closer to home, American racists fulminated against African Americans, Catholics, Jews, and immigrants, and embraced violence against them. In response to the horrors of world wars, and sometimes in response to race riots at home, many states enacted statutes criminalizing “libel” against such groups.

For example, as early as 1917, Illinois made it a crime to exhibit in any public place any publication that “portrays depravity, criminality . . . or lack of virtue of a class of citizens, of any race, color, creed or religion” which “expose[d] the citizens of any race, color, creed or religion to contempt, derision, or obloquy.” In 1952, in Beauharnais v. Illinois, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a conviction of a leafleteer whose tract set forth a petition calling on Chicago officials to exclude African Americans because members of that group’s alleged propensity to commit crime. According to the Court, the posters had been defined by Illinois as a form of libel against African Americans, and libels could be punished for their “tendency to cause breach of the peace.”

How Do Courts Treat Hate Speech Today?

The Supreme Court’s Beauharnais decision, while never formally repealed, no longer represents the state of the law on whether government may regulate or punish hate speech. In subsequent decisions, the Court has emphasized that the First Amendment imposes higher requirements. A state may not punish speech merely because the speaker expresses outrageous views, even though those views conflict with other core constitutional values of equality. Further, even though all recognize the danger to a multiracial society of allowing falsehoods to be deployed against vulnerable groups, unless a speaker intends to foment violence and the violence is imminent, or the speech threatens specific individuals, the government may not regulate the speech or punish the speaker for expressing outrageous views.

To see how far these principles take us, consider some examples. In 1977, neo-Nazis proposed to march in uniform, including displaying swastikas, in Skokie, Illinois, a community in which many survivors of Nazi concentration camps had settled. The town and the state both enacted laws designed to prevent the march, but an intermediate federal appeals court held that the Nazis could not be prevented from parading merely because the town found their views repulsive. The case was so controversial that it split the American Civil Liberties Union, which had defended the Nazis’ right to march.

A few years earlier, a Ku Klux Klan (KKK) leader speaking to assembled members at an outdoor meeting infused with racial epithets, urged his followers to march on Washington. He suggested the possibility that there might have to be some “revengeance” taken if civil rights were given to African Americans. The Supreme Court held that the state could not punish the speaker since it could not show that he deliberately sought to incite violence and that violence was imminent.

These more recent decisions share certain common features. First, they hold that an individual who is merely attempting to persuade others that racism, homophobia, or cruelty should be practiced cannot be punished for those expressions.

But more significantly, suppose a listener hears a vitriolic speech condemning a particular group, say Catholics, and is thereby incited to acts of violence. The speaker cannot be held responsible for those violent acts unless he knows it is likely that his words will incite others to violence, and that violence will immediately result. This rule, that speech that merely increases the probabilities of violent acts towards vulnerable groups, is justified on the grounds that in a free society, passionate argument, vitriolic assertions, and hate-filled invective must be permitted in order to protect vibrant speech in a democratic society.

Furthermore, the concept of “group libel” as applied in Beauharnais has been seriously eroded. A series of Supreme Court decisions has emphasized that in order to comply with First Amendment standards, a libel must be personally directed to identifiable members of a group. By analogy, one is free to say “all lawyers are liars” without running afoul of libel laws; but a state is free to hold liable someone who falsely proclaims that “Fredrica, a lawyer, cheats her clients.” Similarly, to say that all members of a particular religious sect are thieves may “libel” the group, but the state may not punish such utterances.

Although the free speech principle has dominated the outcomes of these decisions, nonetheless there are important limits. One challenge the Court has faced concerns “mixed messages” accompanying symbolic communications.

The practice of cross burning provides a helpful illustration. The KKK has a history of using burning a cross at its rallies as an affirmation of its ideological unity and opposition to an integrated society. So long as the burning is used in such a fashion, and not to intimidate neighbors or passersby, the cross burning constitutes protected communication. But the burning cross has also been used as a method of intimidation, to coerce others into complying with the Klan’s demands. For example, if someone burns a cross across the street from a racially mixed couple as a message of intimidation, the state may criminally punish the threat—in the same way that malicious phone calls or other threats of violence may be punished. In sum, the Klan has a First Amendment right to assemble and share vitriolic sentiments among themselves about minorities, but they may not target others for threats of violence or intimidation.

Another important limit on the free speech principle is the “fighting words” doctrine. If a person accosts another in a face-to-face setting, one does not have a First Amendment right to heap abuse on that person to the point that violence is likely. This doctrine is justified on the same grounds as the “incitement” limit: one does not have a free speech right to incite others to immediate violence. Even here, however, following the R.A.V. v. St. Paul (1992) decision, a state that wishes to criminalize fighting words is not permitted to select for special punishment only those fighting words involving disfavored topics (for example, speech involving race or religion). The state, in other words, must draft its regulations carefully.

Furthermore, although hate speech may not generally be punished, in certain special contexts, speech that is hateful may be regulated. For example, in an employment setting certain forms of hateful speech can contaminate a workplace, making it impossible for minorities and women to succeed. An employer is bound under civil rights laws to remove discriminatory speech from the workplace that degrades employees or could reflect a “pattern” of discriminatory behavior affecting the job performance of minorities or women. Workplace prohibitions on verbal sexual harassment, for example, are not generally viewed as violative of free speech principles. Employees who wish to participate in discriminatory communications are still free to do so outside the workplace.

Some have urged that a university setting is sufficiently similar to a workplace to justify similar speech restrictions on campus hate speech. Although controversial, court decisions have generally sided with free speech proponents.

Why Protect Hate Speech That Neither Incites Violence Nor Intimidates?

As noted earlier, the right of certain individuals to spew invective about minorities, religious sects, or unpopular immigrants has proven controversial. Some argue that hate speech should not be protected by the First Amendment because it falsely attributes negative characteristics to an entire group. Hate speech is pernicious because it undermines critical values in a free society—namely the equal right of everyone to participate in society without fear or the built-in headwind of prejudice. The repetition of hatred inevitably influences others in the society, reinforcing prejudice.

Others contend that hate speech targets the most vulnerable groups in the society. It undermines the ability of members of those groups to live without fear and marginalization. Moreover, hate speech interferes with the capacity of different groups in the society to trust members of other groups. As Kent Greenawalt said in a different context, hate speech can have “an insidious effect on social relations” among different groups in the society.

Such arguments have persuaded some countries to regulate certain hateful expressions. For example, the German Constitution forbids the display of Nazi symbols. And Canadian courts have upheld the power of the state to punish extremist expressions of hatred against minority groups.

Given these harms, why do American courts protect hate speech? Speech is powerful, and to pretend otherwise denies the power of ideology to cause armies to march and missiles to fly. Justice Brandeis said that during witchhunts “men feared women and burnt women.” Yet, Brandeis also held that a democratic society requires robust debate to flourish. Those who hold power in society would prefer not to be subject to criticism, derision, or vehement verbal attack. Some civil rights activists also argue that minorities and vulnerable groups especially need a powerful speech right in order to challenge those who are dominant in society.

While recognizing the power of speech to motivate, to anger, and to organize, Justice Holmes also said the test of an idea is its capacity to gain acceptance in the marketplace of ideas. Under this “marketplace” rationale, the answer to pernicious speech is more speech, not punishment of the speaker.

One problem with punishing certain types of communications, of course, is that speech takes many forms. Some is vicious, where the speaker uses slurs to denigrate hated groups. Many people are greatly offended by such speech. However, as Henry Louis Gates has pointed out, sometimes the most forceful denigrating speech about disfavored groups is presented artfully and in an intellectual fashion.

Another problem with punishing hate speech is that there is widespread disagreement as to how to define it. Jokes, political discussion, religious speech, and history can all cast some groups in an unfavorable light. “Speech that denigrates” or that subjects certain groups to derision could be described in very broad terms. One person’s passionately-held core beliefs might be experienced by another as pernicious lies. Moral judgments are not readily categorized as either “true” or “false.” In sum, speech that denigrates on grounds such as race or gender may be outrageous, but beyond fighting words, incitement, or intimidation, most scholars agree that it’s difficult to define a category of “hate speech” that should not be protected as free speech.

JOHN T. NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

- Bollinger, Lee C. The Tolerant Society: Freedom of Speech and Extremist Speech in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969).
- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 568 (1942).
- Cohen v. California*, 403 U.S. 15 (1971).
- Collin v. Smith*, 578 F.2d 1197 (7th Cir., 1978).
- Delgado, Richard, and Jean Stefancic. Understanding Words That Wound. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2004.
- Gates, Henry Louis. “Let Them Talk.” The New Republic, September 20–27, 1993, 37–49.
- Gooding v. Wilson*, 405 U.S. 518 (1972).
- Greenawalt, Kent. Speech, Crime, and the Uses of Language. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Massachusetts General Laws 272, section 98C, on April 30, 1943, c. 223, M.G.L.A. 272 section 98C (2000).
- Massaro, Toni, Equality and Freedom of Expression: The Hate Speech Dilemma, William & Mary Law Review 32 (1991): 211.
- Matsuda, Mari J., Charles R. Lawrence, III, Richard Delgado, and Kimberle Williams Crenshaw. Words That Wound: Critical Race Theory, Assaultive Speech, and the First Amendment. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1993.
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964).
- Nockleby, John T., Hate Speech in Context, Buffalo Law Review 42 (1994): 653–713.
- Post, Robert C., Racist Speech, Democracy, and the First Amendment, William & Mary Law Review 32 (1991): 267.
- R. v. Keegstra*, 39 Alta. L.R. (3d) 305, 105 C.C.C. (3d) 19, 48 C.R. (4th) 118, 197 N.R. 26, 184 A.R. 217, 122 W.A.C. 217, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 458.
- Virginia v. Black*, 538 U.S. 343 (2003).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Beauharnais v. Illinois*, 343 U.S. 250 (1952)
- R. A. V. v. St. Paul*, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)

See also American Civil Liberties Union; Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952); Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Cross-Burning; Fighting Words and Free Speech; Group Libel; Hate Crimes; Hate Crime Laws; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; R. A. V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992); Symbolic Speech; Threats and Free Speech

HAYS, WILL H. (1879–1954)

Born in Sullivan, Indiana, Will Hays began his public career as a lawyer and Republican politician in the first decade of the twentieth century. He achieved fame, however, in the rapidly expanding film industry of the 1920s and 1930s for his role in developing and enforcing the industry’s strict self-censorship code.

The popularity of moving pictures in the early years of the century was unsettling to many concerned over the impact of the cinema on public morals, and by 1920 a number of states and municipalities had established film censorship boards. In order to clean up the industry’s image, as well as to head off potential federal censorship, in 1922 film executives organized the Movie Producers Production and Distribution Association (MPPDA) and asked Will Hays to head the new organization. Hays came very well connected, having been very active in party politics. He had been national chair of the Republican Party and had been elevated to postmaster general by Warren G. Harding in 1921.

When he accepted his new position, Hays promised that Hollywood could police itself. To that end, the Hays Office, as it would come to be identified, developed voluntary guidelines for film content that came to be honored more in the breach than in compliance. In 1927 an official set of “don’ts and be carefals” were issued by the Office to specifically guide producers. The advent of the “talkies,” however, both increased the popularity of the movies and made editing film more expensive. In addition, as the nation entered the Great Depression, producers, anxious to buck up failing revenues, turned soon to the increasing use of sex and violence to attract audiences.

Women’s and religious groups, especially the Catholic Church, became more and more disturbed over film content, and the threat of expanded government censorship loomed. Movie financiers pressured the MPPDA to tighten compliance with the guidelines. Thus in 1930, the Hays Office issued a much stricter production code, which had actually been drawn up by a Catholic cleric. The Code of 1930 went far beyond regulating just sex and violence by also promoting an idealized view of life that embraced strict moral values and conservative ideals. Producers were cautioned, for example, never to encourage sympathy with criminals, and were instructed to portray “correct” standards of life. Audiences were to be protected from explicit scenes of crimes, violence, and sex. The institution of marriage was to be celebrated; profanity, nudity, or suggestive dancing were undesirable; and the character of the clergy must never be maligned. To ensure that producers complied with these standards, the Code required the submission of all scripts to the MPPDA for review.

Between 1930 and 1934, the Hays Office labored to enforce the Code, rejecting nearly 20 percent of the scripts it reviewed. Since the Code contained no enforcement provisions, however, criticism mounted that the Office still catered too much to the public's taste. When the Catholic Church established the Legion of Decency in 1934, promising to boycott inappropriate films, Hays finally had the club he needed to ensure compliance with the Code. He installed his colleague Joe Breen in Hollywood in an office called the Production Code Administration, which adopted the authority to award a seal of approval for those films that adhered to the Code. Tasked with maintaining the "well-being of the industry," Breen's operation finally reined in the film producers, guaranteeing that what America saw on the screen would reflect an idealized view of American life, avoiding, where possible, political and social issues.

The Code would come to govern film tone, if not content, into the 1960s. Post–World War II social changes significantly altered public tastes and the willingness of both audience and producers to accept Code limitations. Hays resigned from the MPPDA in 1945, forced out by studio chiefs who wanted greater latitude in what they produced. The Supreme Court would further emasculate the rationale for the Code when it declared in Burstyn v. Wilson (1952) that motion pictures were protected by the provisions of the First Amendment. Nevertheless, Will Hays played the essential role in what American audiences saw on the silver screen for more than twenty-five years.

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

- Black, Gregory D. "Hollywood Censored: The Production Code Administration and the Hollywood Film Industry, 1930–1940." Film History 3 (1989): 167–89.
- Hays, Will H. Memoirs. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1955.
- Leff, Leonard J., and Jerold L. Simmons. Dame in the Kimono: Hollywood, Censorship, and the Production Code from the 1920s to the 1960s. New York: Grove Weidenfeld, 1990.
- Vaughn, Stephen. "Morality and Entertainment: The Origins of the Motion Picture Production Code." Journal of American History 77 (June 1990): 39–65.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 492 (1952)

See also Movie Ratings and Censorship

HAZELWOOD SCHOOL DISTRICT v. KUHLMIEER, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)

In Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, the Court upheld the school district's authority to exercise editorial control over a high school newspaper that was produced in the journalism class and funded largely by the school board. The student staff members contended that school officials had violated their First Amendment speech rights by deleting pages containing two articles from an issue of the paper. One article described the experiences of three students with pregnancy, and the other discussed the impact of divorce on students at the school. The school principal was concerned that the first article would invade the privacy of the three unidentified students by enabling readers readily to determine their identities, and that its discussion of sexual activity and birth control would be unsuitable for younger students. The principal was concerned that the second article named a particular student and contained negative references to her divorced parents, who had been given no opportunity to respond or object to the article's contents.

Kuhlmeier's five-justice majority distanced itself from Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969), which had upheld the students' First Amendment rights to wear black armbands in school in a nondisruptive protest of the Vietnam War. Tinker held that "[s]tudents in school as well as out of school are 'persons' under our Constitution," and concluded that students do not "shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate." Kuhlmeier reaffirmed post-Tinker Supreme Court decisions which emphasized that "the First Amendment rights of students in the public schools 'are not automatically coextensive with the rights of adults in other settings'" and "must be 'applied in light of the special characteristics of the school environment'." For the four Kuhlmeier dissenters, Justice William J. Brennan accused the majority of "abandon[ing] Tinker."

Kuhlmeier concluded that

[t]he question whether the First Amendment requires a school to tolerate particular student speech—the question that we addressed in Tinker—is different from the question whether the First Amendment requires a school affirmatively to promote particular student speech. The former question addresses educators' ability to silence a student's personal expression that happens to occur on the school premises. The latter question concerns educators' authority over school-sponsored publications, theatrical productions, and other expressive activities that students, parents, and members of the public might reasonably perceive to bear the imprimatur of the school.

School-sponsored expressive activities "may be fairly characterized as part of the school curriculum, whether or not they occur in a traditional classroom setting, so long as they are supervised by faculty members and designed to impart particular knowledge or skills to student participants and audiences.”

Because the school newspaper was not a public forum, school officials could regulate its contents “in any reasonable manner.” Kuhlmeier held that “educators do not offend the First Amendment by exercising editorial control over the style and content of student speech in school-sponsored expressive activities so long as their actions are reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns.” The decision’s reasonableness test confers considerable discretion on school officials:

It is only when the decision to censor a school-sponsored publication, theatrical production, or other vehicle of student expression has no valid educational purpose that the First Amendment is so ‘directly and sharply implicate[d],’ as to require judicial intervention to protect students’ constitutional rights.

Justice White found the Hazelwood principal’s decision, grounded in pedagogical concerns, reasonable under the circumstances as the principal understood them.

In later First Amendment challenges brought by students, lower courts have applied Kuhlmeier’s reasonableness test to uphold exercises of authority by school officials over a wide variety of school-sponsored activities other than school newspapers. In Henerey v. City of St. Charles (1999), for example, the Eighth Circuit upheld disqualification from a school election of a high school student who distributed condoms during his campaign, whose slogan was “The Safe Choice.” In McCann v. Fort Zumwalt School District (1999), the district court upheld the school superintendent’s refusal to permit the high school marching band to play a song that he believed promoted illicit drug use.

Kuhlmeier demonstrated that the First Amendment Speech Clause provides schoolchildren considerably less protection than it provides adults. In almost all circumstances, official editorial control of a newspaper published outside the public schools would be an unconstitutional prior restraint. Public school officials, however, have considerable leeway to determine the curriculum and regulate improper influences because, as Kuhlmeier reaffirmed, “the education of the Nation’s youth is primarily the responsibility of parents, teachers, and state and local school officials, and not of federal judges.”

DOUGLAS E. ABRAMS

References and Further Reading

Chemerinsky, Erwin, Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen, 2002.

Gardner, Martin R. Understanding Juvenile Law. 2nd ed. Charlottesville, VA: LexisNexis, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)

Henerey v. City of St. Charles, 200 F.3d 1128, 1135–36 (8th Cir. 1999)

McCann v. Fort Zumwalt School District, 50 F.Supp.2d 918 (E.D.Mo. 1999)

See also Children and the First Amendment; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Public Forum Doctrines; Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction

HEARSAY EVIDENCE

The hearsay rule bars admitting at a trial statements that were made out of court if they are offered to establish the facts asserted in such statements. The hearsay bar is thought by many scholars to have its origins in outrage over the admission of hearsay at trials like that of Sir Walter Raleigh, tried for treason in 1603. The primary witness against Raleigh was his alleged co-conspirator, Lord Cobham, who never appeared at trial, but whose out-of-court statements implicating Raleigh were read into evidence. Raleigh’s protests that he “may be massacred by mere hearsay” were ignored, and he was sentenced to death, though later reprieved but confined for years in the Tower of London. The danger raised by this hearsay was that Raleigh had no opportunity to cross-examine Cobham so that the jury could better gauge Cobham’s credibility.

Hearsay admissibility also risks prosecutors creating evidence molded to their liking, evidence used to condemn a man without his being able to challenge its reliability. This danger is vividly illustrated by the hearings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) during the red scare of the late 1940s and early 1950s. HUAC used hearsay and innuendo to accuse defense contractors, college professors, actors, labor organizers, and others of being Communist Party members, ruining their lives and careers with no opportunity to challenge their absent accusers.

Hearsay, especially when it is oral rather than written, is particularly easy to fabricate. One modern danger arises when jailhouse informants or other “stoolies” lie about what they have heard another saying. They lie in the hope of cutting a deal with the prosecutor to testify in exchange for, or even in the simple hope of, a reduced sentence. Significant numbers of innocent defendants have been convicted throughout the common law world based on such fabrications, resulting in the creation of commissions in Canada and the United Kingdom to recommend ways to protect the innocent from false informant accusations.

Relatedly, the hearsay bar equalizes the power disparity between prosecutor and defense counsel, given the generally greater ease with which the state can track down and interview hearsay declarants relative to those sought by often indigent criminal defendants. At present, the power disparity is especially great in terrorism prosecutions, particularly those done via military commissions, at which hearsay is freely available, including the potential admission of even suspects' involuntary confessions. In certain classes of cases, such as date rape trials, however, it is the defendant who may hold more power than the prosecution. For example, hearsay about a rape victim's "sluttish" reputation may play into gendered stereotypes that portray the alleged victim as simply not believable. "Rape shield statutes" accordingly often prohibit use of hearsay concerning the alleged rape victim's sexual reputation.

In child molestation cases, on the other hand, it is the exclusion of hearsay that may disempower already weak children. A child who reports sexual abuse to his mother or teacher may be too terrified to repeat what happened in a courtroom, facing his adult abuser and many adult strangers (those composing the jury).

In continental European inquisitorial systems, judicial fact finders must write opinions identifying why they gave what weight to which evidence, including hearsay, unlike common law jurors, who are largely unaccountable for their verdicts. Inquisitorial trials are also not concentrated, but can occur in recurring episodes across a relatively long time period so that it is easier to do further investigation of the worth of hearsay statements considered at earlier trial stages. Accordingly, hearsay is more freely admissible in the European continent than in the United States. Yet both the European Convention and the European Court on Human Rights limit the availability of criminal convictions based on uncorroborated hearsay.

ANDREW E. TASLITZ

References and Further Reading

- Brown, Cynthia, ed. Lost Liberties: Ashcroft and the Assault on Personal Freedom. New York: New Press, 2003.
- Choo, Andrew L.T. Hearsay and Confrontation in Criminal Trials. Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Criminal Justice, Symposium Issue: Crawford and Hearsay: One Year Later, 20 Criminal Justice (2005): 2.

- Damaska, Mirjan R. Evidence Law Adrift. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Dwyer, William L. In the Hands of the People: The Trial Jury's Origins, Triumphs, Troubles, and Future in American Democracy. New York: Thomas Dunne Books, Saint Martin's Press, 2002.
- Langbein, John H. The Origins of Adversary Criminal Trial. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Taslitz, Andrew E. Rape and the Culture of the Courtroom. New York: New York University Press, 1999.
- Van Kessel, Gordon, Hearsay Hazards in the American Criminal Trial: An Adversary-Oriented Approach, 49 Hastings Law Journal 477 (1998).
- Zimmerman, Clifford E. "From the Jailhouse to the Courtroom. The Role of Informants in Wrongful Convictions." In Wrongly Convicted: Perspectives on Failed Justice, edited by Sandra D. Westervelt and John A. Humphrey, 55–76. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2001.

See also Due Process

HECKLER'S VETO PROBLEM IN FREE SPEECH

Heckling, along with picketing, booing, and other similar forms of expression, often arise when individuals disagree with a speaker's message. Although the First Amendment protects the right of the speaker to convey an unpopular message free from government intervention, so long as the speech does not contain unprotected fighting words, the government may nevertheless be tempted to regulate the speech out of fear that listeners hostile to the message will be disorderly if the speaker is allowed to continue. Harry Kalven Jr. first described this situation as the "heckler's veto" because police action which silences a speaker based on fear that the message may offend listeners essentially allows the listener to "veto" the protected but unwelcome speech.

Although the Supreme Court endorsed the heckler's veto in Feiner v. New York (1951), the Supreme Court later held that charging variable parade fees based on the potential presence of crowds hostile to parade participants violated the First Amendment in Forsyth County v. The Nationalist Movement (1992). In so holding, the Supreme Court stated that "[s]peech cannot be financially burdened, any more than it can be punished or banned, simply because it may offend a hostile mob." In Christian Knights of the Ku Klux Klan v. District of Columbia (1992), the Court resolved the tension between the police's mandate to protect the public and the Ku Klux Klan's First Amendment rights by finding that the threat of violence was not beyond the police's reasonable control so as to justify restricting speech.

KATY H.H. YANG-PAGE

References and Further Reading

- Kalven, Harry Jr. The Negro and the First Amendment. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965.
 Kalven, Harry Jr., and Kalven, Jamie, eds. A Worthy Tradition. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.

Cases and Statues Cited

- Christian Knights of the Ku Klux Klan v. District of Columbia*, 972 F.2d 365 (D.C. Cir. 1992)
Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951)
Forsyth County v. The Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123 (1992)

See also Feiner v. New York*, 340 U.S. 315 (1951); Fighting Words and Free Speech

HELMS AMENDMENT (1989)

In the early 1980s, doctors discovered that a previously unknown virus—subsequently named the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV)—that was responsible for a lethal illness was spreading through the San Francisco gay community. The illness, now known around the world as acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), resulted in the deterioration of the human immune system to such an extent that those afflicted with it faced a high risk of dying from pneumonia, an illness that is normally overcome by the human body's natural immune system. Medical authorities soon discovered that HIV was a communicable disease that was spread through the commingling of certain body fluids, and that it was increasingly being discovered among individuals of different sexual orientations who lived outside the San Francisco area. This knowledge convinced many health professionals that public health programs designed to control the spread of HIV should be quickly enacted.

Since HIV is transmitted through body fluids, it became obvious that the sharing of unhygienic needles among intravenous drug users was a high-risk activity. Indeed, a 1995 study reported by the National Academy of Sciences states that “[t]he epidemiologic data indicate that the HIV epidemic in this country is now clearly driven by infections occurring in the population of injection drug users, their sexual partners, and their offspring.” By the end of the 1980s, it had become apparent to many in the field of public health that one of the most effective ways to reduce the spread of the HIV virus would be to provide intravenous drug users with free needles. The merits of this idea were strongly reinforced by a 2004 World Health Organization study which explains that “[p]roviding access to and encouraging utilization of sterile needles and syringes for [intravenous drug users] is now generally considered to be a fundamental component of any comprehensive and effective HIV-prevention programme.”

Yet in a contrary move spearheaded by Senator Jesse Helms (R-NC), the U.S. Congress enacted an amendment in 1989 that prohibited federal funds from being used to support free needle programs for illicit drug users. This controversial policy, which has remained in effect since that time, was supported by lawmakers who thought that free needle programs would promote the intravenous use of illegal drugs in several important ways. First, if the government provides free needles, then one of the costs normally associated with intravenous drug use would have been eliminated. Second, the threat of acquiring the HIV virus by sharing needles acts as a strong deterrent to intravenous drug use. Finally, free needle programs might convey a message—especially to young people who are not yet intravenous drug users—that the government condones the intravenous use of illegal drugs. These arguments, though, have been strongly challenged by critics of the policy.

MARK KEMPER

References and Further Reading

- Normand, Jacques, David Vlahov, and Lincoln E. Moses, eds. Preventing HIV Transmission: The Role of Sterile Needles and Bleach. Washington, DC: National Academy Press, 1995.
 Szalavitz, Maia. “Death Penalty for I.V. Drug Users.” Salon.com, 2005. http://www.salon.com/news/feature/2005/03/24/needle_exchange/.
 Verghese, Abraham. My Own Country: A Doctor's Story. New York: Vintage Press, 1995.
 World Health Organization. “Effectiveness of Sterile Needle and Syringe Programming in Reducing HIV/AIDS among Injecting Drug Users.” 2004. http://www.who.int/hiv/pub/prev_care/en/effectivenesssterileneedle.pdf.

HELPER, HINTON (1829–1909)

Hinton Helper, a North Carolinian, authored arguably the strongest criticism of slavery in America at the historic moment when the issue coming to the fore. In The Impending Crisis of the South: How to Meet It, published in 1859, he argued that slavery was hindering the progress of the South and should be abolished. His book was especially powerful since the author was a white man of southern stock. It was blamed for the massacre of slaveholders at the hands of John Brown. Also, it arguably led to Abraham Lincoln's election in 1860.

Helper wrote in The Impending Crisis that slavery was the root cause of “all the shame, ignorance, poverty, tyranny and imbecility of the South and nothing short of its complete abolition could save the South from falling into the vortex of utter ruin.”

He used not moral argument but rather carefully selected statistics to indict slavery as strangling the productivity of the South, such as that the hay crop of the North was worth far more than the South’s cotton crop and that the North provided disproportionate amounts of manufactured goods and culture to those southern whites who could afford them. He argued that the slavery system disproportionately harmed the poor whites of the South.

Helper viewed blacks with a caustic disdain. Calling for a pure white race, he argued for segregation of the races (even urging the mandatory repatriation of the slaves to Africa). Helper truly is a paradoxical figure in American history; his work led to the liberation of the very African Americans he so loathed. His book is a reminder that ideas can foster social and political change and lead to the redefinition of government’s role in the protection of personal liberties.

JAMES F. Van ORDEN

References and Further Reading

Bailey, Hugh C. Hinton Rowan Helper: Abolitionist Racist. University: University of Alabama Press, 1965.

HENTOFF, NAT (1925–)

Nat Hentoff is a journalist and author who specializes in civil liberties issues. For several decades he has written a newspaper column on civil liberties that is syndicated in many newspapers. He is also the author of many books on civil liberties, jazz, and political and social issues.

Hentoff was born in Boston in 1925. He graduated from Northeastern University with a B.A. and did graduate work at Harvard University. He was awarded a Fulbright scholarship and studied at the Sorbonne in Paris in 1950. From 1953 to 1957 he was associate editor of Down Beat, a jazz magazine. He was a staff writer at The New Yorker magazine for twenty-five years.

Hentoff’s books on civil liberties include The First Freedom: The Tumultuous History of Free Speech in America (1980), Free Speech for Me and Not for Thee: How the American Left and Right Relentlessly Censor Each Other (1992), Living the Bill of Rights: How To Be an Authentic American (1998), and The War on the Bill of Rights and the Gathering Resistance (2003). He has also written a number of novels for young people, including The Day They Came to Arrest the Book (1983), which deals with censorship in a public school.

Hentoff has also published two memoirs, Boston Boy (1986) and Speaking Freely: A Memoir (1997), which cover many of his experiences and writings related to civil liberties.

One of Hentoff’s major concerns regarding freedom of speech is the tendency of some liberals and leftwing activists to support censorship of ideas they find offensive. His 1992 book Free Speech for Me and Not for Thee addresses this issue in detail, citing a number of cases and controversies from the 1980s. He has been a strong opponent of campus speech codes that restrict expression about racial, ethnic, and gender subjects. Hentoff argues that such codes represent content-based restrictions of speech and expression and that such codes are impermissibly vague in defining what is offensive.

In addition to his civil liberties interests, Hentoff has written a number of books on political figures, including former mayor of New York City, John V. Lindsay and pacifist leader A.J. Muste. With respect to jazz, Hentoff was an editor of Down Beat magazine, writes newspaper and magazine articles on jazz, has produced a number of recordings, and has written numerous liner notes for albums.

In direct service to civil liberties, Hentoff served on the board of directors of the American Civil Liberties Union and the New York Civil Liberties Union.

SAMUEL WALKER

References and Further Reading

- Hentoff, Nat. Boston Boy. New York: Knopf, 1986.
———. The First Freedom: The Tumultuous History of Free Speech in America. New York: Delacorte, 1980.
———. Free Speech for Me and Not for Thee: How the American Left and Right Relentlessly Censor Each Other. New York: HarperCollins, 1992.
———. Living the Bill of Rights: How To Be an Authentic American. New York: HarperCollins, 1998.
———. The Nat Hentoff Reader. New York: Da Capo Press, 2001.
———. Speaking Freely: A Memoir. New York: Knopf, 1997.
———. The War on the Bill of Rights and the Gathering Resistance. New York: Seven Stories Press, 2003.

HERBERT v. LANDO, 441 U.S. 153 (1979)

Colonel Anthony Herbert sued the CBS News program “60 Minutes,” producer Barry Lando, and reporter Mike Wallace for libel in a 1973 broadcast. Herbert alleged that the broadcast depicted him as having made false charges of war crimes during the Vietnam War and false claims that he was removed from his command as retaliation. Prior to trial, Herbert’s lawyers asked Lando questions about internal editorial decisions. Lando's lawyers argued that thought processes and editorial judgments of the news magazine were protected by the First Amendment guarantees of freedom of speech and freedom of the press. A federal district court ruled that Lando should respond, but a federal appeals court ruled that Lando had a privilege not to answer questions about internal deliberations.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled, six to three, that journalists have no privilege in libel cases to refuse to answer questions about editorial decisions. Justice Byron White said the earlier case, New York Times v. Sullivan (1964), and subsequent rulings required that to recover damages, public figures must prove that a news organization had actual, subjective doubts about a story. The subjective proof, the Court said, was part of showing that a news organization acted with actual malice, which means reckless disregard for the truth or falsity of a report. Examination of editorial judgments was necessary, the Court said, in order to find out whether editors and reporters had doubts about a story. Lando and CBS eventually prevailed when the case returned to the lower courts.

STEPHEN J. WERMIEL

References and Further Reading

Lewis, Anthony, New York Times v. Sullivan Reconsidered: Time to Return to "The Central Meaning of the First Amendment," 83 Columbia Law Review (1983): 603:610–3.

———. Discovery from Media Defendants in Public Figure Defamation Actions, 93 Harvard Law Review (1979): 149.

Smolla, Rodney A. Suing the Press: Libel, the Media & Power. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Cases and Statutes Cited

New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)

See also First Amendment and PACs; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964); White, Byron Raymond*

HERNANDEZ v. COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)

Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue is a leading Supreme Court decision on taxation and non-profit organizations. The case is also important for the deep questions it raises about both the law's treatment of unconventional religious movements and its broader conceptualization of religion itself.

Hernandez arose out of the Internal Revenue Service's (IRS) rejection of charitable deductions claimed by members of the Church of Scientology for payments they made to branch churches for fundamental practices of the church known as "auditing" and "training." The Scientologists contended that the fees, although fixed in amount and required to obtain those services, were similar to other sorts of religious payments whose deductibility the IRS had long allowed, including pew rents, tithes, and mass stipends. The Supreme Court, however, upheld the IRS's determination.

The Court's statutory analysis centered on section 170(c) of the Internal Revenue Code, which allows a deduction for a "contribution or gift" made to a charitable organization. The Court held that, to qualify as contributions or gifts, payments cannot be made as part of a quid pro quo in expectation of a good or service. The fees for "auditing" and "training" were part of a "quintessential quid pro quo" and were not deductible. Moreover, the Court rejected the Scientologists' submission that this analysis is inappropriate to payments made for purely religious benefits.

The Court also rejected several constitutional challenges to the statutory scheme and its administration. It held that the deductibility provision did not violate the Establishment Clause under either the "facial preference" test of Larson v. Valente (1982) or the general three-prong Lemon test. It also found no violation of the right to free exercise. Finally, the justices sidestepped the case's most sensitive issue by concluding that the factual record before them was insufficiently developed to assess the claim of discriminatory application based on the deductibility of pew rents and the like.

Hernandez did not end the Scientologists' efforts to vindicate their position, as subsequent litigation focused on the discrimination argument that the Supreme Court had bypassed. In 1993, the IRS entered into a surprise settlement allowing the deductions.

Hernandez is important for reasons beyond its holding. It represents one chapter in a worldwide story of efforts to delegitimize Scientology, which detractors have variously accused of being a cult, a scam, or just not a genuine religion, but which has also attracted influential adherents and principled defenders.

More profoundly, Hernandez exposed some of the complexities in the law's understanding of religion. Nonprofits law has always included classed churches as "charities." In some respects, though, they more closely resemble "mutual benefit" organizations such as social clubs, and thus payments by believers to their churches—whether part of a formal quid pro quo or not—often look more like club dues than gifts. Nevertheless, as the Court implicitly recognized in Walz v. Tax Commission (1970), in upholding churches' property tax exemptions, the law's assignment of charitable status to all churches rests less on a simple empirical claim than on an intricate and unique set of considerations, including both a respect for religious autonomy and—as ultimately reflected in the IRS settlement with the Church of Scientology—a healthy reluctance to ascribe undue legal significance to the considerable differences among churches in their practices and modes of organization.

PERRY DANE

References and Further Reading

- Aprill, Ellen P., Churches, Politics, and the Charitable Contribution Deduction, 42 Boston College Law Review (2001): 843.
- Brown, Michael, Should Germany Stop Worrying and Love the Octopus? Freedom of Religion and the Church of Scientology in Germany and the United States, Indiana International and Comparative Law Review 9 (1998): 155.
